subah did not offer to molest. He even expressed his wishes that the English merchants would return to Calcutta, if they could be satisfied to live under his government, without laws or fortifications of their own, and carry on their traffic like the Armenians and his own native subjects. No sooner, however, was the intelligence of this calamity conveyed to Madras, than vigorous preparations were made by the English government to revenge the injury, and obliterate the disgrace. A formidable armament under the command of Admiral Watson and Colonel Clive, to the great astonishment of the subah, anchored in the Ganges in December; and immediately commencing their operations, Calcutta was invested and reduced in the month of January (1757), and also the city of Hughley on the Ganges, where the principal magazines of the subah were deposited. Soon after which, the subah himself, who had assembled a vast army in order to repel the invaders, was attacked by Colonel Clive, and obliged to retreat in confusion, and with considerable loss. Intimidated by the successes of the English, he consented to sign articles of peace (February 9, 1757,) by which it was stipulated that the factories and possessions belonging to the English company should be restored, and full compensation made for their losses; and, in general, that whatever rights and privileges had been at any time granted to the Company by virtue of the firmaans of the emperor, should be confirmed and ratified. After the conclusion of the treaty, the English Commanders proceeded to the attack of the French fortress and factory of Chandernagore; the reduction of which filled the nabob with new apprehensions and alarms; and he remonstrated in strong terms to Admiral Watson against these acts of violence. The Admiral, regardless of his remonstrances, and jealous of his designs, declared to him, "that, if he protected the King's enemies, he would light up a flame in his country that all the waters of the Ganges would not be able to extinguish." The capricious and tyrannical conduct of Sou-Rajah-Dowla, was such, that those who were originally most attached to his interests began to be weary of his government. Among other men of high rank in the subahdary, of whom he entertained just suspicion, was Meer-Jaffier-Ali-Khan, nearly allied to the subah by his marriage with the sister of Ali-Verdi-Khan. He had been heard to declare that he would have the head of Meer-Jaffier; and Meer-Jaffier, sensible of the imminent dangers of his situation, made secret proposals to the English resident at the court of Moorshedabad, the capital of Bengal, which were eagerly embraced by the English council and commandants at Calcutta, for the deposition of Sou-Rajah-Dowla, and the advancement of Meer-Jaffier to the Musnud. The jealousies of the subah continuing to increase, Meer-Jaffier retired from court to his residence in the country; whence he transmitted dispatches to Colonel Clive, urging him to begin his march to Moorshedabad. The Colonel, seeing that the die was cast, and that they had already gone much too far unless they proceeded still further, immediately put the whole army in motion; and, with a just, though daring, reliance on his own talents and the valour of his troops, crossing the Ganges, he advanced to Plassey, within one day's march of the capital; where he found the subah encamped with a force of seventy thousand men, in all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of oriental magnificence. The subah, on the first intelligence of the march of the English army, had eagerly courted the support and assistance of Meer-Jaffier, whom he had beyond all possibility of forgiveness previously offended. A full and free pardon was granted to Meer-Jaffier; who, being introduced into the presence of the subah, took a solemn oath upon the Koran that he would be his faithful soldier; and, in return, the subah swore that he would never attempt the life of Meer-Jaffier. Though the army of the subah was advantageously posted upon an eminence, Colonel Clive advanced at the head of his troops, consisting of little more than three thousand men, with great intrepidity to the attack. On the other hand, the distrust and secret despondency prevailing throughout the Asiatic army were such, that resistance was scarcely attempted. With the slight loss of about seventy men, a decisive victory was gained—the camp, artillery, and stores of the enemy falling into the hands of the victors. Doubtful, perhaps, of the final event, and perplexed in the mazes of his own policy, Meer-Jaffier, who commanded the left wing of the subah's army, took no part whatever in the action; but the English commander, far from discovering any impolitic symptoms of resentment at his ambiguity of conduct, saluted him, with apparent complacency, subah of the three provinces, and exhorted him to pursue

and that the positive assurance required of her, in terms so unusually peremptory, could not be more binding than the solemn treaty actually subsisting, and which she had no intention to violate." The Prussian monarch, convinced by evidence transmitted through secret channels, of the insincerity of the court of Vienna, and that Saxony waited only a favourable opportunity to join the confederacy against him, entered that electorate with a numerous army, and took possession of the city of Dresden on the 8th of September 1756; declaring, however, that he did not mean to violate the neutrality professed by his Polish Majesty, and requiring only that monarch to separate his army into cantonments, as a proof and pledge of his amity and good faith. The King of Poland, astonished and exasperated at this unexpected intrusion, seemed neither to know how to comply or resist. Relying, however, upon the strength of the inaccessible camp of Pirna, romantically situated on the summit of a lofty range of rocks extending along the banks of the Elbe, to which the Saxon army had retreated, he ventured to declare his resolution to keep his troops assembled for the defence and protection of his person and dominions. This, with an antagonist such as the King of Prussia, was equivalent to a declaration of war; and the Prussian General, finding it impossible to attack the Saxons, took immediate possession, by order of the King, of all the passes leading to this impregnable post. Thus the whole Saxon army, reduced to extremity by famine, was on the 14th of October compelled to surrender prisoners of war. The King of Poland now retired for personal security to Warsaw; and the King of Prussia took possession of the whole electorate. During the blockade of Pirna, that monarch had made an attempt to penetrate into Bohemia; but finding the Austrian army, under Count Browne, strongly posted at Lowoschutz, on the Egrin, a bloody engagement ensued (October 1), which terminated with nearly equal loss: the advantages also were nearly equal, as the Austrians were prevented from advancing to the relief of the Saxons, and the King of Prussia was on his part compelled to measure back his steps to Saxony, where he took up his winter quarters. On re-entering Dresden, the King of Prussia commanded the royal cabinet to be forced, in defiance of the personal opposition of the Queen of Poland. In it was found deposited an authentic copy of a defensive treaty of alliance between the courts of Vienna, St. Petersburgh, and Dresden, which had been some years concluded, and contained six secret articles. The fourth of these, for the sake of which the whole treaty seemed to have been formed, imported, that if the King of Prussia should depart from the peace of Dresden, which the contracting powers declared their intention religiously to observe, by attacking either of the contracting powers, or even the republic of Poland, the rights of the Empress-Queen to Silesia, &c. should again revive and be considered as in full force; and the eventual partition of the Prussian dominions should take place as stipulated in the treaty. In consequence of these daring acts of violence, the King was, at the subsequent meeting of the diet at Ratisbon, in his quality of Elector of Brandenburg, put under the Ban of the empire, divested of his privileges and prerogatives, his fiefs escheated, and the circle ordered to furnish their respective contingencies for carrying this sentence into execution. Not intimidated by this formidable denunciation, that monarch, early in the ensuing spring (1757), entered Bohemia at the head of a vast army, assisted by the Mareschals Keith and Schwerin, and, advancing towards Prague, found the Austrians, who were at least equally numerous, entrenched on the banks of the Moldaw, commanded by Prince Charles of Lorraine and Count Browne, whom he attacked without hesitation or delay—forcing the entrenchments with resistless intrehis march to Moorshedabad at the head of his troops—engaging, without delay, to follow and support him with his whole force.—Sou-Rajah-Dowla, who had fled with the foremost from the field of action, abandoned himself to despair; and on his arrival at Moorshedabad, after some tumultuous consultations and inconsistent resolutions, he disguised himself in the habit of a faquier, and left his palace in the dead of night, in order to seek for safety in obscurity. Meer-Jaffier, now seated, with all the accustomed ceremonies of state, upon the Musnud, was acknowledged subah of Bengal by all the rajahs and omrahs of the kingdom; and the unhappy Sou-Rajah-Dowla, being discovered in his flight, was put to death, imploring in vain for mercy, after a reign of fifteen months, by the express command of the son of the new subah. In conformity to the treaty, previously concluded with the English, this prince paid into the treasury of the company a crore of rupees,(a) as an indemnification for their losses at Calcutta, and ceded to them a considerable territory in the vicinity of that city. Thus was a revolution accomplished very marvellous in the eyes of the inhabitants of Bengal, who could not comprehend how the throne of Ali-Verdi-Khan could be subverted by a handful of foreign mercantile adventurers.

The attention of the supreme council and of the military commandants was now again turned to the coast of Coromandel, where the French had taken advantage of the temporary diminution of force on the part of the English, to make themselves masters of Ingeram, Vizagapatam, and other subordinate settlements in that quarter; and having been strengthened with large reinforcements from Europe, conducted by M. Lally, under convoy of a powerful squadron commanded by M. d'Ache, they threatened the entire conquest of all the English possessions on that coast. Fort St. David's was first invested, which surrendered after a very short and feeble defence. The rajah of Tanjore having distinguished himself as a zealous and faithful ally of the English, M. Lally marched into his dominions; and on the rajah's refusal to advance the enormous sum of seventy-two lacks of rupees, demanded by the French General, he invested the city of Tanjore; which was so resolutely defended by the native troops of the rajah, assisted by some European engineers, that M. Lally was compelled to raise the siege with considerable loss. He took possession, however, in his retreat from Tanjore, of the city of Arcot, the residence of the nabob Mohammed-Ali-Khan, without opposition; and, in the beginning of December 1758, he advanced with his whole force to Madras, to which he laid close siege. The place however, being strongly fortified and plentifully provided, the garrison made an obstinate defence; and on the arrival of a considerable reinforcement of troops and military stores, under the conduct of Captain Kempenfelt, in February (1759,) M. Lally abandoned the attempt, and retired with precipitation to Arcot, extremely chagrined at the ill success of this enterprise.

About this time, Vizagapatam and Masulipatam were recovered from the French by a detachment under Colonel Ford, and Salabat-Zing, subah of the Decan, perceiving the fortune of the war now visibly inclining to the English, made eager advances to the government of Madras. A treaty was accordingly concluded with the subah, by which he renounced his former alliance with France, and ceded the entire circar of Masulipatam to the company; the English, on their part, engaging not to assist or protect the enemies of the subah.

Colonel Coote, who now commanded in chief the company's forces in the Carnatic, gained several advantages over M. Lally, and captured, after a short siege, the important town of Wandewash, making the garrison prisoners of war. Passing rapidly to Carongoly, which also surrendered after a slight resistance, M. Lally took advantage of his absence to invest the town of Wandewash. Colonel Coote, marching with the utmost diligence to its relief, arrived at the critical time that the French had made a practicable breach. A general engagement ensued. It was long and obstinate; but it terminated in the total defeat of the French, who abandoned their camp, their cannon, and all the implements of the siege. The first news of the victory was brought to Madras at sunrise the next morning; and at noon came a note of two lines written by Colonel Coote on the field of battle. The joy which this success diffused was almost equal to that occasioned by the victory at Plassey. The English commander immediately undertook the siege and effected the reduction of Arcot. Several bloody, but indecisive, naval encounters intervened also, since the commencement of the preceding year, between M. d'Ache and Admiral Pococke, the successor of Admiral Watson, who had died soon after the recapture of Calcutta. After the defeat of Wandewash, M. Lally fled with his broken troops to Pondicherry; whither he was pursued with unremitting diligence by Colonel Coote, who, with the assistance of the British squadron, soon formed the blockade of that important city. As soon as the periodical rains abated, and the season for active operations recommenced, the blockade was converted into a regular siege: and the place, though defended with great vigour by M. Lally, was reduced to extremity before the end of January (1761;) not so much from the damage sustained from the assaults of the besiegers, as from the excessive scarcity of provisions, which the temporary but critical absence of M. d'Ache, now repairing and careening his ships at Mauritius, left M. Lally wholly destitute of the means to remedy. The English squadron, however, having been driven from their station by a violent tempest, he dispatched a letter to the French resident at Pulicat, fortunately intercepted by the English, urging him in the strongest terms to exert himself in the procurement of supplies. The English Admiral, however, soon resuming his station, he lost all hope, and demanded a capitulation; which Colonel Coote would grant upon no other terms than that of the garrison surrendering prisoners of war; to which M. Lally at length indignantly assented. Thus the capital of the French settlements in the east fell into the hands of the enemy, nearly at the same time that the conquest of Canada was completed in the west; and the genius of England triumphed over that of France, at this propitious period, in both hemispheres.

(a) A crore is a hundred lacks of rupees; and a lack of rupees is estimated at about 11,500*l.* sterling.

pidity and complete success, though with the loss of the gallant Mareschal Schwerin, who, after surviving the dangers of fifty campaigns, was slain, fighting at the head of his troops, covered with laurels, in the moment of victory. The shattered remains of the Austrian army took refuge in the city of Prague; where Mareschal Browne soon after died of the wounds which he received in the battle, or rather of the chagrin occasioned by its loss. The Prussians immediately formed the investment of that city, which, in consequence of the vast number enclosed within the walls, was soon reduced by famine to the last extremity. At this period, the famous Leopold Count Daun, originally a subaltern officer in the school of the great Khevenhuller, who with the penetrating eye of military sagacity had marked his extraordinary talents and predicted his future eminence, was appointed to the chief command of the imperial armies. This General immediately prepared for the relief of Prague, by collecting troops from all quarters; and reinforcing them by numerous levies, he encamped with this new army in an almost impregnable situation at Kolin, near Prague, in order to harass and retard the operations of the siege. The King of Prussia, impatient of molestation and elated with success, formed the rash resolution of attacking Mareschal Daun in his camp. The imperial general perceiving, from the eminence where he was stationed, the various evolutions of the Prussian army, and astonished at the presumption of the attempt, after long keeping silence, at length exclaimed, in French, "By my faith, it appears to me, that the King must lose himself to day!" After reiterated efforts, prompted by a species of heroism bordering on despair, the Prussians were finally repulsed with prodigious slaughter. The siege of Prague was immediately raised in consequence of this disaster, and Bohemia evacuated.—The King of Prussia now found his prospects darkened on every side. The French army, under the duc de Richelieu, who, with inferior merit had superseded Mareschal d'Estrees in the command, had penetrated into the electorate of Brandenburg, taken Halberstadt, and laid a great extent of territory under contribution. Mareschal Apraxin, at the head of 100,000 Russians, had entered Ducal Prussia, where they committed the utmost excesses. Pomerania was menaced with a powerful invasion from Sweden; the army of the empire, reinforced by a strong body of troops under the Prince of Soubize, had entered Lusatia; the victorious Austrians, after laying close siege to Schweidnitz, the key of Silesia, ravaged the whole country; General Haddick, at the head of a numerous detachment, carrying terror even to the gates of Berlin.*

After reducing Memel, and leaving the country behind them a perfect waste, the Russians reached the frontiers of Germany in August; but they were soon after unexpectedly attacked in their camp at Norkitten, by Mareschal Lehwald, who commanded on that side; and, though that General was finally obliged to desist, the Russians sustained immense loss, and were compelled to a precipitate retreat. In the interim, the King of Prussia, and Mareschal Keith, engaging the combined forces of France and the empire, at Rosbach (November 5, 1757,) commanded by Soubize, gained a complete victory, with inconsiderable loss. This victory, however, by no means extricated him from his difficulties; it merely left him at liberty to seek new dangers in other quarters. The Austrians, headed by Mareschal Daun, had taken Schweidnitz and laid siege to Breslau, and on the 22d of November forced, after an obstinate resistance, the entrenchments of the army under the Prince of Bevern, posted near that place. The brave General Kleist, after performing prodigies of valour, was left amongst the slain. Breslau immediately surrendered on capitulation. The King of Prussia, on the news of this misfortune, instantly marched to the relief of Silesia; and, coming up with the Austrians at Lissa (December 4,) the two armies joined battle with inconceivable fury. Fortunately for the Prussian monarch, Prince Charles of Lorraine, who commanded the imperial army, rejecting the advice of Count Daun, to remain as at Kolin within their entrenchments—which were almost inaccessible—advanced two miles in front of the Austrian camp to receive the enemy, who confidently marched to the attack. On this occasion, the military conduct and personal bravery of Count Daun, proved wholly insufficient to prevent the total confusion and consequent rout of the Austrians; who lost more than twenty thousand men either in the battle or in passing the defiles which separate Silesia from Bohemia, where vast numbers, wandering amidst the trackless wastes and snows, perished of cold, fatigue, and hunger. Breslau immediately opened its gates to the victors; and the whole province, excepting Schweidnitz, again fell into the hands of the Prussians. The sudden retreat of the Russians left Mareschal Lehwald at liberty to act against the Swedes, who had advanced into Prussian Pomerania, and were preparing to lay siege to Stetin; but on the appearance of the Prussian army, they not only evacuated the towns they had captured, but hastily retreated into Swedish Pomerania, whither they were followed by Lehwald, who drove them from one post to another, till nothing remained to them but the city of Stralsund. Such was the situation of the King of Prussia, when it was determined by the English minister, that the army of observation, scattered and dispersed by the convention of Cloister-Seven, should resume their arms.

The King of England, retaining his partiality for German politics, and yielding only to the necessity of the times, had Mr. Pitt continued inflexible, would probably have embraced the first favourable opportunity of again dismissing a minister, who might not be able to reinstate himself with the same eclat. A consideration, however, of still greater weight, it may be presumed, with Mr. Pitt, was, the visible change of sentiment in the nation on this subject. The King of Prussia, since the dissolution of his political connection with France, and his consequent alliance with England, had become a very popular character in the country; and this national predilection, after the victory of Rosbach, rose to enthusiasm. That monarch artfully affected to consider the union of the two great Catholic powers, as a combination to oppress and subvert the Protestant interest in the empire; and the people of England, to whom the name of Popery was still formidable, delighted to applaud and extol this "sceptred infidel" as "the Protestant hero." The national honour was also concerned to efface the stain of the disgraceful convention of Cloister-Seven.

It was impossible for Mr. Pitt to act with feebleness or indecision; and, if he resolved to engage in a Germanic war, he would also resolve to prosecute it with vigour and effect. This minister discerned also the advantage which might eventually arise to the distant and multifarious operations of Britain, from fixing the chief attention of France upon an object which, from local circumstances, must be at all times more interesting and important to that kingdom than to England; and he scrupled not, at a subsequent period, to hazard the assertion, that "America had been conquered in Germany."

The troops disbanded at Cloister-Seven having been re-assembled at Stade, in November 1757, the command was conferred upon Prince Ferdinand, brother to the reigning Duke of Brunswick. This General immediately put his troops in motion; and though the season was far advanced, he obtained several advantages. Two considerable detachments from the French army were entirely defeated by Generals Schuylenburg

*. It was at this period that the King of Prussia thus expressed himself, in a letter to his friend the celebrated Earl Mareschal: "What say you of this league, which has only the Marquis of Brandenburg for its object? The great elector would be surprised to see his grandson at war with the Russians, the Swedes, the Austrians, almost all Germany, and a hundred thousand French auxiliaries. I know not whether it will be disgrace in me to submit; but I am sure there will be no glory in vanquishing me."

and Zastrow, the town and castle of Harburg reduced, and the cities of Lunenburg and Zell recovered; after which the two armies went into winter quarters.

In the spring of 1758, the famous subsidy treaty was concluded between Great Britain and Prussia, by which the King of England engaged to pay into the hands of his Prussian Majesty the annual sum of 670,000*l.* or four millions of German crowns, to be employed at his discretion for the good of the common cause. This great supply enabled that monarch to take the field with redoubled force. In the month of April, he opened the trenches before Schweidnitz, and kept a continual fire upon the town, with a prodigious train of artillery, consisting of three hundred pieces of cannon and eighty mortars. The garrison were obliged to surrender upon capitulation before the end of the month. The Austrian army, after the battle of Lissa, having retired into Bohemia, the King of Prussia levied immense contributions in Saxony, Pomerania, Mecklenburg, &c. About the middle of February, Prince Ferdinand had put himself at the head of the allies, and advancing towards the French army, which retired at his approach, took possession of Bremen without opposition. The Duc de Richelieu was now succeeded in the command by the Count de Clermont, who found his troops reduced by the accidents of war, and a variety of hardships, to a most deplorable condition. Under these circumstances he determined to march back to the Rhine; and, in consequence of this resolution, Hanover was evacuated, after having been in the possession of the French about six months. Such was the precipitation of the enemy's retreat, and so great were their confusion and embarrassment, that they were obliged to abandon their sick and wounded to the mercy of the allies, who also took many prisoners, with several entire magazines of provision and forage which they had not time to destroy. The Count de Clermont, having reached the further borders of the Rhine, was still closely pursued by Prince Ferdinand, who passed that river in the beginning of June; and, on the 23d of that month, he attacked the French army posted at Crevelt, the left wing of which, after a warm engagement, was defeated with the loss of six thousand men; but the right and centre made a skilful and regular retreat. Prince Ferdinand immediately invested Dusseldorp, which soon surrendered on capitulation. The Count de Clermont was now succeeded by Mareschal de Contades, who, being joined by powerful reinforcements, menaced an attack upon the Prince in his turn; and the Prince of Ysemburg, who commanded a separate corps on the other side of the Rhine, being about this time defeated by Mareschal Broglio, his serene highness thought it necessary to repass that river, as well in order to support the vanquished army, as to meet the reinforcements from England, commanded by the Duke of Marlborough, which were now landed at Embden. Accordingly a bridge was thrown over the river at Griethuysen, and the allies passed it on the 10th of August without loss. The season was so far advanced before the junction with the British forces, that no military operations of importance ensued during the remainder of the campaign between the two grand armies on the Rhine. On the Weser, the Prince of Ysemburg was again worsted by Soubize and Broglio. Prince Ferdinand entered into winter quarters at Munster, and the French again established themselves in Westphalia. The King of Prussia had his hands fully employed in Saxony and Bohemia. After the reduction of Schweidnitz, he began his march at the head of fifty thousand men into Moravia, and laid siege to Olmutz, the capital of that marquisate. Mareschal Daun immediately advanced to its relief; and though he did not think proper to hazard a battle, he posted himself in so judicious a situation, that the Prussians found it extremely difficult to carry on their operations. The garrison also made several successful sallies; and the Austrian General Laudohn having at length intercepted a great convoy of provisions and ammunition, the King of Prussia found himself under the necessity of raising the siege, which he effected with such secrecy and expedition as to have penetrated far into Bohemia before it was known in the Austrian camp that he had lost sight of the walls of Olmutz. Mareschal Daun immediately followed, but found himself without an antagonist, his Majesty having evacuated Bohemia at the approach of the Russians, who had now entered Brandenburg in two large bodies, commanded by Generals Fermor and Browne, and spread terror and devastation wherever they appeared. In the course of this campaign, they plundered and destroyed fourteen large towns, and more than one hundred villages. The Prussians came up with them at Zorndorf, August 25, when a desperate engagement ensued. The battle began about noon, and lasted till night, when the Russians gave way in great confusion; and, as the Prussians gave no quarter, the slaughter was terrible. The Russians, however, continued extremely formidable. Upon the retreat of the King of Prussia from Bohemia, Mareschal Daun had advanced towards the Elbe, and, being joined by the Prince of Deux Ponts at the head of the army of the empire, threatened to surround Prince Henry of Prussia, who commanded, with much reputation and ability, for the King his brother in Saxony: but his force was too weak to stop the progress of the Austrians, who took Konigstein, and established themselves in the strong camp at Pirna. Immediately after the battle of Zorndorf, the King began his march to join the Prince; but, upon his arrival, found the imperialists—who had retreated as he approached—so strongly entrenched, that they could not be attacked with any prospect of success. However, he gained some trifling advantages, and dislodged a corps of troops posted in the village of Hochkirchen, which was immediately occupied by the Prussian army; but, in the middle of the night of the 14th of October, he was surprised in his camp by Mareschal Daun; and, after a most severe and bloody conflict, maintained amidst all the horrors of darkness and confusion, he was obliged to leave the Austrians in possession of the field and camp. Mareschal Keith gloriously fell in the action.*

On this misfortune, the King of Prussia retiring into Silesia, the Austrians invested Dresden. On their appearance, the Prussian governor Schmettau set fire to the suburbs of that city. The King of Prussia, after putting a stop to the progress of the Austrian arms in Silesia, and raising the sieges of Neisse and Cosel, returned to the relief of Dresden more formidable than ever, having been joined by a strong body of troops, under the Generals Dohna and Wedel, the former of whom had been engaged in observing the motions of the Russians, who, after attempting the siege of Colberg without success, had retired beyond the Vistula. The campaign in Pomerania greatly resembled that of the last year; for, the Prussian monarch being obliged to withdraw all his forces, excepting those in garrison, the enemy not only recovered every thing they had lost, but made bold incursions into the Prussian territories, and even levied contributions within twenty miles of Berlin. At the approach of General Wedel, however, they evacuated their conquests with great precipitation, The Prussian General being now at liberty to co-operate with the King, marched into Saxony, and raised the siege of Torgau. Being afterwards joined by General Dohna, he proceeded to the relief of Leipsic, which was closely invested by the army of the empire; and this design having been completed, they effected a junction with the King, and advanced towards Dresden. At their approach, however, Mareschal Daun thought proper to draw off his forces, and on the 20th of November his Prussian Majesty entered that city in triumph.

* The corpse of this great man, with a cloak thrown carelessly over it, was carried into the church of Hockirchen, where M. Daun, General Lasci, and other officers of distinction, assembled after the battle. The question being accidentally asked, whose body it was? Lasci, viewing it with emotion, exclaimed, "'Tis my father's friend! 'tis Keith!"—Struck with the vicissitudes of fortune, and the disastrous termination of a life so celebrated in military history, universal silence ensued; and the Mareschal Daun himself was observed to shed tears of generous sympathy. General Keith was interred with military honours.

The French commenced the year 1759 with an act of singular perfidy, in seizing the imperial city of Francfort, which was productive of most important advantages, as it commanded the navigation both of the Maine and the Rhine; and here the Prince of Soubize established his head quarters. Early in the spring, several officers of rank in the allied army distinguished themselves by their activity and courage in beating up the enemy's quarters, destroying their magazines, and defeating various detached corps; particularly the hereditary Prince, who, in an action at Meiningen, made three entire battalions prisoners of war. The General of the allies, however, was disappointed in his grand design of driving the French army from Francfort before the arrival of their expected reinforcements. With this intention, he made, on the 13th of April, an attack on Mareschal Broglio at Bergen; but, having been repulsed in three successive assaults, he was obliged to retreat with loss. The brave but unfortunate Prince of Ysemburg fell in the action. In consequence of this check, Prince Ferdinand returning to his former cantonments in Munster, the French army, now under the command of Mareschal Contades, advanced northwards, and took possession of Cassel and Gottingen, Lipstadt, Munster, and Minden. The Regency of Hanover, alarmed at the rapidity of their progress, sent off the archives of the electorate, and the most valuable effects, to Stade, in order to be shipped for England; and his serene highness, finding himself unable to oppose them in the field, encamped with his troops in a strong situation near Minden, where, on the 1st of August, the French General resolved to attack them. This resolution produced the famous battle of Minden, at which the French charged with great impetuosity, but met with so warm a reception, that, after a conflict which lasted from dawn till noon, they were broken and routed on all sides, and gave way in extreme disorder and confusion. At this critical moment, the Prince sent orders to Lord George Sackville, who commanded the cavalry of the right wing, which formed a corps de reserve, to advance with all possible expedition to the attack; and, had these orders been properly executed, the disorderly retreat of the French army must have been converted into a precipitate flight; but his Lordship, unfortunately, not deeming his highness's orders sufficiently explicit, chose to apply to the Prince in person for an explanation; by which means, as well as by repeated orders to halt after the march was actually begun, so much time was lost that the cavalry did not arrive soon enough to be of the least service. The allied army, however, without his Lordship's assistance, obtained a glorious victory. The English infantry, in particular, commanded by Generals Waldegrave and Kingsley, acquired immortal honour. They not only sustained, with the utmost intrepidity, the repeated attacks made upon them, but, charging the enemy in their turn, totally broke and routed the gendarmerie, carabineers, and the choicest veterans of the French army. In this action M. Contades lost ten thousand men, with forty-three pieces of large cannon, a great number of colours and standards, and his own equipage and cabinet, containing papers of the utmost consequence. The garrison of Minden immediately surrendered at discretion. On the same day, a separate corps, under the Duc de Brissac, was totally defeated at Coveldt by the hereditary Prince. The French army now commenced its retreat to Cassel, which they soon abandoned, and fell back to Giessen, being exceedingly harassed during their march. The city of Munster was now the only place in Westphalia which remained in the hands of the French. After in vain attempting to reduce it by a bombardment and cannonade, the allies invested it in form about the beginning of November, when it surrendered upon terms.

M. Contades having been recalled, in disgrace, the Duc de Broglio had succeeded him in the command of the French army. He would, in all probability, have been driven beyond the Rhine, had not the exigency of the King of Prussia's situation made it necessary to detach the hereditary Prince into Saxony with a large body of troops to his assistance. That monarch had experienced the inconstancy of fortune in this campaign, though it had been opened with great eclat by Prince Henry, who, forcing a passage into Bohemia by way of Peterswald, destroyed the Austrian magazines at Leutmeritz, and thence penetrating into Franconia, drove the army of the empire before him to Nuremburg, laid the country under contribution, and captured upwards of fifteen hundred prisoners. General Wedel had, in the interim, been sent into Poland to oppose the progress of the Russians, who had begun their march from the banks of the Vistula; but, in an obstinate engagement which took place at Kaye, near Zullichau, the Prussians were defeated with great loss. The enemy immediately advanced into Brandenburg, and made themselves masters of the important city of Francfort upon the Oder. The King of Prussia, alarmed at their success, ordered a detachment of ten thousand men from the grand camp in Silesia to join the army under General Wedel, who had been also reinforced by about the same number under General Finck; and the King took upon himself the command of the whole, amounting to fifty thousand men. The Russians, to the number of eighty thousand, were strongly entrenched at Cunersdorf; but the King's affairs requiring a desperate effort, he determined to attack them in their camp; and, about eleven in the morning of the 12th of August, the action was begun with a heavy cannonade; after which the Prussians charged the left wing of the Russian army with so much vigour, that, after a furious contest of six hours, they forced the entrenchments with great slaughter, and seventy pieces of cannon fell into their hands. The battle was now looked upon as decided; and the King, in the first transports of his joy, dispatched the following billet to the Queen at Berlin: "Madam, we have driven the Russians from their entrenchments: in two hours more expect to hear of a glorious victory." But he soon found himself fatally mistaken. The Russian General Soltikoff, exerting all his powers, rallied his troops upon an eminence under cover of a redoubt; and his artillery, which was still greatly superior to that of the Prussians, was planted so judiciously as to render his situation almost impregnable. The King, however, was resolved to hazard a fresh attack, though against the advice of all his Generals. His infantry having been repulsed in repeated assaults, the cavalry were ordered to succeed to the charge; but with no better success. At length the Russian cavalry, and a body of twelve thousand Austrian horse, under M. Laudohn, who had joined Soltikoff just before the engagement, and had hitherto remained inactive, seeing the Prussians discouraged and exhausted, fell in among them sword in hand with such fury that in a short time the Prussians were totally routed and dispersed, notwithstanding the extraordinary efforts of the King, who exposed his life in the hottest parts of the engagement, had two horses shot under him, and his clothes shattered with musket balls. Nothing but the approach of night could have saved him from total ruin. On leaving the field of battle, he dispatched a second billet to the Queen, expressed in these terms: "Remove from Berlin with the royal family. Let the archives be carried to Potzdam. The town may make conditions with the enemy."*

Prince Henry had gained several advantages over the army of the empire, which, again entering Saxony,

* This was by far the most bloody action that had happened since the commencement of hostilities. Thirty thousand men were left dead on the field, of whom two thirds were Prussians; twelve Generals were killed or wounded in this engagement; and the King of Prussia left his whole train of artillery in the hands of the Russians. This, however, was soon replaced from the arsenal at Berlin; and, by his indefatigable diligence in recruiting his army, which was further strengthened by the recal of part of his forces from Pomerania, he soon regained his consequence.

had

had taken possession of the city of Dresden; and also over the Austrian army co-operating with them, under General Haddick. The Prince being at length joined by his Prussian Majesty, General Finck was detached with a strong body of forces to cut off the retreat of the Austrians into Bohemia. This measure, however, proved a most unfortunate one; for Mareschal Daun, receiving intelligence of General Finck's remote and isolated position, immediately resolved upon an assault; and, dividing his forces into four columns, he conducted his march with such secrecy and expedition that the Prussians found themselves entirely surrounded before they had entertained the least suspicion of being attacked. In this emergency they fought with great bravery; but at length, overpowered by numbers and destitute of the possibility of relief, they were compelled to surrender prisoners of war, to the amount of nineteen battalions and thirty-five squadrons. The King, however, refused with indignation to listen to the vindication of General Finck; who did not, indeed, appear to have been actuated by that spirit of heroism which the emergency required. The approach of winter at last freed the King from any further apprehensions from the Russians, who retired into their old quarters in Poland. The Swedes had, fortunately, been very inactive during the campaign.

A. D. 1760.] The French court had made great preparations for a vigorous campaign in Westphalia the ensuing summer. The grand army, under Mareschal Broglio, was reinforced to the number of 100,000 men; and the Count de St. Germaine commanded a separate corps of about 30,000. The hereditary Prince, who had rejoined the allied army early in the spring, met with a repulse at Corbach, in an assault upon the Count de St. Germaine; but he had soon an opportunity of retrieving his honour at Exdorf; where, on the 16th of July, he attacked a numerous body of the enemy under General Glaubitz, who were totally defeated after a very warm action,—five whole battalions being taken prisoners, including the commander, with their arms, baggage, and artillery.* This advantage was succeeded by another of greater consequence: the Chevalier Muy, who commanded the reserve of the French army, amounting to thirty-five thousand men, having been ordered to pass the Dymel, with a view to cut off the communication of the allied army (then posted near Cassel) with Westphalia, Prince Ferdinand immediately decamped and followed him; and, on the 31st of July, made so masterly a disposition of his forces that M. de Muy, who then lay encamped near the village of Warbourg, found himself at once attacked in flank, front, and rear. The French retreated so precipitately that the English infantry could not arrive in time to have any share in the action; but the cavalry, with the Marquis of Granby at their head, distinguished themselves in the most honorable manner.—The General of the allies, however, being obliged in consequence of this movement, to leave the landgraviate of Hesse exposed to the enemy's attack, Mareschal Broglio made himself master of Cassel, and even reduced Minden, Gottingen, and Elmbeck. Notwithstanding the capture of these towns, the superiority acquired by the late victory enabled the English General to detach the hereditary Prince on an expedition to the Lower Rhine; but this was by no means productive of the advantages expected. The city of Cleves, being weakly garrisoned, made little resistance; but at Wesel, which place he next invested, he met with a much warmer reception than he looked for; and his operations also being much retarded by heavy rains, he found it impracticable to carry the place before the arrival of a superior force, detached from the French army, under M. de Castries, for its relief. The siege having been raised, an engagement ensued near Campen, in which the Prince sustained considerable loss; notwithstanding which, he repassed the river in the face of the enemy without molestation, and rejoined the main army, which had been ineffectually employed in the blockade of Gottingen. Soon afterwards, Prince Ferdinand retired into winter quarters, leaving the enemy in possession of the whole country eastward of the Weser. The King of Prussia had made surprising exertions during the whole of this campaign. Whilst the two grand hostile armies remained strongly entrenched in the neighbourhood of Dresden, General Laudohn made great progress in the reduction of Silesia, by totally defeating (June 23) a strong body of troops under General Fouquet, who was himself wounded and taken prisoner, and capturing the important town of Glatz, which contained an immense magazine of military stores; after which he invested Breslau. However, Count Tavenstein, the governor, by making a resolute defence, enabled Prince Henry to march to its relief. Such was the expedition of the Prussian General, that he marched one hundred and thirty English miles in five days; and at his approach Laudohn abandoned his enterprise, after laying the city in ashes by a furious cannonade and bombardment, by which he hoped to intimidate the governor to a surrender. The King of Prussia, after besieging in vain the city of Dresden, marched into Silesia, whither he was followed by Count Daun; and advancing to Lignitz, with a view to effect a junction with the Prince, who still remained at Breslau, he found himself in imminent danger of being surrounded, Mareschal Daun being posted in front, General Laudohn on his left, and General Lascy on his right; the grand army of the Russians, under Mareschal Soltikoff, being also on their march to co-operate with the Austrians. In this dilemma, he determined rather to give battle than wait the attack; and, after taking the necessary precautions for the safety of his camp, he made a movement to the left with the greater part of his forces, in the evening of the 14th of August, with an intention of surprising General Laudohn, who, in consequence of a plan formed by Mareschal Daun, of which his Prussian Majesty had obtained previous intimation, was at the same time on his march to surprise the King. The two armies met about two o'clock in the morning, between the villages of Pfaffendorff and Lignitz, and after a sharp action, which lasted till six, the Austrians gave ground, and were pursued to a considerable distance. Mareschal Daun, who, in the execution of his part of the plan, had marched to the right of the Prussian camp, finding the tents apparently deserted, and hearing the remote reverberation of cannon, instantly conjectured the nature of the King's manœuvre, and hastened, but in vain, to the relief of Laudohn, the Austrians having been previously routed. By this victory the King opening himself a passage to Breslau, joined his brother Prince Henry at Neumarcke, and they immediately began their march to Schweidnitz, now closely blockaded by the Austrians, who retired at their approach to the mountains of Landshut. Whilst the King and Prince triumphed in Silesia, General Hulsen, who had been left in Saxony, found great difficulty in maintaining his ground against the imperial army under the Prince of Deux-Ponts. The Swedes who had surprised and killed General Manteuffle in the beginning of the year, now ravaged all Pomerania, without meeting any opposition. The sufferings of the Pomeranians, however, were inconsiderable in comparison of those which the electorate of Brandenburg, and even the city of Berlin itself, experienced; for a grand detachment of the Russian army, under Count Czernicheff, penetrating into the Marche on one side, and a numerous body of Austrians, under the Generals Lascy and Brentano, on the other, joined their forces in the neighbourhood of that capital, which being of great extent, and imperfectly fortified, could make but a very feeble resistance; the garrison, to the amount of 1,200 men, being compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war. The Russian and Austrian troops no sooner entered the place than they demanded the immediate payment of 800,000 guilders, and afterwards exacted a contribution of 1,900,000 German crowns.

* Elliot's regiment of light horse appeared for the first time in the field upon this occasion; and, to the astonishment of the veteran troops, charged five different times, and broke through the enemy at every charge.

crowns. These exorbitant levies the inhabitants were obliged to comply with, to save the city from destruction. However, neither their compliance, nor the united efforts of the Austrian and Russian Generals, could prevent the Cossacks, Croats, and other irregular troops, from being guilty of atrocious excesses.*

The King of Prussia was followed by Mareschal Daun, at the head of 100,000 men. The Prussian army, after the junction with General Hulsen, amounted to 80,000; but notwithstanding this inferiority, the King determined to risk a battle. On the 3d of November, the whole Prussian army advanced towards the Austrians, advantageously posted at Torgau, upon the banks of the Elbe, their front being fortified with two hundred pieces of cannon; but the King giving his troops to understand that they must conquer or die, they charged the enemy with the most desperate intrepidity. The victory, however, remained in suspense, till General Zeithen, who had taken a circuit with part of the right wing of the Prussians, fell upon the rear of the Austrian army, which then began to give way, in some disorder; but Mareschal Daun receiving a dangerous wound, which obliged him to quit the field, the confusion became general. The darkness of the night, however, favoured the retreat of the Austrians across the Elbe, over which they had previously thrown three bridges of boats, leaving the field of battle dearly purchased in the hands of the enemy. In consequence of this defeat, Mareschal Daun being under the necessity of recalling his detachments, General Laudohn abandoned Landshut, and his other acquisitions in Silesia. The Russians also, at the approach of winter, which the King stiled his best auxiliary, raised the siege of Colberg, and retired to their cantonments in Poland, the Swedes into their old quarters near Stralsund, and the imperialists into Franconia; so that the King of Prussia found himself nearly in the same situation as at the beginning of the campaign.

Prince Ferdinand opened the campaign of 1761, with the sieges of Ziegenhayn and Cassel, hoping to reduce them before Mareschal Broglio should receive his re-inforcements; but the garrisons making a vigorous resistance, and part of the allied army under the hereditary Prince being defeated near Heimbach, his serene highness found himself obliged to withdraw his troops and stand upon the defensive. The army under Mareschal Broglio having been recruited, Prince Ferdinand retired behind the Dymel, and established his head quarters at Paderborn. The Duc de Broglio, having passed that river in June, drove General Sporcken from the post he occupied on the left side, and made himself master of Warbourg and Paderborn, and compelled Prince Ferdinand to retire behind the Lippe. On the 15th of July, in the evening, the French army made a furious attack upon the left wing of the allies posted at Fellinghausen, commanded by the Marquis of Granby; and having been repulsed with considerable loss, they renewed the attack at break of day with redoubled vigour. Finding, however, that no impression could be made by their repeated efforts, their ardour began to abate; and, upon being charged by the Marquis, in his turn, they abandoned the field in confusion, leaving behind them four thousand dead.

The French Generals now divided their forces; the Prince de Soubize retreating to Dortmund, and Mareschal Broglio marching back to Cassel. In a short time the latter General passed the Weser, with an intention of penetrating into Hanover; but on the approach of Prince Ferdinand he repassed that river with the greater part of his army. A detachment, however, under the command of the Count de Broglio, his brother, by a forced march, took possession of Wolfenbuttle, and invested Brunswick; but the hereditary Prince, flying to the relief of his father's capital, obliged the besiegers to relinquish this enterprise. The remainder of the campaign Mareschal Broglio remained inactive in his camp; and Prince Ferdinand, unable to force him to a battle, retired into winter cantonments in the vicinity of Munster and Osnaburg. The spring was far advanced before hostilities commenced in Saxony and Silesia. The grand armies, on each side, were so strongly posted that neither chose to risk the attack. The imperialists, attempting to enter Saxony, were repulsed by General Seydlitz; but a numerous body of Russians, commanded by General Romanzoff, could not be prevented from penetrating into Pomerania, in July, and investing Colberg by land, whilst it was blocked up by a powerful squadron at sea. Their main army was soon after put in motion, and all the efforts of the King of Prussia could not prevent its junction with Laudohn, and the ruin of that sovereign was again confidently foretold. If any event could make his affairs apparently more desperate, it was the loss of Schweidnitz, which General Laudohn surprised about this time, by a brilliant coup de main. Prince Henry of Prussia, who commanded in Saxony, by great military skill, prevented Mareschal Daun, at the head of a superior army, from obtaining any advantage. That General was even obliged, in an attempt to storm the Prussian camp, to retreat with considerable loss, soon after which both armies were distributed into quarters of cantonment. The fatal consequences which had been apprehended from the so much dreaded junction of the Austrian and Russian armies did not, however, take place; and the Russian General soon perceived, or pretended to perceive, the necessity of separating, to cover his magazines in Poland, which were vigorously attacked by the Prussians, under General Platen. The siege of Colberg, however, still continued. General Romanzoff seemed even to set the winter at defiance: and, at length the place surrendered, (December 17, 1761.) This was a conquest of immense importance, as it enabled the court of St. Petersburgh, at all times, to send supplies and reinforcements to their armies in Germany by sea. Romanzoff established his head quarters in Pomerania, during the winter, with a view of taking the field early next year.

The court of Versailles, resolving to exert its utmost efforts in Westphalia, assembled an immense army upon the banks of the Weser (A. D. 1762,) under the Prince de Soubize and the Count d'Estrées. Prince Ferdinand lay encamped behind the Dymel, watching their motions. On the 24th of June, the enemy being posted at Grabenstein, a disposition was made for an attack; the Prince himself crossing the river to charge in front, and Generals Luckner and Sporcken being severally detached to fall upon them at the same time in flank and rear. This plan was executed with such success, that the French army was thrown into the utmost confusion; and the French Generals, after a short resistance, gave orders for striking the tents, and sounding a retreat. Such, however, was the impetuosity of the assailants, that in all probability a total defeat would have ensued, had not M. de Stainville, with the most heroic gallantry and presence of mind, collected some regiments, consisting of the flower of the French infantry, with which he made so resolute a stand at the pass of Wilhemsthal, that he effectually covered the retreat of the two Mareschals, who retired without much loss under the cannon of Cassel; but the corps under his command was either cut to pieces, or taken prisoners. In consequence of this defeat, the French Generals abandoned Gottingen, after demolishing the fortifications, which they had erected at an immense expence, and retired to Melsungen, in order to preserve the communication with Francfort; but on the approach of the Prince they thought proper to pass the Fulda rather than hazard another battle, and the post of Melsungen was occupied by the allies. In July, M. de Stainville, at the head of several regiments of dragoons, fell into an ambuscade at

* Not contented with demolishing the public magazines, arsenals founderies, and hospitals, many hundred private houses were broke into and plundered, during the few days they remained there; for, upon hearing that the King was in full march to the relief of his capital, they abandoned the city, and, taking different routes, laid the whole country desolate in their retreat. The rich and costly furniture of the royal castle of Charlottenburg was totally destroyed; and even the celebrated collection of paintings and statues made by the Cardinal de Polignac, and deposited there, was miserably despoiled.

Merschen, and his whole corps was totally routed. The joy, however, occasioned by these successes was somewhat damped by an unfortunate enterprise of the hereditary Prince, who, attacking with very inferior force the Prince of Conde on his march from the Lower Rhine to join Soubize, was defeated, and dangerously wounded.

The French Generals, perceiving the intentions of Prince Ferdinand, to lay siege to Cassel, made repeated efforts to throw supplies into the place; but were prevented by the vigilance of that able commander. The trenches were opened on the 16th of October, and the operations carried on with such vigor, that, notwithstanding the place was defended with great bravery, the governor found himself obliged to sign a capitulation on the 1st of November

The Prince intended to close the campaign with the siege of Ziegenhayn, the only fortress in Hesse now possessed by the French; but his preparations were interrupted by the cessation of arms which took place at this period, immediately on signing the preliminaries of peace between Britain and France.

On the 5th of January, 1762, died Elizabeth Empress of Russia, by which event the most formidable and inveterate of all the enemies of the Prussian monarch were converted into friends and allies. Her successor Peter III.—a Prince of the House of Holstein Gottorp, and a descendant of the eldest daughter of Peter the Great—entertained so strong an attachment to the King, that he not only concluded a treaty of peace, but sent express orders to the Russian commanders to co-operate with him; and a body of troops under Count Czernicheff actually joined the Prussian army. The Swedes also, by his example, were induced to listen to pacific terms.

Early in May, Prince Henry, unexpectedly passing the Muldaw, surprised the left wing of the Austrian camp; on which occasion General Zetzwitz was taken prisoner, with fifteen hundred men: after which the Prince made himself master of Freyburg; and in the beginning of June repulsed the Austrians, who made a sudden attack upon his camp.

The King of Prussia, now strengthened by the accession of the Russians, in Silesia, as well as by the troops he had withdrawn from Pomerania, advanced towards Count Daun, who retired at his approach, and left a free passage for the Prussians, who invested Schweidnitz on the 8th of August, notwithstanding the secession of the Russians; who, in consequence of a surprising revolution that had taken place at the court of St. Petersburgh, were no longer at liberty to co-operate with him. This was the deposition of the reigning Emperor, by his own consort, Catharine of Anhalt, a woman of great talents, courage, and ambition, whose resentment he had fatally provoked.*

The Empress, however, though she would not grant any assistance to the King of Prussia, was by no means inclined to recommence the war, and her armies immediately commenced their march back to Russia.

The siege of Schweidnitz was carried on with great vigour; and a mine having been sprung by the besiegers, on the 8th of October, in consequence of which great part of the wall was thrown into the fosse, and preparations made for a general assault, Count de Guasco, the governor, thought proper to surrender, and he and the whole garrison were made prisoners of war. The Imperial and Austrian armies in Saxony had, during the progress of the siege, defeated a body of troops under General Belling, and retaken Freyburg; but Prince Henry, receiving a strong reinforcement from Silesia, attacked the combined forces under the command of the Prince of Stolberg, at break of day, on the 29th of October. The action lasted till two o'clock in the afternoon, when the enemy being entirely routed, abandoned the field of battle, and the town of Freyburg, with the loss of five thousand men. A suspension of arms between the courts of Vienna and Berlin taking place soon afterwards, this was the last service performed in the field by Prince Henry in the course of this war. The suspension of arms was quickly followed by the treaty of Hubertsburg, the most material article of which imported, that all conquests on each side should be evacuated, and peace re-established on the footing of former treaties.

Having thus sketched the progress and issue of a war, in which 250,000 lives were sacrificed, an immensity of treasure expended, and the fairest provinces of the empire reduced to a state of desolation and ruin, (a) we must now advert to the civil and political transactions by which the administration of Mr. Pitt was distinguished. Amongst the first and most remarkable of these, was the establishment of a national militia; a measure highly popular and patriotic; though the plan itself, which was calculated for the emergency of the occasion, was somewhat crude and imperfect. The number of men was originally fixed by the House of Commons at sixty-four thousand, but by the House of Lords reduced to thirty-two thousand.

The Empress Queen, in the summer of 1757, recalled her minister, Count Coloredo, from London; and at the same time notified to Mr. Keith, the English minister at Vienna, her determination to break off all correspondence with England, declaring that she could not see with indifference his Britannic Majesty enter into an alliance with her enemy the King of Prussia, instead of assisting her with the succours due by the most solemn treaties. The French interest in Holland prevailing at this time in an alarming degree, Sir Joseph Yorke, the English ambassador at the Hague, was ordered to represent to the States General the astonishment of the King of England at the permission given by their high mightinesses for the free passage of a large train of warlike implements and stores through Namur and Maestricht, for the use of the French army; and still more at their acquiescence in the surrender of Ostend and Nieuport, by the Empress Queen, to the French, in direct contravention of the barrier treaty, and of the treaty of Utrecht, which expressly declare, that no fortress, town, or territory of the Austrian Low-Countries shall be ceded or transferred to the crown of France, upon any pretext whatever. The States, however, were not inclined to deviate from their professed system of neutrality; and they alledged, without reserve or hesitation, their inability to prevent these infractions of former treaties, as sufficiently excusing, or rather justifying, their connivance at the conduct of other powers.

When the Parliament assembled, (December 1757,) the King, in his opening speech, mentioned the late happy successes in Germany, and recommended "that his good brother and ally, the King of Prussia, might be assisted in such a manner as his magnanimity and zeal for the common cause appeared to deserve; expressing his firm reliance on the zeal of his faithful Commons for the support of the Protestant religion, and of the liberties of Europe." The answer of the Commons was very dutiful and loyal; and the supplies, amounting to considerably more than ten millions, were voted almost without the formality of a debate—Sir Francis Dashwood only venturing to express his total dissent from, and disapprobation of, the measures now adopted. The principal debate which occurred this session, arose from a motion made for leave to bring in a bill for shortening the duration of Parlia-

(a) A. D. 1757.

* This enterprise was conducted with remarkable secresy, resolution and dispatch. The Emperor was indulging himself, in ease and security, at his country palace of Oranjebaum, when the Empress suddenly appearing before it, at the head of ten thousand men, summoned him to surrender. With this demand he instantly complied, though accompanied by his Holstein guards, and in a condition to make a vigorous defence; to which he was in vain urged by the officers about his person, particularly the gallant Mareschal Munich, who, at the age of eighty, had recently been recalled from his long exile into Siberia. The Czar was immediately sent, under a strong escort, to the castle of Petershoff, where in a few days he was carried off by "a sudden illness." This revolution was not productive of the least discontent or disorder, in any part of that vast empire; the follies and vices of the Emperor having rendered him the object of public contempt and detestation.

ments; but it was rejected by a great majority, on pretence that whilst the nation was engaged in such an expensive and dangerous war it would be improper to think of introducing so important an alteration in the form of government. The session was terminated, by commission, on the 9th of June, 1758.

In consequence of the numerous seizures made by the English of Dutch vessels, employed in carrying naval stores and transporting merchandise, the produce of the French islands, to Europe, the anger of Holland was, at this time, much excited. A memorial, to which was affixed a prodigious number of commercial signatures of the first consequence, was presented to the States-General, in which their high mightinesses were strongly urged to protect the commerce and navigation of the republic by an armed force. In consequence of a representation made upon this subject, the King of England declared, by his ambassador, that he would not suffer an illicit and injurious trade to be carried on under the specious pretext of neutrality. An open rupture was with some difficulty prevented.*

Parliament meeting in November (1758), the Lord Keeper Henley made a speech to both Houses, by command of his Majesty, in which the successes of the year were enumerated; and the Commons were again exhorted vigorously to support the King of Prussia and the rest of his Majesty's allies.† Towards the termination of the session (May 1759), the King informed the two Houses, by messages, that he had received authentic advice of preparations making by the French court with a design to invade Great Britain: and both Houses in return, assured his Majesty of their determination to support, with their lives and fortunes, his person and government against all attempts whatever. Directions also were issued to the Lords Lieutenants of the respective counties of the kingdom to use their utmost diligence and attention in executing the several acts of Parliament made for the better ordering the militia. This alarm, however, after the defeat of the French fleet by Admiral Hawke, entirely subsided.‡ In November, the Parliament was again opened by commission, and the Lord Keeper again enlarged on the signal successes of his Majesty's arms by sea and land; particularly distinguishing the reduction of Quebec and the victory of Minden—declaring, however, "that, as his Majesty entered not into this war from views of ambition, he did not wish to continue it from motives of resentment; that the desire of his Majesty's heart was to see a stop put to the effusion of Christian blood, whenever just and honourable terms of peace could be obtained." The majority, however, intoxicated with ideas of conquest, were far from wishing the speedy termination of the war; and the enormous supplies, granted by Parliament, amounted this year to no less than 15,000,000*l.*§

The public attention, was at this time engrossed by the court-martial held upon Lord George Sackville, commander of the British forces in Germany, in consequence of the charge brought against him of disobeying the repeated orders of Prince Ferdinand, to advance with the cavalry, in order to sustain the infantry, and to attack the enemy, already broken, at the memorable battle of Minden. It appeared that there was in the orders transmitted by the different aides-du-camp some degree of variation, perhaps of inconsistency, yet it was universally acknowledged that the necessity of bringing the cavalry into immediate action was strongly and repeatedly urged to his Lordship. Colonel Fitzroy (afterwards created Lord Southampton) in particular, after stating the circumstances which occasioned the order, added, "that it was a glorious opportunity for the English to distinguish themselves, and that his Lordship, by leading them on, would gain immortal honour." In conclusion, the court-martial adjudged that Lord George Sackville was guilty of disobeying the orders of Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, his Commander—declaring him, for this offence, incapable of serving his Majesty in any military capacity whatsoever. This sentence was confirmed by the King, who,

* In August (1758) a decree of the aulic council was published, enjoining all directories of circles, imperial cities, &c. to transmit to Vienna an exact account of those who had disobeyed the "avocatoria" of the empire, issued by a decree of the preceding year, and adhered to the "rebellion" raised by the elector of Brandenburg, that their revenues might be sequestrated, and themselves punished. The King of England, knowing himself to be chiefly aimed at, in the violent measures of the court of Vienna, caused to be presented, by his minister, a spirited memorial to the diet of the empire, enumerating the important services which he had rendered to the house of Austria, for which he had even exposed his life in the field of battle; in return for which the Empress-Queen had formed an alliance with France for the invasion of his electorate: and the Duke of Cumberland, who had been wounded at Dettingen in the cause of her Imperial Majesty, was compelled to fight at Hastenbec against the troops of that Princess, in defence of his father's dominions: that the King of England was threatened with the ban of the empire for not complying with the resolutions of the diet for assembling an army, although the conduct of the imperial court rendered it indispensible to his safety to retain his troops for the protection of his subjects. He acknowledged that, in quality of King of England, and for just reasons, he had sent over English troops to Germany, and had taken possession of Embden; for which he was accountable to no power upon earth; and he expressed his hope that the diet would, upon deliberate advice, not only exhort the emperor to recal or annul his recent mandates, but institute such proceedings against the Empress-Queen, in the quality of Arch-duchess of Austria, as she wished to enforce against the King of England, as Elector of Hanover. The diet, however, wisely chose to refrain, in present circumstances, from the assumption of a prerogative which they were in no condition to enforce.

This year died the celebrated Prosper Lambertini, who, on his elevation to the papal chair, A. D. 1740, assumed the name of Benedict XIV. The good sense, candour, and moderation of this pontiff made him scarcely less the subject of esteem and veneration in the Protestant than the Catholic states of Europe. Unfortunately, however, his political influence was too weak to enable him to compose those differences by which the respective countries had been so long disgraced and desolated. Far from dwelling upon the sacredness of the claims insisted upon by his predecessors, he used to say, "Let us content ourselves with those privileges and prerogatives which the liberality of the temporal powers is willing to leave us." He was succeeded in the papacy by Cardinal Rezzonico, Bishop of Padua, who took the name of Clement XIII. and who found an early opportunity of displaying his weakness and bigotry, by sending a consecrated banner, accompanied with his apostolic benediction, to the Austrian General, Count Daun.

About this time, an attempt was made on the life of the King of France, by an insane fanatic of the name of Damiens, who, in consequence of his crime, expired in torments; the national sufferance of which, in the view of reason and humanity, deeply degraded the character of the French people.

Assassination, in all its circumstances more extraordinary and interesting, the full extent and mysterious nature of which have never been perfectly developed, was attempted (September 3, 1758) on the person of the King of Portugal, who passing, in his carriage, over a solitary spot near the palace of Belem, was fired at and dangerously wounded by two villains on horseback, one of whom made his escape: the other being put to the torture impeached the Duc d'Aveiro, president of the palace, the Marquis and Marchioness of Tavora, the Count d'Atouguia, and several other persons of the highest rank, as parties in this conspiracy, who were accordingly tried, convicted, and suffered death on the scaffold. As it appeared, from undoubted evidence, that the Jesuits, who had been for some time past in disgrace at court, were the principal instigators to this wicked attempt, the effects and property of the whole order were sequestrated, and a decree of banishment was finally issued against them.

† The expense incurred by England at this time, for the payment of subsidies and the maintenance of armies in Germany alone, exceeded three millions sterling; which immense sum, as well as all the other supplies demanded by the minister, were now voted almost as a matter of course.

‡ In August, this year (1759) an event of great political importance took place in the death of Ferdinand, King of Spain, who, in consequence of the loss of the Queen his consort, had, for many months, renounced all company, neglected all business, and indulged in the utmost excesses of sorrow, under the weight of which he languished without relief or intermission, to the final termination of his life. He was succeeded by his brother Don Carlos, King of the Sicilies—a Prince by no means so favourably disposed as his predecessor to the English nation; and who still harboured a deep resentment of the insult offered to his crown and dignity in the former war, by the threatened bombardment of his capital, and the humiliating treaty of neutrality to which he had been compelled to accede. Previously to his departure from Naples, he, by a solemn edict, resigned the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily to his younger son, Don Ferdinand, in contravention and contempt of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, which expressly declares, that if the infant Don Carlos shall succeed to the throne of Spain, the Duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla shall revert to the house of Austria, and the infant Don Philip shall succeed to the throne of the Sicilies. To this article Don Carlos had never acceded; and the court of Vienna was not at this time in a situation to enforce its observance.

§ During this session, an effort was made to render efficient the Parliamentary qualification act of Queen Anne, by the introduction of a bill, which, with some modifications, eventually passed into a law. By virtue of the new act, it became necessary for every person elected a member of the House of Commons, to deliver in a paper or schedule to the Speaker of the House, specifying the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification.

as a further mark of his resentment, called in council for the council-book, and ordered the name of Lord George Sackville to be struck out of the list of privy counsellors.

This was the last memorable act of the King's reign and life; as on Saturday, the 25th of October, 1760, at the palace of Kensington, where he generally resided, he was suddenly seized with an apoplectic fit, soon after his rising in usual health in the morning. On recovering his senses, after a short interval, he desired, with a faint voice, that his daughter the Princess Amelia might be sent for; but before her arrival he expired, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-fourth of his reign.*

* The character of George the Second it would not be easy to mistake or to misrepresent. It had nothing of that splendid or brilliant cast with which the records of history sometimes present us. Endowed by nature with an understanding by no means comprehensive, his Majesty had taken little pains to improve or expand his original powers by intellectual cultivation. A stranger to learning and to the arts, he witnessed the rapid increase of both, without contributing in the remotest degree to accelerate the progression, or even bestowing, probably, a thought upon the means of their advancement. "Inheriting all the political prejudices of his father—prejudices originating in a partiality natural and pardonable—he was never able to extend his views beyond the advancement of the Germanic balance of power; and resting with unsuspicious satisfaction in that system, into which he had been early initiated, he never rose even to the conception of that simple, dignified, and impartial conduct, which it is equally the honour and interest of Great Britain to maintain in all the complicated contests of the continental states." The grand objects of the two continental wars of this reign was diametrically opposite: in the first, England sought the aggrandisement—in the second, the abasement of the house of Austria. In the internal government of his kingdoms, George the Second appears, however, to much greater advantage than in the contemplation of his system of foreign politics. Though many improper concessions were made by the Parliament to the crown during the course of this reign, no violation of the established laws or liberties of the kingdom can fairly be imputed to the King. The general principles of his administration, both civil and religious, were liberal and just. Those penal statutes which disgrace our judicial code, were, in his reign, meliorated, and virtually suspended, by the mildness and equity of the executive power; and it was a well-known and memorable declaration of his Majesty, "that, during his reign, there should be no persecution for conscience' sake." Though subject to frequent ebullitions of passion, they were transient, and unproductive of serious effects. On various occasions, he had given striking demonstrations of personal bravery; nor did the general tenor of his conduct exhibit proofs less signal of his rectitude and integrity. If he cannot be ranked among the greatest, he is at least entitled to be classed with the most respectable Princes of the age in which he lived: and his memory has been deservedly held in esteem and veneration, by the country at large.

The increase of commerce, during this reign, was very great. In 1727, the year of the accession of George II. the value of our imports was only 6,798,908*l.*; in 1755, they had reached the amount of 9,238,376*l.*; and, in 1760, they amounted to 10,683,595*l.* Our exports, in 1727, were 9,553,048*l.*; in 1755, 12,717,832*l.*; in 1760, 16,665,278*l.* At times, however, our trade was greatly annoyed by French privateers. Between the 1st of June, 1756, and the 1st of June, 1760, they had taken 2589 English ships, including 78 privateers. Within the same period, the English cruisers had captured only 944 French vessels, amongst which were 242 privateers, and many fishing boats, &c. of slight value. The flourishing state of British, and the depressed state of French commerce is believed to have been the cause of this disparity. The facility with which immense loans to government were negociated, furnished an additional proof of our commercial prosperity.

About the middle of this reign, immorality, amongst the lower orders of society, had attained a dreadful height. The very low price of gin enabled the viciously disposed to live in a state of almost continued intoxication; and, according to Smollet, at many houses in London boards were set up, to give public notice, that a person might get drunk for a penny, dead drunk for two pence, and furnished with straw for nothing. In those infamous places of rendezvous, cellars were provided, and littered with straw, into which numbers of intoxicated wretches were dragged, and left crowded together in a state of insensibility, till enabled by sleep to renew the practice of riot and debauchery! However, by judicious regulations respecting distilleries, by taxes on spirituous liquors, licenses to publicans, &c. these enormous evils were checked, and a great melioration of morals effected.

In the higher classes, luxury in dress, in furniture, in equipages, the natural consequence of the increased influx of wealth, displayed itself. The suburbs of London were, during this period, much extended, and adorned with elegant houses. Westminster Bridge was also built, at the expence of 389,000*l.* defrayed by Parliament.

In the early part of this reign a shadow of royal protection and encouragement displayed itself in the countenance given by Queen Caroline—a Princess of an excellent understanding and much liberality of sentiment—to several learned men, with whom she loved freely to converse; especially with Dr. Samuel Clarke, so famous for his theological and metaphysical writings; and whose speculative opinions, on the Trinity, and other points, the Queen was believed to have deeply imbibed. Hoadley, the friend of this distinguished scholar, was advanced, through a long series of promotions, to the Bishopric of Winchester; and Dr. Clarke himself was, it is said, destined, had not his death intervened, to the Archbishopric of Canterbury.

At a subsequent period, the Prince of Wales, also, showed a disposition to patronize literature; and Mallet, Thomson, and Young are said to have been particularly distinguished by his bounty. The most truly poetical genius of this reign was Gray; but his powers were not indebted to the sunshine of popular and courtly encouragement. In the drama, no tragedies appeared which could stand in competition with the productions of Otway, Southern, or Rowe. In comedy, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar remained unrivalled; and, of the far greater part of the numerous dramatic pieces of this period it may be affirmed, in the words of Dryden, that "the tragic muse gave smiles; the comic sleep." In one department of literature, however, the reign of George II. may boast a decided and indisputable superiority; as, in history, the names of Hume and Robertson will ever claim distinguished praise. In metaphysics, Hartley established a system admirable for its simplicity, for the extent and importance of its practical application, and its perfect correspondence with all the actual phenomena of human nature, upon the firm and immoveable foundation of Locke. In philology, morals, and criticism, Bentley, Warburton, and Johnson, shone with distinguished brilliancy; and, in theology, amidst a host of great and respectable names, the highest applause is due to that of Lardner, who, unassisted by the advantages, and unadorned by the honours, of academical education, composed a stupendous work on the credibility of Christianity, no less to be admired for its candour, impartiality, and sagacious spirit of research, than its amazing extent and depth of erudition. Foster, Leland, Chandler, Abernethy, Duchal, and many other eminent names, not of the established church, maintained also, with distinguished honour to themselves, the reputation of their separate communion, and the authority of that common faith which all denominations of Christians are equally concerned to support. In the establishment, the venerable Lowth distinguished himself above all his cotemporaries, by adorning the profoundest disquisitions in sacred literature with all the charms of classic elegance; and the excellent Jortin, in the justness and comprehension of his views, the clearness and accuracy of his reasonings, attained to high, if not unrivalled eminence. His "Remarks on Ecclesiastical History" abound with the most candid and liberal sentiments; and his "Life of Erasmus" discovers a mind perfectly congenial with that of the illustrious scholar whose portrait he has delineated. Before the conclusion of this reign, Reynolds, in painting, and Wilton, in sculpture, began to rise into fame; and the exquisite musical compositions of Handel were vigorously and successfully emulated by Arne and Boyce. Several public institutions also evinced the improving taste of the people. The British Museum, at Montague House; the Antiquarian Society; the Society for the encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce; the Marine Society, &c. all date their establishment from the reign of George II. It was not, however, to the court, or to any dignified Mæcenas of the age, but to the liberal spirit of the nation, that literature and the arts were at this period indebted for the patronage which they enjoyed.

His Majesty George II. was buried in Henry the VII.th's chapel, a Westminster. His only sons were Frederic, Prince of Wales (father of George III.) who died March 20, 1751; and William, Duke of Cumberland, who died in September, 1790. His daughters were:—Anne, who became Princess of Orange; Amelia, who died unmarried, in 1786; Elizabeth, whom her father survived; Mary, the wife of the late Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; and Louisa, who became Queen of Denmark.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE III. FROM ITS COMMENCEMENT, TO THE GENERAL PEACE OF 1783.

32. GEORGE III.

A. D. 1760.] THE patriotic reader will contemplate, with high and unbounded interest, the reign of George the Third; for, in no period of history, have our annals been rendered so important, by so many wonderful revolutions; never, since Britain was first acknowledged as a nation, has her commercial prosperity, her glory in arms, or her political weight and consequence, in the affairs of Europe, and of the world, attained so towering, so stupendous a height. Auspicious, in its commencement; bright, and dazzling, in its progress; sublime, and beautiful, in its results; its close may be anticipated, as that of an autumnal sun, sinking beneath the horizon in soft and tranquil glory!

Born in England, the youthful monarch was doubly dear to his people. Educated in virtue and religion, and in the principles of a patriot King, his accession was hailed, by the country, as the first of public blessings.—George II. having died on the Saturday, it was not until Monday, (October the 27th), that the new sovereign assembled a council,* and was proclaimed King. Parliament, which, agreeably to the provision of an act passed for that purpose, continued to exercise its functions for a period of six months after the death of the sovereign, met on the 18th of November, when his Majesty delivered a speech from the throne, eminently calculated to confirm all the fond and flattering prepossessions of the public in his favour.†

A. D. 1761.] The supplies demanded for the prosecution of the war amounted to nineteen millions, of which twelve

* At this meeting of the Privy Council, Edward, Duke of York, the King's eldest brother, was sworn a member; as was also his Majesty's favourite, the Earl of Bute. On the same day, the name of the Duke of Cumberland was ordered, by the council, to be struck out of the Liturgy. This was treated as a matter of etiquette; but, to some, it gave serious offence. Soon afterwards, the Princess Amelia, the only unmarried daughter of the late King, was prevailed upon, in consideration of a pension of 1200*l.* per annum, to resign the rangership of Richmond Park, in favour of the Earl of Bute.

† This memorable speech was as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The just concern which I have felt in my own breast on the sudden death of the late King, my royal grandfather, makes me not doubt but you must all have been deeply affected with so severe a loss. The present critical and difficult conjuncture has made this loss the more sensible, as he was the great support of that system by which alone the liberties of Europe, and the weight and influence of these kingdoms, can be preserved, and gave life to the measures conducive to those important ends. I need not tell you the addition of weight which immediately falls upon me, in being called to the government of this free and powerful country at such a time, and under such circumstances. My consolation is in the uprightness of my own intentions, your faithful and united assistance, and the blessing of Heaven upon our joint endeavours, which I devoutly implore.

"Born and educated in this country, I glory in the name of Briton; and the peculiar happiness of my life will ever consist in promoting the welfare of a people, whose loyalty and warm affection to me I consider as the greatest and most permanent security of my throne; and I doubt not but their steadiness in those principles will equal the firmness of my invariable resolution to adhere to and strengthen this excellent constitution in church and state, and to maintain the toleration inviolable. The civil and religious rights of my loving subjects are equally dear to me with the most valuable prerogatives of my crown; and as the surest foundation of the whole, and the best means to draw down the Divine favour on my reign, it is my fixed purpose to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue.

"I reflect with pleasure on the successes with which the British arms have been prospered this last summer. The total reduction of the vast province of Canada, with the city of Montreal, is of the most interesting consequence, and must be as heavy a blow to my enemies as it is a conquest glorious to us; the more glorious, because effected almost without effusion of blood, and with that humanity which makes an amiable part of the character of this nation.

"Our advantages gained in the East Indies have been signal, and must greatly diminish the strength and trade of France in those parts, as well as procure the most solid benefits to the commerce and wealth of my subjects.

"In Germany, where the whole French force has been employed, the combined army under the wise and able conduct of my General Prince Ferdinand, has not only stopped their progress, but has gained advantages over them notwithstanding their boasted superiority, and their not having hitherto come to a general engagement.

"My good brother and ally the King of Prussia, although surrounded with numerous armies of enemies, has, with a magnanimity and perseverance almost beyond example, not only withstood their various attacks, but has obtained very considerable victories over them. Of these events I shall say no more at this time, because the nature of the war in those parts has kept the campaign there still depending.

"As my navy is the principal article of our natural strength, it gives me much satisfaction to receive it in such good condition, whilst the fleet of France is weakened to such a degree, that the small remains of it have continued blocked up by my ships in their own ports. At the same time the French trade is reduced to the lowest ebb, and with joy of heart I see the commerce of my kingdoms, that great source of our riches, and fixed object of my never-failing care and protection, flourishing to an extent unknown in any former war.

"The valour and intrepidity of my officers and forces, both at sea and land, have been distinguished so much to the glory of this nation, that I should be wanting in justice to them, if I did not acknowledge it. This is a merit which I shall constantly encourage and reward; and I take this occasion to declare, that the zealous and useful service of the militia in the present arduous conjuncture is very acceptable to me.

"In this state I have found things at my accession to the throne of my ancestors; happy in viewing the prosperous part of it; happier still should I have been, had I found my kingdoms, whose true interest I have entirely at heart, in full peace: but since the ambition, injurious encroachments, and dangerous designs of my enemies rendered the war both just and necessary, and the generous overture made last winter towards a congress or a pacification has not yet produced a suitable return, I am determined, with your cheerful and powerful assistance, to prosecute this war with vigour, in order to that desirable object, a safe and honourable peace. For this purpose it is absolutely incumbent upon us to be early prepared, and I rely upon your zeal and hearty concurrence to support the King of Prussia, and the rest of my allies, and to make ample provision for carrying on the war, as the only means to bring our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The great uneasiness which I feel at this time is, in considering the uncommon burdens necessarily brought upon my faithful subjects. I desire only such supplies as shall be requisite to prosecute the war with advantage, be adequate to the necessary services, and that they may be provided for in the most sure and effectual manner. You may depend upon the faithful and punctual application of what shall be granted. I have ordered the proper estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you; and also an account of the extraordinary expences which, from the nature of the different and remote operations, have been unavoidably incurred. It is with peculiar reluctance that I am obliged, at such a time, to mention any thing which personally regards myself; but as the grant of the greatest part of the civil list revenues is now determined, I trust in your duty and affection to me, to make the proper provision for supporting my civil twelve millions were funded at a high interest, were freely granted.* The civil list was fixed at the clear annual sum of 800,000*l.* payable out of the aggregate fund, in lieu of the hereditary and other specific revenues settled on the late King.†

On the 19th of March the Parliament was prorogued, and in a short time dissolved by proclamation, and a new Parliament convened.‡ Previously to the prorogation, however, very alarming commotions took place in several of the northern counties, owing to the expiration of the three years' term of service, prescribed by the militia act, and the new ballot about to take place. At Hexham, in Northumberland, the justices being assembled for the purpose of enforcing the act, the populace, regarding this military compulsion as a tyrannical and insupportable grievance, collected to the number of many thousands, armed with clubs and other offensive weapons, with which they assaulted the guard of soldiers stationed for the protection of the magistrates. The riot act was read without effect, and they were proceeding to still greater outrages, when the military received orders to fire upon the assailants, more than forty of whom were killed on the spot, and about three hundred wounded, among whom were many women and children: several of the rioters were in the sequel apprehended, tried, and executed. By the exertion of military force, a general submission was at length obtained.

Before the close of the summer, the King declared in council his resolution to demand in marriage the Princess Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburgh Strelitz; and the Earl of Harcourt being appointed ambassador plenipotentiary to the court of Strelitz, the contract of marriage was speedily signed, and the Princess conducted to Stade, whence she embarked on board one of the royal yachts and arrived at the palace of St. James's, September 8th. The nuptial ceremony was the same evening performed in the chapel royal; and on the 22d of September the coronation of their Majesties was publicly celebrated. The new Queen soon acquired great popularity by the sweetness and affability of her manners.§

The war was still carried on with vigour and success. In June the island of Dominique, important from its situation, between the islands of Martinico and Guadaloupe, was reduced with little difficulty or loss by an armament commanded by Sir James Douglas, and a body of troops under Lord Rollo; and a more hazardous enterprise was undertaken about the same time against the island of Belleisle, opposite the harbour of Vannes, on the coast of Bretagne. The island was defended by a strong fortress, constructed by Vauban, near the town of Palais. On the first debarkation of the troops, they met with a severe repulse, being compelled precipitately to retreat with the loss of near five hundred men. The English commanders, General Hodgson and Commodore Keppel, however, secure of the zeal and ardour of their troops, rendered bold and sanguine by a long continuance of prosperity, determined to make another effort; and a body of marines and grenadiers, making good their landing on the craggy point of Lomeria, sustained their position against a superior force, till joined by the remaining troops, amounting to eight or ten thousand men. M. de St. Croix, the French commander, then recalled his detachments, and prepared for a vigorous defence of the citadel, the avenues to which he had fortified with six additional redoubts, which, with much effusion of blood, were successively carried by the English, who now urged with the most persevering ardour the siege of the citadel. On the 7th of June a practicable breach having been made, and a general assault being apprehended on government with honour and dignity. On my part, you may be assured of a regular and becoming economy.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The eyes of all Europe are upon you. From your resolution, the Protestant interest hopes for protection, as well as all our friends for the preservation of their independency; and our enemies feel the final disappointment of their ambitious and destructive views. Let these hopes and fears be confirmed and augmented by the vigour, unanimity, and dispatch of your proceedings. In this expectation I am the more encouraged by a pleasing circumstance, which I look upon as one of the most auspicious omens of my reign. That happy extinction of divisions, and that union and good harmony which continue to prevail amongst my subjects, afford me the most agreeable prospect. The natural disposition and wish of my heart are, to cement and promote them; and I promise myself that nothing will arise, on your part, to interrupt or disturb a situation so essential to the true and lasting felicity of this great people."

* The sum of 200,000*l.* was voted by the Commons, in consequence of an express message from the throne, as a compensation to the several provinces of America for the extraordinary expences incurred by them in their vigorous and strenuous efforts during the present war, and which the Parliament virtually acknowledged by this grant to be more than adequate to their proportional ability.

† Nearly at the close of the session, a popular measure was recommended from the throne. Notwithstanding the act passed in the reign of King William, by which the commissions of the judges were continued during their good behaviour, their offices determined at the demise of the crown. No instance had occurred since the Revolution, in which a judge had been removed at the accession of a new sovereign; but the King, now declared, that he considered the independency and uprightness of the judges as essential to the impartial administration of justice, and one of the best securities of the liberty of the subject, as well as conducive to the honour of the crown. He therefore recommended that such farther provision should be made for securing the judges in the enjoyment of their offices, and the permanency of their salaries annexed to them, notwithstanding such demise, as should be thought expedient. The Commons acknowledged, in a very loyal address, their grateful sense of his Majesty's attention to an object so interesting to his people: and a bill framed for the purpose passed both Houses.

Mr. Onslow, who had occupied for more than thirty years the office of Speaker in five succeeding Parliaments, now bending beneath the weight of years and infirmities, declared his determination to retire from public business. The House, affected at the prospect of this separation, immediately and unanimously voted their thanks to him; and, in consequence of an address from the House, to the King, a pension of 3000*l.* per annum was granted him for his own life and that of his son, afterwards ennobled by the title of Lord Onslow.

‡ On the very day of the dissolution, Mr. Legge was dismissed from his office of Chancellor of the Exchequer; two days after which Lord Holderness, having secured an ample pecuniary indemnification, together with the reversion of the wardenship of the Cinque Ports, resigned the seals, which were immediately delivered to the Earl of Bute, who appointed the well-known Charles Jenkinson, his under secretary. Mr. Legge, it appears, had given some offence to the King when Prince of Wales, by his conduct at the last general election. Notwithstanding the advancement of the Earl of Bute, the entire management of foreign affairs remained with Mr. Pitt, matters not being yet mature for a total change: and the fall of Mr. Legge seemed to give little alarm, and made no visible alteration in the political system. He was succeeded by Lord Barrington, a nobleman attached to the Pelham interest.

§ It has been said, that his Majesty received the first intimation of the extraordinary qualities of the Princess from the following letter, which she wrote to the King of Prussia on his entering the territories of her cousin, the Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz, and which that monarch transmitted to his late Majesty (George II.) as a prodigy of patriotism and good sense in so young a Princess:—

"May it please your Majesty,

"I am at a loss whether I shall congratulate or condole with you on your late victory; since the same success that crowns you with laurels, has overspread the country of Mecklenburg with desolation. I know, Sir, that it seems unbecoming my sex, in this age of vicious refinement, to feel for one's country, to lament the horrors of war, or wish for the return of peace. I know you may think it more properly my province to study the arts of pleasing, or to turn my thoughts to subjects of a more domestic nature; but however unbecoming it may be in me, I cannot resist the desire of interceding for this unhappy people.

"It was but a very few years ago that this territory wore the most pleasing aspect. The country was cultivated, the peasants looked chearful, and the towns abounded with riches and fertility. What an alteration at present from such a charming scene! I am not expert at description, nor can my fancy add any horrors to the picture; but sure, even conquerors themselves would weep at the hideous prospect now before me. The whole country, my dear country, is one frightful waste, presenting only objects to excite terror, pity, and despair. The business of the husbandman and the shepherd is quite discontinued; the husbandman and the shepherd are become soldiers themselves, and help to ravage the soil they formerly occupied. The towns are inhabited only by old men, women, and children; perhaps here and there a warrior, by wounds or loss of limbs, rendered unfit for service, left at his door; but little children hang round him, ask a history of every wound, and grow themselves soldiers, before they find strength for the field. But this were nothing, did we not feel the alternate insolence of either army, as it happens to advance or retreat. It is impossible to express the confusion, which even those who call themselves our friends, excite. Even those from whom we might expect redress, oppress us with new calamities. From your justice, therefore, it is that we may hope for relief; to you even children and women may complain, whose humanity stoops to the meanest petition, and whose power is capable of repressing the greatest injustice.

"I am, Sire, &c."

the part of M. de St. Croix, that officer obtained a capitulation, on the most honourable conditions. These triumphs were damped by no reverse of fortune, excepting that which arose from the success of a small squadron cruising in the Indian seas, commanded by the Count d'Estaing, an officer of great activity and courage, who had made himself master of the English fort and factory of Bender Abassi in the gulf of Persia, taking two frigates, and three other vessels belonging to the company. He also attacked and captured the settlement of Ben-Coolen in the island of Sumatra, where he made a great booty.

The campaign of 1760 having terminated disastrously for France, whose finances were now reduced to a state of most distressing derangement, the French ambassador residing at Stockholm delivered a declaration to the Swedish monarch in February, 1761, importing his sovereign's "earnest desire to adopt effectual measures for restoring the peace of Europe;—that in concerting with his allies a general plan of pacification, he was disposed abundantly to display his moderation whenever Great Britain should be inclined to acquiesce in reasonable terms;—that in consequence of the expences and calamities attendant on the war, he was constrained to lessen his subsidies; and should the war continue, he could no longer promise an exact compliance with the letter of his engagements." In March a memorial was transmitted by the hands of Prince Gallitzin, the Russian ambassador at the court of London, from the Duc de Choiseul, prime minister of France, to Mr. secretary Pitt, signifying the firm determination of his most Christian Majesty so to act, in concert with his allies, at the proposed congress, at Augsburg, as to demonstrate his sincere disposition to promote the interests of humanity, and restore the peace of Europe. His most Christian Majesty expressed his desire "that the particular accommodation between France and England should be united with the general pacification of Europe; but as the objects of the war between these two powers were totally foreign to the disputes in Germany, he thought it would be previously necessary to agree with his Britannic Majesty upon certain principal points which should form the basis of their particular negotiation." These advances were favourably received; and in the month of May, Mr. Stanley repaired to Paris on the part of the King of Great Britain: and M. Bussy was received from the court of France at St. James's. The instructions of M. Bussy were to adhere to the uti possidetis, or state of actual possession, as the basis of the negotiation; to demand an explanation of his Britannic Majesty's sentiments touching the dates or æras at which the proposal should take place: and in the conferences which ensued, the French minister continued to press the specification of those dates. But the English minister evaded the discussion of this point until the surrender of the citadel of Belleisle: and then a declaration was made, in explicit terms, that the 1st of July, the 1st of September, and the 1st of November next, should be the established æras in Europe, the West Indies, and the East Indies; after which all the conquests made on either side should be mutually restored; that the preliminaries agreed upon between the two crowns should be conclusive and obligatory, independent of the negotiations of Augsburg for settling the peace of Germany. France at length professed her willingness to cede and guarantee Canada to the crown of England, on condition of her being admitted to a participation, as formerly, of the cod-fishery on the banks of Newfoundland; and insisting also upon the restitution of the island of Cape Breton, as an equivalent for which, France consented to a renewal of the article in the treaties of Utrecht and Aix-la-Chapelle, for the demolition of the harbour and works of Dunkirk; that in lieu of the island of Minorca, England should restore Guadaloupe and Marigalante; and that in consideration of the restitution of Belleisle and Senegal, or Goree, France would evacuate her conquests in Germany. Touching the captures made by England at sea, previously to the declaration of war, his most Christian Majesty declared that "he would gladly submit to the justice of the King of England, and the determination of the English courts of judicature: that subjects trading under the faith of treaties, and the protection of the law of nations, ought not to suffer from the misunderstandings which may arise in the cabinets of Princes, before those misunderstandings are publicly known: that the practice of declaring war was established by the law of nations as essential to the general safety: that no seizure made, or prize taken, anterior to such declaration, could be deemed legal, without violating the most sacred of human institutions: that no sort of affinity subsisted between hostilities committed on the Ohio and ships taken in the West Indies: that such hostilities might indeed be alledged as just motives for declaring war, but the effects of that declaration ought not to precede the declaration itself—and that it would be the height of injustice thus to involve innocent individuals, ignorant of the disputes of monarchs, or the affairs of nations, in the depth of distress and ruin, by the indiscriminate confiscation of their property." With this memorial, M. de Bussy delivered to the English minister another, importing "that the disputes subsisting between England and Spain gave his most Christian Majesty cause to apprehend a new war in Europe and America, unless they could be now adjusted: that his Catholic Majesty had communicated to the courts of Versailles the chief points of discussion, namely, the restitution of some ships taken in the course of the war under Spanish colours, the liberty claimed by the Spanish nation to fish on the banks of Newfoundland, and the settlements made by the English on the Spanish territories in the Bay of Honduras. His most Christian Majesty, therefore, passionately desired, that these differences might be amicably terminated, and that the King of Spain should be invited to guarantee the treaty between the two crowns; because, if these differences were the means of kindling a new war, the most Christian King would be obliged to perform his engagements to his allies." These memorials were accompanied with a third declaration, signifying that the Empress Queen had consented to a separate peace between England and France on these terms only: that France should for her benefit keep possession of the countries conquered in her name, and as her ally, from the King of Prussia; and that the King of Great Britain should no longer afford assistance either in money or troops to the King of Prussia, in like manner as France should be restricted with respect to the Empress Queen. The resentment of the court of London at this unexpected interposition seemed to know no bounds; and Mr. Pitt declared, to M. Bussy, that the King of Great Britain would not suffer the disputes with Spain to be mixed, in any shape whatsoever, with the negotiations for peace now pending with France, and that all further mention of such an idea would be considered as offensive to his dignity. M. de Bussy was also informed, that the King of England had ordered the memorial concerning Spain to be returned as totally inadmissible; and also the memorial relating to the King of Prussia, as affecting the honour of Great Britain, and the unshaken fidelity with which his Majesty would fulfil his engagements with his allies. The court of Versailles, now sensible of the ill consequences that might result from this false step, condescended to apologise for proposing a discussion of the points in dispute with Spain, and declared her readiness to make new concessions for the purpose of accomplishing the desirable end of general pacification. A paper was consequently transmitted to Mr. Stanley, containing the ultimatum of the English court—insisting upon the entire cession of Canada and its dependencies; of Cape Breton and the other islands in the Gulf of St. Laurence; of the settlements of Goree and Senegal, in Africa; a partition of the neutral islands; the restoration of Minorca; the demolition of Dunkirk; satisfaction to the East India company; the evacuation of Ostend and Nieuport; the restitution of Cleves, Wesel, Gueldres; and, in general, of all the territories belonging to the King of Prussia and the other allies of of Great Britain. The King of England also left himself at full liberty to assist his Prussian Majesty according to the terms of the subsisting treaties. With respect to the prizes taken after the commencement of hostilities, though before the formality of declaring war, his Britannic Majesty persisted in his opinion, that such a demand on the part of France was neither just nor defensible. Should France comply with these propositions, the court of London declared its readiness to restore to France her conquests of Belleisle and Guadaloupe, and to admit the subjects of his most Christian Majesty to a participation of the Newfoundland fishery, agreeably to the thirteenth article of the treaty of Utrecht, and to cede the small island of St. Pierre, on certain conditions, as a harbour for the fishermen. To these terms, severe as they were, France acceded, with little variation, excepting that she refused to recede from her claim of restitution respecting the capture of merchant ships captured previously to the declaration of war. To this refusal, the court of London deigned not to reply; and the ministers Stanley and Bussy, this ineffectual negotiation being at length terminated, respectively returned.

Although the memorial respecting Spain had been withdrawn, and France had declared that the offence given to the English court was perfectly unintentional, much anger and resentment were shewn against the court of Madrid; the English minister transmitting instructions to the Earl of Bristol, the ambassador of England at the court of Spain, to require from his Catholic Majesty an explicit declaration as to the authority by which the French minister acted, in presenting a memorial in the name of the King of Spain; and in case it should be avowed by the court of Madrid, to remonstrate with energy and firmness against the unexampled irregularity of such proceedings, and to declare his Majesty's immovable determination not to add facilities for the satisfaction of that court, in consideration of any intimation on the part of a hostile power of union in councils, or of present or future conjunctions.* The Earl of Bristol, who appears to have conducted himself with great ability and address, informed Mr. Pitt, in his reply (dated August 31, 1761,) that immediately on the receipt of the dispatches from England, he had waited on the Spanish minister Don Ricardo Wall, at St. Ildefonso, and, in the most explicit, and at the same time in the least offensive mode, executed the orders contained in them. In reply, General Wall affirmed that the King of Spain, "with a view merely to render the peace more permanent, and without the least intention to give offence to his Britannic Majesty, had assented to the proposal made by the most Christian King for the joint accommodation of their differences with great Britain." As to the differences which had arisen between England and Spain respecting the capture of the Spanish ships during the war, the General allowed they would admit of an easy accommodation. The court of Spain, however, thought that the refusal of the English court to enter into any negociation respecting the claim of Spain to fish on the banks of Newfoundland was violent and harsh, especially as coupled with the absolute determination of England not to relinquish her acknowledged usurpations on the coast of Honduras, except his Catholic Majesty would previously assure to them the right, to which they pretended, of cutting logwood within that territory. In subsequent dispatches, of September and October, the Earl of Bristol informed the court of London, "that umbrage had been taken by the court of Madrid at the additional fortifications reported to be going forward at Gibraltar, and that General Wall had asked, if it were possible that England could be seriously apprehensive of a rupture with Spain; affirming, that at no time had the Catholic King been more intent upon cultivating a good understanding with his Britannic Majesty than at the present; that the flota had arrived at Cadiz, but that the treasure belonging to the crown was much less than had been expected; that great abuses and malversations had been charged against the Spanish viceroys and governors in the West Indies; and that his Catholic Majesty's ministers had strongly suggested t him the impracticability of reforming effectually the old defective system of government, should the court of Madrid embroil itself in the present troubles of Europe: that the Spanish minister, Don Ricardo, urged the evacuation of the more recent settlements on the Honduras coast, which he said would serve as a salvo for the honour of Spain, and greatly facilitate the final adjustment of her differences with England. "General Wall," observes the Earl, "has ever acted in too ingenuous a manner for me to suspect the least duplicity in his conduct." The ambassador added, that, "on the notification of the King's marriage to the court of Madrid, he was particularly enjoined to assure the King of England of the share his Catholic Majesty would ever take in all events that contributed to his happiness—that the Spanish minister expressed a thorough concern at the breaking off the conferences between the courts of Versailles and London; and said it was the opinion in Spain, that the French ministers had gone as great lengths in concessions as could be expected, considering the engagements of France with her allies."

Before the arrival of the last mentioned dispatches, Mr. Pitt was no longer minister. Having received certain intelligence that a treaty of alliance had recently been concluded between France and Spain, and being firmly persuaded that the articles of this treaty were inimical to Great Britain, and that Spain waited only the favourable moment to act openly against her, he strongly urged in council the policy and necessity of an immediate declaration of war against that power; and recommended that a strong squadron should be immediately sent to the Mediterranean, to intercept the flota actually on its passage from Carthagena to Cadiz. In this opinion he was supported only by his brother-in-law, Earl Temple, Lord Privy-Seal; and finding his influence in the cabinet at an end, he resigned the seals, October 9, 1761.† The King granted him a pension of 3000*l.* per annum, and his lady (Lady Hester Pitt, sister to Earl Temple), was created Baroness of Chatham, with remainder to her heirs male, Mr. Pitt in his own person declining the honours of the peerage.

The resignation of Mr. Pitt did not, however, appear to effect any change in the conduct of public affairs; and, after considerable negociation with the court of Spain, letters of marque were issued, and commissions granted for privateers to act against the subjects of his Catholic Majesty; and, on the 4th of January, 1762, war was declared against Spain in the accustomed manner.

Parliament having been convened in the preceding month of November, had chosen Sir John Cust, Baronet, for their Speaker; and the session was opened by a speech from the throne, in which his Majesty expressed "his regret at the unsuccessful termination of the late negociation for peace, and his resolution to prosecute the war in the most effectual manner, till the enemies of Great Britain, moved by their own losses, and touched with the miseries of so many nations, shall yield to the equitable conditions of an honourable peace." Loyal addresses were returned; about 240,000 seamen, landmen, and marines, including the German mercenaries, were voted for the service of the year; twelve millions were borrowed to make up the deficiency of the regular means of supply; a jointure of 100,000*l.* per annum was settled on the Queen, with the palaces of

* In relation to the three points stated in the memorial, Mr. Pitt declared it sufficient to say respecting the first, viz. the seizure of certain ships under Spanish colours, "that the courts instituted for the cognizance of such matters are open to the parties who think fit to seek redress in due course of law. As to the obsolete pretensions of Spain to fish on the banks of Newfoundland, no concession in a matter so sacred would be even thought of. With regard to the disputes relating to the logwood coasts, his Britannic Majesty was willing to receive any just overtures on the part of his Catholic Majesty, provided they were not conveyed through the channel of France. And he concluded with professing his expectation that the court of Madrid would come to some explicit eclaircissement as to the destination of her fleets, and with respect to her disposition to maintain and cultivate friendship and good correspondence with Great Britain."

† Mr. Pitt was succeeded in the office of Secretary of State by the Earl of Egremont, son of the celebrated Sir William Windham.

Richmond Old Park and Somerset House; and, after passing various acts, the Parliament was prorogued on the 2d of June.

About the close of 1761, a plan had been formed for the conquest of the important island of Martinico, the principal of the French Caribbee islands, and the residence of the Governor-General and council, whose jurisdiction extends over all the French Antilles. This island was accounted the most populous and flourishing colony belonging to France in America. The armament destined for this expedition consisted of 18 ships of the line, and as many battalions of troops, under General Monckton and Admiral Sir George Rodney, who, rendezvousing at Barbadoes, proceeded early in the month of January (1762) to Martinico; and on the 16th landed, after silencing the batteries erected on the coast in the vicinity of the town of Fort Royal, defended by a strong citadel and various military works erected on the Morne Tortueson and the Morne Garnier, neighbouring heights which commanded the town. These were soon forced by the intrepidity of the English troops; and on the 4th of February, the commandant capitulated, and the garrison was permitted to march out with the honours of war. The Governor-General, M. de la Touche, retreated to the strong fortress of St. Pierre, situated to the leeward of Fort Royal, which he at first seemed disposed to defend with vigour; but on the 14th deputies arrived with proposals of capitulation for the whole island, and this important conquest was achieved with inconsiderable loss. Commodore Swanton was detached from the fleet with a force sufficient for the reduction of the island of Grenada and the Grenadines, which submitted without resistance, and proved in the hands of the English a very valuable acquisition; and, at the same time the English took possession of the islands of St. Lucia, Tobago, and St. Vincent, which, though declared neutral by former treaties, had been for some time occupied by the French.

In one quarter only could England at this time be considered as vulnerable. By an attack on Portugal, a kingdom in close alliance with Great Britain, Spain might hope to indemnify herself for any losses she might elsewhere sustain. On the 16th of March, a joint memorial was therefore presented by the ambassadors of France and Spain, at Lisbon, inviting the King of Portugal to renounce his connection with Great Britain, and engage in the offensive and defensive alliance which they had formed against that "insolent and dangerous power." The Catholic King, professing "the most cordial attachment to the interests of his most faithful Majesty, to whom he was so nearly allied, insisted that the English subjects resident in Portugal should be compelled to depart the kingdom, and the English shipping no longer be allowed shelter in her ports; declaring, that he should immediately occupy with his troops the fortresses and maritime places belonging to his most faithful Majesty, to protect them from the resentment of England." To this requisition, the King of Portugal replied, "That he was sincerely disposed to act as mediator in compromising the present differences, but that the unfortunate state of his kingdom would not allow him, were he so inclined, to engage as a principal in the war; that the honour of his crown, and the faith of solemn treaties, would not permit him to abandon the alliance of England; and that he was determined to observe a strict neutrality, making those preparations only which were necessary for his own defence." In a second memorial, (dated April 1,) the confederate powers declared, in a still higher tone, "That his most faithful Majesty's alliance with England became in effect an offensive alliance, from the situation of the Portuguese dominions, and the nature of the English power; that the British squadrons could not keep the sea without the use of the ports of his most faithful Majesty; that the riches of Portugal passed into the hands of the English; and they again invited him, since the differences between the crowns of Spain and Portugal, which had laid the foundation of the alliance with England, had been long since happily accommodated, to abandon that alliance, and enter into a strict league of alliance and friendship with their Christian and Catholic Majesties." The King of Portugal, generously persisting in his refusal of these overtures, the ambassadors of the two courts, after the delivery of a third memorial, still more insolent than the former, were ordered to depart; and, on the 23d of May, war was declared by Spain against Portugal, the Spanish army having already passed the frontier.

His most faithful Majesty having made urgent solicitation to the court of London for assistance, it was determined to grant him the most speedy and efficacious succour, by the embarkation of a large body of troops under Lord Tyrawley, a veteran officer, who had formerly resided with high reputation as ambassador at the court of Lisbon, and who now united the different characters of plenipotentiary and general.* Early in May, the Spanish army, under the Marquis de Sarria, passed the Douro, and invested the important city of Miranda. At the commencement of the siege, however, the grand magazine of the fortress taking fire, blew up with a tremendous explosion, occasioning the loss of nearly 500 lives, and making two large and practicable breaches in the walls. In consequence, the city was immediately given up, and the garrison made prisoners of war. Braganza being next attacked, the keys of the town were delivered without any attempt at resistance; and the city of Chaves, though provided with all the means of defence, was surprised at the same time by a separate detachment under Count O'Reilly. The southern army, commanded by the Count d'Aranda, being joined by 8000 French auxiliaries, entered the province of Estremadura, and opened the trenches before Almeida in July; but, after a much better defence than had hitherto been made, that city was compelled to capitulate on the 25th of August. On the arrival of the Count de la Lippe, Lisbon, the metropolis, and Oporto, the second city of the kingdom, were exposed to imminent danger; but that General prudently determined to carry the arms of Portugal into the kingdom of Spain; and, an enterprise against the city of Alcantara, where considerable magazines were forming, having been resolved upon, Brigadier-General Burgoyne was appointed to the command of the entire force collected for that purpose. Passing the Tagus at midnight, this officer reached Alcantara at the dawn of day, and, attacking the enemy posted in the vicinity, he totally routed them with considerable loss; much arms and ammunition falling into his hands. The Count d'Aranda, having reduced, after the surrender of Almeida, the fortresses of Castel Rodrigo and Castel Branco, attempted to force a passage through the mountains, intending to cross the Tagus at Villa Velha, a post defended by General Burgoyne, who lay encamped on the southern bank of the river. The old Moorish castle of Villa Velha, on the northern bank, though gallantly defended, was at length compelled to surrender, and the passes of the mountains were gained; but the enemy having weakened their force at Villa Velha, in order to pursue their advantage in the opposite quarter, General Burgoyne ordered a detachment under Lieutenant Colonel Lee to ford the Tagus in the night, and attack the Spaniards in their camp. This enterprise was successfully executed. A great number of the Spanish officers were slain in attempting to rally their troops; their cannon were spiked, their magazines destroyed, and much valuable plunder became the property of the assailants. The Spaniards being repeatedly foiled in their design of passing the Tagus, and embarrassed also in their operations by the heavy rains which fell at this period, at length repassed the mountains, and entirely evacuated the province of Estremadura, first dismantling the fortifications of Castel Rodrigo and Almeida.

* The King of Portugal, at the recommendation of the King of England, had conferred the chief command of his armies on Count de la Lippe-Buckebourg, Master-General of the artillery under Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick; a man whose talents were of the first order. Lord Tyrawley returning to England, probably in disgust at this appointment, the command of the English auxiliaries devolved on the Earl of Loudon, under whom served the Generals Burgoyne, Crawford, Townshend, &c.

As soon as war had been declared by England against Spain, preparations began to be made for a grand enterprise; and, in the beginning of March, 1762, a very powerful armament sailed from Portsmouth, under the conduct of Admiral Sir George Pococke, the Earl of Albemarle commanding the land forces on board. Early in June, they arrived off the island of Cuba, and the troops were landed six miles to the eastward of the Havannah.* Protected by a very strong castle called the Moro, against which the principal attack of the Earl of Albemarle was directed, this city was bravely defended; and the siege having been protracted beyond expectation, sickness began to make its ravages amongst the besiegers. On the 30th of July, therefore, although the breaches made were deemed scarcely practicable, an assault was determined upon, and the troops, mounting with the utmost intrepidity, drove the enemy from the ramparts of the castle, and, after a short but fierce and bloody conflict, the Spaniards were compelled to lay down their arms and petition for quarter. The commandant, animated with all the genuine Castilian heroism, fell by a promiscuous shot, whilst inciting his troops to support the glory of the Spanish arms. The city, however, held out till the 13th of August, when it capitulated, on condition of being allowed to march out with all the honours of war, and to have, for its whole garrison, a free and unmolested conveyance to Spain. In the capitulation were included twelve line-of-battle ships then lying in the harbour of the Havannah. Great quantities of ammunition and warlike stores likewise fell into the hands of the victors, who found in the city prodigious quantities of merchandize of various kinds, and an immense treasure, in money.

As soon as the intelligence of the Spanish war was conveyed to the East Indies, an armament was speedily equipped, under the conduct of Admiral Cornish, and Sir William Draper, and sailed from Madras, destined against Luconia, the principal of the Philippine islands, of which the chief city is Manilla, whence two large ships are sent annually across the Pacific Ocean to Acapulco, on the coast of Mexico, laden with the spices, silks, and other precious products of India. On the 23d of September (1762) the whole armament, having on board a land force, including lascars, and other irregular troops, amounting to about 2,500 men, anchored in the bay of Manilla, where they excited great and general alarm. After effecting a landing with little loss, the city was summoned to surrender; but the Marquis de Villa Medina, the governor, returned a resolute refusal. The weather soon grew stormy and tempestuous; but the besiegers carried on their works. A furious, but unsuccessful sally was on the 4th made from the town; after which, the works having been much damaged, a resolution was taken to storm the town. The English penetrated into the centre of the city with little opposition; and, the governor retiring into the citadel, the town was exposed for some hours to a general pillage. At length, the garrison surrendered themselves prisoners of war; proposing a capitulation to save the city from total destruction. A ransom of four millions of dollars was at length accepted.

Accounts being received of the expected arrival of an Acapulco ship, the Admiral sent the Panther and Argo ships of war in quest of her, who fell in with the Santa Trinidada, bound for Mexico, pierced for sixty guns, with merchandize on board to the amount of three millions of dollars.†

In the course of the present year, the town and fort of St. John, in the island of Newfoundland, which had been surprised and surrendered to the French, were recovered by Lord Colville and Colonel Amherst, who, sailing from the harbour of Halifax, by their spirited exertions anticipated the effect of an armament fitted out expressly for this purpose at home.

The Emperor, deserted by his allies, and despairing of the recovery of Silesia, thought proper, at length, to make direct overtures to the King of Prussia, for the purpose of setting on foot a treaty of peace. The conferences commenced at Hubertsburg on the 31st of December; and both parties being eager to terminate this sanguinary and fruitless war, articles of pacification were signed February 15, 1763; the chief of which imported, that all conquests on each side should be evacuated, and peace re-established on the basis of former treaties. Silesia was anew guaranteed to Prussia, and the Prussian monarch engaged to give his vote in favour of the Archduke Joseph at the electoral diet, which he consented should be forthwith convened, for the purpose of electing a King of the Romans.

After the resignation of Mr. Pitt, the entire direction of affairs rested on the Earl of Bute. The Duke of Newcastle, however, who had for forty years past been considered as the ostensible head of the Whigs, still held the office of first commissioner of the treasury; a post which the Earl now thought he might safely assume. The Duke, knowing that Lord Bute had determined to withdraw all pecuniary support from the King of Prussia, before the close of the session (May 1762,) resolved, finally to retire from office; and, to cast some lustre on this last act of his political life, he determined to insist upon the payment of the Prussian subsidy as usual; signifying, in an audience which he demanded on this occasion of the King, his unalterable intention, otherwise, to relinquish his station. His Majesty expressed his regret, but accepted the resignation. The Earl of Bute being immediately placed at the head of the Treasury, the Chancellorship of the Exchequer was conferred on Sir Francis Dashwood. The Duke of Newcastle, who resented the treatment which he had experienced, again connected himself with Mr. Pitt, for many years his alternate rival and associate. The Duke of Devonshire, soon after the removal of the Duke of Newcastle, resigned his office of Lord Chamberlain, and was by the King's own hand struck out of the privy council. The Earl of Hardwicke retired from court in disgust; the Duke of Grafton, Lord Ravensworth, and Lord Ashburnham, &c. ranged themselves on the side of opposition.‡

On the 12th of August—a day auspicious to the house of Brunswick, as the æra of its accession to the throne of Britain—the nation was delighted by the birth of George Frederick Augustus, Prince of Wales, who came into the world in a moment of national triumph. By a remarkable coincidence, the rich treasure of the Hermione was carried through the city, to the Bank, at the very hour in which his Royal Highness was born.

The first and greatest object of the new minister, was the restoration of peace. The majority of the nation, however, intoxicated with success, were eager for the continuance of the war, in the sanguine hope of victories. A powerful party, too, openly countenanced by the Duke of Cumberland, now opposed the minister. These considerations did not, however, deter him from the execution of his plan; and the court of Versailles readily embracing the overtures now made by England, the Duc de Nivernois arrived in London in the month of September, invested with the character

* This city was of the utmost importance to the security and almost the existence of the Spanish empire in America, as the port where the galleons and flota, laden with the riches of Mexico and Peru, constantly rendezvoused on their return to Spain. From its situation it absolutely commanded the only commodious passage by which these ships could sail from the bay of Mexico to Europe; the windward passage by Carthagena not being practicable, without infinite trouble, loss of time, and danger from an enemy who is decidedly superior at sea.

† The Santa Trinidada was not the only register ship taken in the course of this war from the Spaniards; the St. Hermione, from Lima to Cadiz, being captured by two British frigates cruizing off Cape St. Vincent. Her cargo was estimated at 1,000,000*l.*

‡ Lord Anson, deceased, was succeeded in the Admiralty by the Earl of Halifax, recently returned from the government of Ireland, which now devolved on the Duke of Northumberland, whose eldest son, Lord Percy, had married a daughter of the Earl of Bute. Mr. George Grenville, brother to Earl Temple, was advanced to the secretaryship vacated by the new premier; but in a short time this order of things was reversed: Lord Halifax took the seals, and Mr. Grenville was placed at the head of the Admiralty.

of ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the King of Great Britain. The Duke of Bedford was invested with the same diplomatic distinctions, and sent to the court of France; and the negotiators being actuated by a mutual wish for the re-establishment of peace, preliminaries were signed and interchanged at Fontainbleau, in the beginning of November, between the ministers of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal. On the 25th of that month, the Parliament met; and his Majesty informed the two Houses, "That the preliminary articles were actually signed, on terms which he represented as very advantageous to England; and he recommended that union at home, which was so necessary to the adoption of those measures which could alone relieve the nation from the heavy burdens entailed upon it by the prosecution of a long and expensive war." When the consequent address came under the consideration of the House of Commons, Mr. Pitt expressed his entire disapprobation of the tenor of the treaty, as impolitic, and derogatory to the honour and interests of the kingdom. He was determined, "afflicted as he was with illness, at the hazard of his life," he said, "to attend the House that day, to raise up his voice, his hand, and his arm against the preliminary articles of a treaty, which obscured all the glories of the war, surrendered the dearest interests of the nation, and sacrificed the public faith by an abandonment of our allies." He was answered by Mr. Fox, who, though he occupied only the subordinate post of paymaster of the army, was the ablest advocate of administration in the House; and, after a warm and full discussion, the address was carried by a great majority. In the Lords, the Earl of Bute vindicated the treaty with great spirit; declaring, "That he wished no other epitaph to be inscribed on his tomb, than that he was the adviser of the peace on the merits of which their Lordships were then called upon to decide." The address passed in this House also by a great majority.*

It was soon found necessary, the increasing expence of the war having left an immense arrear of debt, to negotiate a new loan to a large amount; for discharging the interest of which, amongst other taxes, a duty was moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of four shillings upon every hogshead of cider, to be paid by the maker, and with certain qualifications subjected to all the laws of excise. This proposition had scarcely been made, when the opposition inveighed bitterly against an extension of a system reprobated as oppressive, arbitrary, and odious.

The clamour against the cider bill became loud and general; and the city of London presented, at the bar of the House of Commons, a petition against it. The bill, nevertheless, passed both Houses by considerable majorities, though in the Lords two protests were signed against it. When it lay ready for the royal sanction, the city of London, rather to express its detestation of the bill than from any hope of success, petitioned the crown to refuse its assent. The bill, however, finally passed into a law; and, on the 19th of April (1763) the session closed.†

Scarcely had the favourite measure of the cider act been carried into execution, when, the nation was astonished by the Earl of Bute's resignation of the premiership. By his enemies—and they were numerous—it was affirmed, that though his pride would not suffer him to recede from a measure which he had once adopted, he found himself, on the passing of this unpopular act, in a situation which he had neither the ability nor the fortitude to sustain. The real cause of his resignation is understood to have been, a want of support in the cabinet. To his Lordship succeeded, as first commissioner of the treasury, Mr. George Grenville, brother to Earl Temple, a man accurately versed in the routine of business, frank and affable in his manners, of acknowledged integrity and unambitious of distinction, but destitute of commanding talents. The Duke of Marlborough, (son-in-law of the Duke of Bedford) was advanced to the office of Lord Privy Seal, and the staff of Chamberlain was conferred on Earl Gower, brother to the Duke of Bedford by marriage.

The press at this time teemed with political pamphlets, grossly abusive and virulent; but the ministry disregarded them, till on the appearance of the 45th number of the "North Briton," containing a personal and indecent attack upon the King, charging him with affirming a direct falsehood in his speech from the throne at the termination of the session, it was judged expedient to rescue the Sovereign from so foul an imputation. The almost avowed author of the publication was Mr. Wilkes, member of Parliament for the borough of Aylesbury, a man of ruined fortune and profligate morals, who had made repeated applications to the ministry for some post that might repair his shattered circumstances; but failing of success, he resolved on revenge, and he is said to have declared his resolution to try how far it was practicable to carry the licentiousness of writing, under the pretext of exercising the liberty of the press. A warrant having been issued under the hand and seal of Lord Halifax, directed to certain of his Majesty's messengers, commanding them to apprehend the authors, printers, and publishers, of that seditious and treasonable paper, they, on the 30th of April, late at night, entered the house of Mr. Wilkes, and produced their warrant. On account of the general terms in which it was drawn, Mr. Wilkes absolutely refused compliance; but on their return the next morning, he was compelled to accompany them to the office of Secretary of State, whence he was committed close prisoner to the Tower; his papers having been previously seized and sealed, and all access to his person strictly prohibited. Application was immediately made to the court of Common Pleas for a Habeas Corpus, and a writ was consequently issued, agreeably to which Mr. Wilkes was brought up the next day to Westminster-hall; and the case being new and important,

* The entire province of Canada was by this treaty, ceded and guaranteed to the English, with all that part of Louisiana situated to the east of the great river Mississippi, together with Cape Breton, and the other islands in the gulf and river of St. Laurence. In the West Indies, the island of Grenada, and the Grenadines, were confirmed to England in full right; also the neutral islands, Dominique, St. Vincent, and Tobago; and, in Africa; Senegal, with its dependencies. In the East Indies, his most Christian Majesty acknowledged Mahomed Aly Khan as nabob of the Carnatic; and Salabat Zing, as subah of the Decan—renouncing all acquisitions made on the coast of Coromandel since the year 1749, and engaging not to erect fortifications in any part of the kingdom of Bengal. In Europe, he agreed to restore Minorca in the same condition as when conquered by the arms of the most Christian King. He consented that the harbour and fortifications of Dunkirk should be demolished. Finally, he stipulated, that the territories belonging to the elector of Hanover, the landgrave of Hesse, &c. occupied by the armies of France, should be evacuated, with the fortresses of Cleves, Wesel, Gueldres, &c. belonging to the King of Prussia; and the two monarchs of France and England engaged not to furnish succours of any kind to their respective allies in Germany.—The King of Spain ceded and confirmed to England, the eastern and western Floridas, and all that Spain possessed on the continent of America, to the east or to the south-east of the Mississippi; in consequence of which cession, in conjunction with that of the eastern part of Louisiana, and the entire province of Canada, an immense country, was gained to Britain. His Catholic Majesty also relinquished all pretensions which he might have formed to the right of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland; confirmed and established the privilege enjoyed by the English, of cutting logwood on the coast of Honduras, stipulating only, that no fortifications should be erected upon the territorial dominions of Spain; and engaged entirely to evacuate all the lands, cities, and castles, belonging to his most faithful Majesty, in the condition they were in when conquered by the arms of Spain. In return for these cessions, Britain engaged to restore to France, in Europe, the island of Belleisle; in Africa, the island of Goree; in the West Indies, the islands of Guadaloupe, Martinique, and St. Lucie; in the East Indies, Pondicherry and Chandernagore. The right of France to fish on the banks of Newfoundland was recognised, and the small islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were ceded as a shelter for the fishermen. The fortress of the Havannah, and the other acquisitions of England, without reserve, including the recent, and, as yet, unascertained, conquest of the Manillas, were restored to the Spanish crown.

† The speech made by the King on this occasion contained the following expressions:—"These articles; i. e. the preliminary articles of peace, signed with France and Spain, have been established, and even rendered still more advantageous to my subjects, by the definitive treaty; and my expectations have been fully answered by the happy effects which the several allies of my crown have derived from this salutary measure. The powers at war with my good brother the King of Prussia have been induced to agree to such terms of accommodation, as that great Prince has approved; and the success which has attended my negotiation has necessarily and immediately diffused the blessings of peace through every part of Europe."

tant, he was, after the pleadings were finished, remanded till Friday, May 6, that the Judges might have leisure to consult upon the case. Lord Chief Justice Pratt, in giving the opinion of the court, declared the commitment of Mr. Wilkes to be not in itself illegal, being justified by numerous precedents; and though, in strict contemplation of law, the warrant of Secretary of State was not of superior force to that of a justice of peace, where a combination of circumstances gave a strong suspicion of facts incompatible with the public safety, he was supported in the commitment, even without receiving any particular information for the foundation of the charge. On the second head, the court was of opinion, that there was no specification of those particular passages in the forty-fifth number of the "North Briton," which had been deemed a libel. The paper did not at that time come under the cognizance of the court, nor could it without the assistance of a jury. Respecting the third objection, the chief justice admitted that the privilege of Parliament was violated in the person of Mr. Wilkes: the privilege of Parliament could be forfeited only by treason, felony, or breach of the peace; but Mr. Wilkes stood accused only of writing a libel, which did not come within that description: at most it had but a "tendency" to disturb the peace, and this was not sufficient to destroy the privilege of a member of Parliament. The court then discharged Mr. Wilkes, against whom, however, a prosecution was immediately commenced by the Attorney-General; and he was at the same time, by an official notice from the Secretary of State to Lord Temple, Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Bucks, dismissed from his military command as Colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia; and Lord Temple was himself in a short time dismissed from his Lieutenancy, to make room for Lord Le Despenser, late Sir Francis Dashwood.*

On the 16th of August, the Queen was delivered of a second son, baptized by the name of Frederic. Attempts were at this time made, for a coalition of parties; and, though they proved unsuccessful, some new arrangements of office took place.†

At the opening of the session (November 15), the King, in his speech, exhorted the two Houses "to cultivate the arts of peace; to employ their utmost attention to the discharge of the heavy debts contracted in the late war. He recommended to them the care and support of the fleet; and, towards the close of the speech, he urged them to domestic union, and that they would discourage that licentious spirit which is repugnant to the true principles of liberty and of our happy constitution." Before his Majesty's speech could be reported to the House, Mr. Grenville, knowing the intention of Mr. Wilkes to prefer a formal complaint of the breach of privilege committed in his person, stated that he had a message to deliver from the King. The message imported, "that his Majesty having received information that John Wilkes, Esq. a member of that House, was the author of a most seditious and dangerous libel, he had caused the said John Wilkes, Esq. to be apprehended and secured, in order to take his trial in due course of law. And Mr. Wilkes having been discharged out of custody by the court of Common Pleas, on account of his privilege as a member of that House; and having been since refused to answer to an information filed against him by his Majesty's Attorney-General, his Majesty, desirous to show all possible attention to the privileges of the House of Commons, and at the same time solicitous not to suffer the public justice of the kingdom to be eluded, had chosen to direct the said libel, and also copies of the examination upon which Mr. Wilkes was apprehended and secured to be laid before them." The minister then delivered the papers; on which a vehement debate arose, and it was urged in extenuation of the offence of Mr. Wilkes, that no greater liberties had been taken by the author of this obnoxious paper than had been common on former occasions of the same kind; that the speech of the King had never been considered in any other light than as that of the minister, and had always been treated with equal freedom. The House, however, voted by a great majority, that "The North Briton, No. 45, is a false, scandalous, and seditious libel, manifestly tending to alienate the affections of the people from his Majesty, and to excite them to traiterous insurrections;" and ordered it to be burnt by the common hangman. No legal conviction having yet taken place, Mr. Wilkes made his complaint to the House, "of a breach of privilege by the imprisonment of his person, the plunder of his House, the seizure of his papers, and the serving him with a subpœna upon an information in the court of King's Bench." It was resolved to take the complaint into consideration on the 17th; but in the interim, Mr. Wilkes, in a duel fought with Mr. Martin, late Secretary of the Treasury, and member for Camelford, from whom he had received a challenge, in resentment of the freedom taken with his character in a former number of "The North Briton," was dangerously wounded, and rendered unable to appear in his place on the day appointed. The consideration of the question was consequently adjourned. On the 23d of November, however, the deliberations on his Majesty's message having been resumed, the House resolved, by a majority of 125, "that privilege of Parliament does not extend to the case of libel;" and an address was presented to his Majesty, in which the Peers concurred, signifying their destestation of these seditious practices, and their warm affection for his Majesty's person and government.‡ The concurrence of the Lords was not obtained without much debate and difficulty; and an animated protest was signed on the occasion by 17 Peers, among whom were the Dukes of Grafton, Portland, and Devonshire; the Lords Temple, and Cornwallis, with his brother the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury.§

The sheriffs of London attempting to execute the order of the House of Commons for burning the 45th number of The North Briton at the Royal Exchange, a violent riot ensued; the paper was rescued from the hands of the executioner, the peace officers were attacked, and the sheriffs themselves were put in danger of their lives. The two Houses in consequence resolved, that the rioters were perturbators of the public peace, dangerous to the liberties of the country, and obstructors of the national justice. The thanks of the Commons were voted to the sheriffs, and an address was presented to his Majesty, that he would give directions for the punishment of the rioters.

* It is said, that the Duc de Nivernois, ambassador extraordinary from France, a man of literature and polished manners, taking leave of England about this period; and despising the barbarism of the English court and nation, immersed in political contentions, exclaimed, on quitting the metropolis "Quel roi! quel peuple! quel société!" "What a King! what a people! what a state of society!"

† The Earl of Egremont having died on the 21st of August, the Earl of Sandwich was, on the 2d of the ensuing month, appointed Secretary of State in his stead; and the Duke of Bedford was declared President of the Council in the room of Earl Grenville, deceased some months before. Lord Percival, the leader of the opposition during the latter years of Mr. Pelham's administration, and now created Earl of Egmont, was advanced to the head of the Admiralty, in the room of the Earl of Sandwich.

‡ Mr. Pitt, who attended on this occasion, though obliged by illness to be supported to his seat, declared himself with warmth against the resolution, "No man," he said, "could condemn the paper or libel more than he did; but he would come at the author fairly, not by a sacrifice of their constitutional pledges, and by subjecting every member who did not vote with their minister, to the dread and danger of imprisonment. Under such circumstances, how can a Parliament be free, or bold, or honest? To talk of the abuse of privilege, was to attack the very being and life of Parliament; it was an arraignment of the justice and honour of Parliament to suppose that they would protect any criminal whatever. The dignity of Parliament called upon them, doubtless, to support and protect the purity of his Majesty's character: this they had done by strong and decisive condemnation of the libel in question; the rest belonged to the courts below."

§ Their Lordships affirmed it to be "incompatible with the dignity, gravity, and justice of the House of Peers, thus to explain away a Parliamentary privilege of such magnitude and importance, founded in the wisdom of ages, declared with precision in their standing orders, repeatedly confirmed, and hitherto preserved inviolable, by the spirit of their ancestors; called to it only by the other House on a particular occasion, and to serve a particular purpose, 'ex post facto, ex parte, ex pendente lite' in the courts below."

Mr. Wilkes, however, brought his action against the under Secretary of State, Robert Wood, Esq. for seizing his papers; and on the 6th of December (1763), after a hearing of fifteen hours before the Lord Chief Justice Pratt and a special jury, he obtained a verdict for 1000*l.* damages, and full costs of suit.* Actions were also brought by Mr. Wilkes against the two principal Secretaries of State, Lord Egremont, and Lord Halifax. That against Lord Egremont ended, with his Lordship's death; and that against Lord Halifax was evaded by his lordship's casting essoigns, pleading privilege, and at length standing out in contempt of court until the subsequent outlawry of Mr. Wilkes, which deprived him of all further assistance from the courts of justice. During the Christmas vacation, Mr. Wilkes thought proper to cross the channel to France, and on the 16th of January, (1764) the day fixed for his appearance, the speaker produced a letter from Mr. Wilkes, inclosing medical certificates of the ill state of his health, as an apology for his non-appearance. The House, however, voted Mr. Wilkes guilty of a contempt of the authority of the House, and that they would proceed to hear evidence on the charge against him. On the 29th of January, after a long and vehement debate, they resolved, "that John Wilkes, Esq. was guilty of writing and publishing the paper intituled 'The North Briton, No. 45,' and that for his offence he be expelled from his seat in this House." On the same day in the Lords, a complaint was brought forward by the Earl of Sandwich, who alledged, "that Mr. Wilkes had violated the most sacred ties of religion, as well as decency, by printing in his own house a book or pamphlet intituled, 'An Essay on Woman,' with notes or remarks, to which the name of a right reverend prelate, Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester, had been scurrilously affixed." This book, it appeared, had been printed with the utmost secrecy, and very reprehensible artifices were adopted to procure a copy, in order thus to convert it to the prejudice of the author. The privileges of the House most certainly were violated by the use made of the name of the learned prelate; the book was detestably obscene and impious. The House therefore voted an address, requesting his Majesty to order a prosecution to be instituted against the author. This, however, only served to increase the resentment of the public, who now regarded Mr. Wilkes as a victim devoted to the vengeance of the government, and whom it was therefore incumbent upon them to protect. On the 14th of February (1764) a motion was made in the Commons by Sir William Meredith, of the opposition, "that a general warrant for apprehending and seizing the authors, printers, and publishers of a seditious libel, together with their papers, is not warranted by law." Ministers forcibly urged, that it was not consistent with the dignity of the House to pass a resolution respecting a point of law, which though it should pass, would not therefore be law; and if the courts of law should, in the causes actually depending, be influenced by this resolution, and the House of Lords, in their judicial capacities, should decree for the legality of general warrants, the consequences would be very disagreeable. They contended, that the remedy should be provided by an act of Parliament passed upon cool deliberation, distinguishing cases, and specifying those discretionary powers which the contingent exigencies of government require to be vested in the Secretary of State. The opposition, however, insisted that the practice in question was an abuse, and they would never consent to any act for regulating that abuse. The debate, however, being adjourned to the 17th, certain modifications of the original motion were proposed by the ministry; after which, they moved the farther adjournment of the question for four months.† The adjournment was carried by 234 voices against 220. By the opposition, this defeat was considered as a victory: the freedom of the city of London was voted to Lord Chief Justice Pratt, and presented to his Lordship in a golden box; and the picture of that magistrate was placed in Guildhall.‡

The reductions which had taken place since the conclusion of the war having been far inferior to those made by Mr. Pelham, after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, and the increase of the national debt having rendered indispensable a proportionable increase of revenue, large supplies were yet wanting. Mr. Grenville, in consequence, cast his eyes upon America, as affording considerable scope for taxation.§ His object was to raise a revenue in America in aid to the mother country, the entire produce of which was to be paid into the Exchequer of Great Britain. On the 10th of March, the House of Commons accordingly passed several resolutions, respecting certain new duties on foreign goods imported in the British colonies in America; which being primarily of the nature of commercial regulations, passed without any distinct or particular notice in the British Parliament, though their equivocal complexion rendered them very distasteful to the Americans. One of these resolutions, however, was of such importance, that Mr. Grenville declared his intention to reserve the execution of it till the next year. This resolution stated, in substance, that it would be proper to impose certain stamp duties in the said colonies and plantations, for the purpose of raising an American revenue payable into the British Exchequer. The agreeable prospect of being relieved, by the taxation of America, from a portion of the national burdens, was so soothing to the public mind, that the resolution passed the House of Commons without much opposition; and on the 19th of April, the session closed; the King returning thanks for the judicious measures which had been taken to extend the commerce, augment the revenues, and secure the happiness of the kingdom.‖

Early

* In the charge given by the Chief Justice to the Jury, his Lordship, varying in some degree from his former opinion, ventured to declare the "General Warrant," under which Mr. Wilkes had been apprehended, illegal—with submission, however, to the opinions of the other judges, and of the highest judicial authority in this kingdom, the House of Peers. "If," said his lordship, "these superior jurisdictions should declare my opinion erroneous, I submit, as will become me, and kiss the rod; but I must say, I shall always consider it as a rod of iron for the chastisement of the people of Great Britain."

† Mr. Pitt spoke in support of the original motion. "It was no justification, he said, that general warrants could plead the authority of precedent: two, he admitted, had been signed by himself, but they were not against libels; they were issued in a time of war and public danger, against persons believed to be in the interests of the enemy. Sensible of the irregularity of the act, but preferring the public safety to every personal consideration, he ran the risk, as he would of his head, relying upon the exigencies of the times, and the necessity of the measure, for his vindication. In the present case no such necessity existed; the charge was writing and publishing a libel. What was therein this crime so heinous and terrible, as to require the use of this formidable engine, which, like an inundation, bore down all the barriers of the public security? It was plainly the indulgence of a violent resentment pointed against a particular person. Surely Parliament could not see the extent of the surrender which they had made! a vote had passed, by which the personal freedom of every representative of the nation was now at the mercy of his Majesty's Attorney-General." "It is a maxim of our law," said Mr. Pitt, "that every Englishman's house is his castle. Not that it is surrounded with walls and battlements: it may be a straw-built shed: every wind of heaven may whistle around it: all the elements of nature may enter in; but the King cannot; the King dare not." He concluded with saying, that "if the House negatived the present motion, they would be the disgrace of the present age, and the reproach of posterity."

‡ Early this year, the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, who had so ably distinguished himself during the late war, was married in London to the Princess Augusta, eldest sister to the King, to whom the Parliament voted a marriage portion of 80,000*l.*

§ The project of taxing America had been many years since proposed to Sir Robert Walpole; but he replied, "that it was a measure too hazardous for him to venture upon; he should therefore leave it to some more daring successor in office to make the experiment."

‖ A few remarks on the affairs of the continent may here be serviceable. On the 5th of October, 1736, died Augustus III. King of Poland and Elector of Saxony; and the election of a sovereign immediately engrossed the attention of the neighbouring powers. The son of the late King offered himself for the vacant throne, but the Empress of Russia espoused the pretensions of Count Poniatowski, a Polish nobleman who had resided for some time at St. Petersburgh; and declared her resolution, to support the "freedom" of the Polish election by "force." The King of Prussia, though his brother Prince Henry had at first declared himself a candidate, was easily induced to acquiesce in this design of the Empress; his principal object being to prevent the crown of Poland from becoming hereditary in the house of Saxony. The court of Vienna, though biassed in favour of the Electoral family, would not openly oppose this combination, being intent

Early in the ensuing year (1765) the question respecting American taxation was warmly revived. Numerous petitions or memorials were transmitted from the different colonies, none of them expressly admitting, but the majority positively denying, the right of the British legislature to impose any tax for the purpose of raising a colonial revenue, at the disposal of the British Parliament, and payable into the British Exchequer.* Mr. Grenville proposed, that the colonial agents might be indulged in being heard at the bar of the House by counsel, contrary to the usual Parliamentary practice, against the tax, in behalf of their respective colonies; but this was refused as derogatory to the honour of the colonies, who would not on this occasion petition, but protest; and the stamp act, after passing through the usual forms, became a part of the law of the country.

At this time, the little territory of the Isle of Man had been held of the crown, for several centuries past, by the noble family of Stanley, as a feudal sovereignty; the Kings of England exercising only the paramount rights of a liege Lord; and although acknowledging allegiance to the crown, the island was not regarded as constituting any part of the realm. In the isles of Jersey and Guernsey, anciently included in the duchy of Normandy, the King appointed the governors, and retained the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, &c. The superintendence of civil justice was vested in the King in council; the prerogatives, regalities, and rights of dominion rested in the crown. Not only the great intent on securing the succession of the Imperial crown, by an election of a King of the Romans, in the person of the Archduke Joseph. The death of the Elector of Saxony, which happened soon after that of his father, decided the contest. A diet was summoned by the Archbishop of Gnesna, Prince Primate of Poland, on the 7th of May, (1764) under the "protection" of the Russian forces. Count Branittzi, General of the crown, however, with sixty-seven senators and nuncios, signed a protest against the validity of the diet, and began to assemble troops. In consequence he was divested of his office by the diet, and, being pursued by a superior force of Poles and Russians, was compelled to retire into Hungary. Many of the Polish malcontents found refuge in Turkey, where the Imperial and French ministers had been assiduously employed in representing the proceedings of the diet as inimical to the interests of the Porte. On the 7th of September, (1764) "Count Poniatowski was declared King of Poland and Great Duke of Lithuania, and recognized by all the powers of Europe. During the interregnum, the ascendency acquired by Russia in the affairs of Poland had very strikingly appeared. In compliance with the requisition of the Empress, the diet declared the investiture of Prince Charles of Saxony, A. D. 1758, as Duke of Courland, to be null and void: and acknowledged Count Biron, whom her Imperial Majesty had reinstated in the government, as the lawful Duke, and decreed that the dignity should be perpetuated in the Biron family. The Republic also agreed to give the title of Empress to the Czarina, in consideration of her guarantee of the provinces comprehended in the kingdom of Poland, and the great duchy of Lithuania, conformably to the treaty between the two crowns in the reign of the great Sobieski; and that of King to his Prussian Majesty, upon his engaging never to lay claim to Polish Prussia. The Empress, however, who had declared herself Protectress of the dissidents or non-catholics of Poland, who are very numerous, could obtain no satisfaction respecting her subsequent demands for the re-establishment of that class of citizens in the free enjoyment of their religion, and the privileges guaranteed to them by the treaty of Oliva. Highly offended at the resistance of the diet on this point, she formed a resolution to support the dissidents by force of arms. The discontent of the Poles in consequence became general and violent. It was the subversion of the established faith, said they, which Russia really meant to effect; and, throughout the provinces of the kingdom, were at once seen the astonishing effects of that implacable species of malignity which originates in religious bigotry. By the vigour and promptitude, however, of her proceedings, the Empress Catherine had strongly attracted the attention of the European courts; in her general system of Polish politics she was strongly supported by the King of Prussia; and the peace recently concluded with that monarch, was now cemented by a treaty of mutual defence, containing a secret article, to prevent the establishment of hereditary succession in Poland. It is necessary to remark, that the late Czar had no sooner ascended the throne, than great military preparations were made, for the avowed purpose of a war with Denmark, which, justly alarmed at the prospect of such a contest, made uncommon efforts to maintain the validity of her claims to the duchy of Sleswic, ceded to her by the treaty of Vienna, in 1731. The deposition of the Czar was a happy event for Denmark; for the Empress, to whom the recovery of Sleswic appeared a chimerical and useless project, evinced a disposition to restore the harmony so long subsisting between the two crowns; and in the end, in order to attach the Danish court to that of Russia, the Grand Duke, only son of the late Emperor, made a voluntary cession to the King of Denmark, of the entire duchy of Holstein-Gottorp; an acquisition invaluable to Denmark, though on the part of Russia, on account of its remote and detached situation, a sacrifice of slight import.

About this time, an incident of a deeply tragic nature occurred in Russia. The infant Emperor Iwan, of the house of Mecklenburg, descended from Iwan, elder brother of the Czar Peter the Great, had been closely confined since the period of his deposition by the late Empress Elizabeth, upwards of twenty years, in the castle of Schlusselberg. At the accession of Catherine, apprehensions being entertained that an attempt might be made to revive the pretensions of this young Prince, his guards were doubled, and orders given if any rescue should be attempted, not to suffer him to escape alive from the place of his confinement. Early in the morning of the 15th of August (1764), the Empress being then resident at Mittau, the capital of the duchy of Courland, an officer named Mirowitz, produced a forged order from the Empress to the governor of the fortress, signifying her resolution to resign the crown to Prince Iwan, as the lawful heir and sovereign of the Russian empire. On the Governor's disputing the authenticity of the order, Mirowitz, rushing forward, at the head of his troop, attempted to force a passage into the castle, but was repulsed by the guard. In the interim, the keepers of Prince Iwan's person, pretending that they could not answer for the consequence, went to the apartment of the young Prince, then asleep, and, as far as appears, entirely ignorant of all the circumstances attending this project of rescue, and in the most barbarous manner, murdered him in his bed. His body was immediately exposed at a window; when Mirowitz, terrified at the sight, surrendered, and after a public trial, was condemned to lose his head on the scaffold; a sentence to which he submitted with great constancy and resignation. A relation of this affair was published by order of the court of St. Petersburgh, but accompanied with certain circumstances of mystery and romance which have never been satisfactorily cleared up; and there were those who did not scruple to insinuate, that Mirowitz was the unconscious instrument and victim of the insidious and detestable artifices of the court.

According to an article of the late treaty of Hubertsburg, the King of Prussia had given his assent to the election of a King of the Romans, which at a former period he so obstinately opposed; and the Archduke, heir of the house of Austria-Lorraine, was chosen, and crowned with great solemnity at Francfort (April 3, 1764). In the course of the following year, the Emperor Francis dying suddenly at Inspruck, that Prince succeeded quietly to the Imperial throne, under the appellation of Joseph II.

Some differences now arose between the King of France and the respective Parliaments of that kingdom, which have been regarded, by many, as the seeds of that dreadful revolution, which afterwards burst forth, attended by so many horrors.

* It was urged, on the part of the colonists, "that the claim of England was not only absolutely novel, but diametrically opposite to the spirit and letter of the English constitution, which has established, as a fundamental axiom, that taxation is inseparably attached to representation; that as the colonies were not, and from local and political obstacles could not, be represented in the British Parliament, it would be of the very essence of tyranny to attempt to exercise an authority over them, which from its very nature must lead to gross and inevitable abuse; for, when Great Britain should be in full possession of the power contended for, could it possibly be imagined, when a sum of money for the supply of the exigencies of government was wanting, that the British Parliament would not rather choose to vote that it should be paid by the colonists, than by themselves and their constituents?" In reply to the argument, which stated as highly reasonable that America should contribute her proportion to the general expense of the empire, it was observed, "that America had never been deficient in contributing, at the constitutional requisition of the crown, in her own assemblies to the utmost of her ability, towards the expenses of the wars in which, conjointly with England, she had been involved; that, in the course of the last memorable contest, large sums had been repeatedly voted by Parliament, as an indemnification to the colonies, for exertions which were allowed to be disproportionate to their means and resources; that the proper compensation to Britain for the expenses of rearing and protecting her colonies, was the monopoly of their trade, the absolute direction and regulation of which was universally acknowledged to be inherent in the British legislature." It was intimated, however, that a specific sum, in lieu of all other claims, might be obtained from the colonies, if accepted as a voluntary offering, not as a revenue extorted by force, which left them no merit in giving, and which might ultimately leave them nothing to give. The argument which seemed to excite most indignation in the breast of the Americans, was that which affected to deem them already represented; and as being virtually included in the general system of representation, in the same manner as that very large proportion of the inhabitants of the British Parliament. "The very essence of representation," observed they, "consists in this—that the representative is himself placed in a situation analogous to those whom he represents, so that he shall be himself bound by the laws which he is intrusted to enact, and liable to the taxes which he is authorised to impose. This is precisely the case with regard to the national representation of Britain. Those who do, and those who do not elect, together with the elected body themselves, are, in respect to this grand and indispensible requisite, upon a perfect equality—that the laws made, and the taxes imposed, extend alike to all. Where then, in this case, is the danger of oppression, or where the inducement to oppress? But in the case of American taxation, these mock representatives actually relieve themselves in the very same proportion that they burden those whom they falsely and ridiculously pretend to represent. Where then, in this case, is the security against oppression; or where is the man so weak and prejudiced, as not to see the irresistible tendency of this system to oppression, however honest and upright candour would represent the intentions of those by whom it should be originally established?"

mandatory writs, but those of quo warranto and habeas corpus, &c. extended to these islands; but in the Isle of Man they had no effect; there being no officer to whom they could be directed, or from whom they were legally returnable. In the Isle of Man all civil, criminal, naval, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction was vested solely in the Lord. This splendid inheritance had been transferred from the house of Stanley to that of Athol, by the marriage of the daughter of the last Earl of Derby to the Duke of Athol: and it had for many years been the subject of complaint, that the Isle of Man, not being subject to the laws of the realm, was so conveniently situated for the purposes of carrying on a contraband and fraudulent traffic, as to defeat the utmost vigilance of government. Early in the present session, Mr. Grenville brought in a bill for more effectually preventing these mischiefs; upon which a petition was presented, by the Duke and Duchess of Athol, stating their confidence, that in case the service of the state demanded the resumption of their ancient hereditary rights and revenues, that the legislature would grant them such relief as circumstances should require. In a letter addressed to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, the proprietors offered to accept the sum of 70,000*l.* as a full compensation for the loss sustained by them in consequence of this resumption. This sum was, in the progress of the bill, voted by the House to the Duke, and the rights of jurisdiction and sovereignty were re-annexed to the crown, reserving only to the house of Athol its seignorial rights, with the patronage of the Bishopric and other ecclesiastical benefices in the island. As an act of royal munificence, in addition to this claim of justice, a pension of 1200*l.* per annum, was settled, during her life, upon the Duchess of Athol, as heiress of the house of Stanley, and Lady of the Isle of Man.

A temporary illness of the King exciting much alarm, in the possible prospect of a long minority, his Majesty, on the 22d of April, went in state to the House of Peers, and in a speech to both Houses, recommended to their serious attention, the making such provision as would be necessary in case any of his children should succeed to the throne before they should respectively attain the age of eighteen. In consequence of this recommendation, a bill was brought into the House of Lords, framed on the plan of the Regency act, of the 24th of the late King, empowering his Majesty to appoint, by instrument in writing under his sign manual, either the Queen, or any other person of his royal family usually resident in Great Britain, to be Regent of these kingdoms, until the successor to the crown shall attain the age of eighteen years. The council of Regency to consist of the Dukes of York and Gloucester; the Princes Henry Frederic and Frederic William, brothers to the King; William Augustus Duke of Cumberland, uncle to his Majesty; and the great officers of state for the time being. This bill was understood to have been introduced into Parliament officially only, the ostensible ministers not having been previously or confidentially consulted on the subject. Some doubts arising on the question, "Who were the royal family?" it was explained by the law lords to be the descendants of King George II. and in this construction Lord Halifax, the Secretary of State, readily acquiesced, declaring it to be perfectly consonant to the royal intention.* When the bill, however, was transmitted to the Commons, a motion was made by Mr. Morton, a confidential friend of the Earl of Bute, to insert the name of Her Royal Highness the Princess Dowager of Wales, the omission of which was declared to be a gross indignity offered to a Princess who merited the esteem and gratitude of the English nation. The bill accordingly passed with this important amendment; but it soon appeared that a very deep resentment was harboured by the Princess at the conduct of the ministers in the whole of this transaction, which she considered as an open and flagrant affront. The conduct of the ministry relative to the Regency bill was certainly calculated to excite resentment on the part of the King and the Princess of Wales; and a resolution was in consequence formed, to discard the present ministers. After much delay, and fruitless negotiation, the arrangements for a new administration were settled.(a) The Duke of Newcastle chose the honourable sinecure of Lord Privy Seal, to which was now, for the first and last time, annexed the patronage of the church. The Marquis of Rockingham was placed at the head of the Treasury; and Mr. Dowdeswell was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Earl of Northington was confirmed as Chancellor of Great Britain; Lord Egmont as first Lord of the Admiralty; Lord Winchelsea succeeded the Duke of Bedford as president of the council; and the seals, lately in the possession of the Earls of Sandwich and Halifax, were transferred to the Duke of Grafton, and General Conway; the Earl of Hertford, brother to the General, superseding the Earl of Bristol, who had been nominated successor to the Duke of Northumberland in the Irish government.

Lord Temple and Mr. Pitt condemned the acceptance of the new ministers: the nation was astonished and displeased to see a new arrangement of administration formed on Whig principles, from which Lord Temple and Mr. Pitt were excluded; and, on the other hand, the ministers complained of the inflexibility of men who, when great constitutional points might be, with certainty, secured, would not scruple to put all to the hazard, rather than accede to terms of reasonable accommodation.

The fact is, that Mr. Pitt had peremptorily declined any appointment in an administration formed under the auspices of the Duke of Cumberland, whose friendship and confidence he had never cultivated, and could not hope to obtain; knowing that the state of his royal highness's health was such as to warrant the belief that he could not long survive; and flattering himself, that whenever this event took place, he might, or rather must, come in upon his own terms. In the first of these points he was not deceived; the Duke of Cumberland dying after a long protracted indisposition, which terminated at last in a fit of apoplexy, October 31, 1765, in the 45th year of his age. This Prince being the youngest of the numerous family of King George II. Louisa Queen of Denmark excepted, was not born till some years subsequently to the accession of the house of Hanover; and not having been sent to Germany for education, he might boast that his heart was truly English. His personal and public virtues, his affability, generosity, and rectitude of principle, made his character highly respectable; and by his victory at Culloden he rendered his name dear to the British nation, and memorable to future times.

Parliament having assembled on the 14th of January, (1766) their attention was engrossed by the disturbances and tumults which had taken place in almost all parts of the continent of America, in consequence of the stamp act passed in the preceding session.† On

(a) A. D. 1766.

* On the 30th of December, this year (1765) died, at Rome, in a far advanced age, the famous Chevalier de St. George, only son of the late King James II. Born with the prospect of inheriting three powerful kingdoms, he experienced, during the course of a long life, only a succession of misfortunes. So entirely had he survived his political consequence, that the intelligence of his death was received in Great Britain with the utmost indifference; though his pretensions to the British crown had, within the memory of the majority of persons living, excited the highest apprehension and alarm. He left two sons, the eldest of whom was Charles Edward, the hero of 1745. The younger, educated an ecclesiastic, and advanced to the purple under the appellation of Cardinal of York, was the last surviving male of the ill-starred house of Stuart.

† So great was the difficulty, in a country so thinly peopled, in proportion to its extent, as America, to procure the necessary stamps, that the cost of obtaining them from the distributors was, in many parts, said to be tenfold the amount of the duty. According to the provisions of the act, the prosecutor might bring his action in a court situated at one extremity of the continent, though the trespass were committed more than fifteen hundred miles distant, at the other; yet the defendant, should the plaintiff lose his cause, could obtain no damages if the judge should certify that there was a probable foundation for the prosecution. The judge, too, had an interest in procuring a verdict for the plaintiff, being allowed a large proportion of the penalty in case of conviction.

receiving authentic intelligence of this act of the legislature, the melancholy which had prevailed was converted into fury, and broke out almost every where into acts of violence. The ships in the harbour of Boston hung out their colours half mast high, as a signal of the deepest distress. The bells of the churches throughout the city, being muffled, rang out a dumb peal. The act itself, as soon as it arrived from the King's printing house, was burnt by the populace, with the effigies of the men most active in passing it.* The masters of those vessels which had conveyed the stamps to America were compelled to deliver up their execrated cargoes to an enraged multitude, who treated them with the same ignominy which the act itself had experienced. Those who had accepted commissions to act as distributors of stamps were forced, by public oath, to renounce all concern in them at this or any future juncture; and in some instances, the houses of those who were most obnoxious were demolished, and their effects plundered or destroyed. The justices of the peace in many parts gave public notice, that they would never, by acting in that capacity, be instrumental to the subversion of their country's liberties; the gentlemen also of the law, universally renounced, in their profession, the use of English stamps. The most alarming opposition, however, was made by the merchants, who entered into solemn engagements not to import any more goods from Great Britain till the stamp act should be repealed. By the 1st of November (1765,) the day on which the act was to take place, not a sheet of stamped paper was to be found throughout the colonies; so that all business which could not be legally carried on without stamps, was entirely at a stand. Every where the courts of justice were shut, and the ports closed. The assembly of Virginia being sitting when the stamp act arrived, it became immediately the subject of the most vehement debate ever known since the foundation of the settlement. A leading member of the assembly exclaimed, "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles I. his Cromwell, and George III.——" The opposite party prevented his proceeding, by the cry of "Treason! treason!" Resolutions being finally passed by the House, declaratory of their rights, political and civil, the assembly was immediately dissolved by the governor. The provincial assemblies in general, far from taking effectual measures to enforce the act, passed resolutions in opposition to it, and established committees to correspond and advise concerning the common affairs of the continent. From these committees delegates were appointed, who, meeting at New York, unanimously concurred in framing and publishing a manifesto, declaratory of their grievances. Numerous papers were, by order of the King, laid before Parliament, relative to these transactions; and his Majesty declared "His firm confidence in their wisdom and zeal, which would, he doubted not, guide them to such sound and prudent resolutions as might tend at once to preserve the constitutional rights of the British legislature over the colonies, and to restore to them that harmony and tranquillity which had lately been interrupted by disorders of the most dangerous nature." "I have," said the King, "nothing at heart but the assertion of legal authority, the preservation of the liberties of all my subjects, the equity and good order of my government, and the concord and prosperity of all parts of my dominions."† The numerous petitions which were presented

* Copies of the act were printed, with a death's head in the place where it is usual to affix the arms, and cried publicly about the streets by the name of "The Folly of England, and Ruin of America." Essays soon followed, not only against the expediency, but even the equity of it, in several newspapers, one of which bore the significant title of "The Constitutional Courant, containing matters interesting to liberty, and no ways repugnant to loyalty; printed by Andrew Marvel, at the sign of the Bribe Refused, on Constitutional Hill, North America." The head-piece to this paper was cut in small pieces, with the initial letters of the names of the several colonies, from New England to South Carolina, affixed to each piece, and above them the words "Join or Die." To these were added caricatures, pasquinades, puns, bon-mots, and such sayings, suited to the occasion, as by being short could be most easily circulated and retained, at the same time that, by being extremely expressive, they carried with them the weight of a great many arguments.

† In the debate on the motion of address, Mr. Pitt pronounced every leading measure taken by the late ministers to have been entirely wrong; and as to the present ministers, though men of fair characters, and such as he was happy to see engaged in his Majesty's service, he professed, that he could not give them his confidence. "Confidence," he observed, "is a plant of slow growth in an aged bosom: youth is the season of credulity. By comparing events with each other, reasoning from effects to causes, methinks I plainly discover the traces of an over-ruling influence. I have had the honour to serve the crown; and, could I have submitted to influence, I might still have continued to serve; but I would not be responsible for others. I have no local attachments. It is indifferent to me, whether a man was rocked in his cradle on this side or that side of the Tweed. I countenanced and protected merit wherever it was to be found. It is my boast, that I was the first minister who sought for it in the mountains of the North—I called it forth, and drew into your service a hardy and intrepid race of men, who were once dreaded as the inveterate enemies of the state. When I ceased to serve his Majesty as a minister, it was not the country of the man by which I was moved, but that the man of that country held principles incompatible with freedom. It is a long time, Mr. Speaker, since I have attended in Parliament; when the resolution was taken in this House to tax America, I was ill in bed. If I could have endured to have been carried in my bed, so great was the agitation of my mind for the consequences, I would have solicited some kind hand to have laid me down on this floor, to have borne my testimony against it. It is my opinion, that the kingdom has no right to lay a tax upon the colonies. At the same time, I assert the authority of this kingdom to be sovereign and supreme in every circumstance of government and legislation whatsoever. Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power; the taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone. The concurrence of the Peers and of the crown is necessary only as a form of law. This House represents the Commons of Great Britain. When in this House we give and grant, therefore, we give and grant what is our own; but can we give and grant the property of the Commons of America? It is an absurdity in terms. There is an idea in some, that the colonies are virtually represented in this House. I would fain know by whom? The idea of virtual representation is the most contemptible that ever entered into the head of a man; it does not deserve a serious refutation. The Commons in America, represented in their several assemblies, have invariably exercised this constitutional right of giving and granting their own money; they would have been slaves if they had not enjoyed it; at the same time, this kingdom has ever possessed the power of legislative and commercial controul. The colonies acknowledge your authority in all things, with the sole exception that you shall not take their money out of their pockets without their consent. Here would I draw the line, quam ultra citraque nequit consistere rectum."

Mr. Grenville, in a laboured vindication of the measures of his administration, asserted, that the tumults in America bordered on open rebellion; and if the doctrine promulgated that day were confirmed he feared they would lose this name to take that of revolution. He affirmed taxation to be a branch of the sovereign power, and that it had been frequently exercised over those who were never represented: it was exercised over the East India and other chartered companies, over the proprietors of stock, and over many great manufacturing towns. It was exercised over the palatinate of Chester, and the Bishopric of Durham, before they sent representatives to Parliament. He appealed for proofs to the preambles of the act which gave them representatives, and which, by his desire, were read to the House. He said, that when he proposed to tax America, the right was by no one called in question. Protection and obedience were reciprocal: Great Britain protects America; America is therefore bound to yield obedience. If not, tell me, he cried, when were the Americans emancipated? The seditious spirit of the colonies owes its birth to the factions in this House. We were told we trod on tender ground; we were bid to expect disobedience: what was this but telling America to stand out against the law? to encourage their obstinacy with the expectation of support from hence? Ungrateful people of America! The nation has run itself into an immense debt to give them protection; bounties have been extended to them; in their favour the act of navigation, that palladium of the British commerce, has been relaxed; and now they are called upon to contribute a small share towards the public expence, they renounce your authority, insult your officers, and break out, I might almost say, into open rebellion.

Mr. Pitt rose to reply, but was called to order, the privilege of speaking a second time being allowed only in a committee. The House, however, resounded with the cry of go on; and, addressing the Speaker, he proceeded as follows:—"Sir, a charge is brought against gentlemen sitting in this House, for giving birth to sedition in America. The freedom with which they have spoken their sentiments against this unhappy act, is imputed to them as a crime; but the imputation shall not discourage me. It is a liberty which I hope no gentleman will be afraid to exercise; it is a liberty by which the gentleman who calumniates it might have profited. He ought to have desisted from his project. We are told America is obstinate—America is almost in open rebellion. Sir, I rejoice that America has resisted: three millions of people so dead to all the feelings of liberty, as voluntarily to submit to be slaves, would have been fit instruments to make slaves of all the rest. I came not here armed at all points with law cases and acts of Parliament, with the statute book doubled down in dog's ears, to defend the cause of liberty; but for the defence of liberty upon a general, constitutional principle: it is a ground on which I dare meet any man. I will not debate points of law:

presented to the House, from the principal commercial cities of the kingdom, for the repeal of the stamp act, combined with other circumstances; in a short time occasioned a bill to be brought in by the new ministers for this purpose; and, after a strenuous opposition, it passed both Houses by considerable majorities, and received the royal assent; accompanied with a declaratory act, asserting the power and right of Great Britain to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever,*

In the course of the session, the cyder tax, as far as its operation extended to private individuals, was repealed; the unpopular duty on windows was modified and mitigated; general warrants were, by a resolution of the House of Commons, declared illegal; and several useful and important regulations were made in the West India and American trade. A new and beneficial treaty of commerce was also concluded with Russia; the long contested affair of the Canada bills settled to the satisfaction of the holders; and strong and effectual remonstrances made to the French court for the more complete demolition of the harbour and fortifications of Dunkirk.

Soon after the prorogation of Parliament, some important changes in the ministry were effected. Considerable negotiations having taken place, at the latter end of July, the Duke of Grafton was appointed first Lord Commissioner of the Treasury; the right honourable Charles Townshend, being made Chancellor of the Exchequer, by no means to the satisfaction of Mr. Pitt, who reluctantly acquiesced in the recommendation of the Duke. The Earl of Shelburne, vice the Duke of Richmond, was nominated Secretary of State for the southern department, General Conway being continued in possession of the northern. Sir Charles Saunders was placed at the head of the Admiralty, in the room of Lord Egmont; Lord Chief Justice Pratt, created Lord Camden, was declared Chancellor of Great Britain; the Earl of Northington succeeded the Earl of Winchelsea as President of the Council; and Mr. Pitt, being advanced to the Peerage by the title of Earl of Chatham, chose for himself the office of Lord Privy Seal, vacated by the Duke of Newcastle. The Earl of Bristol was nominated to the government of Ireland, of which he never took possession; the administration of affairs in that kingdom remaining with the Lords Justices, till, at a subsequent period, it was consigned to Lord Townshend. Lord Rockingham retired from office with a character for pure and disinterested patriotism, and without securing place, pension, or reversion to himself, or any of his adherents.

Early in the month of October, the Earl of Chatham and the Duke of Bedford being on a visit at Bath, an interview took place between them, when the former declared, "That he should be happy to see the King's administration countenanced and supported by his grace's approbation and interest." The measures which he purposed to pursue, he said, were:—

"I. To keep the peace inviolate, and to endeavour to prevent any infraction of it by foreign powers.

"II. He would enter into no continental connections, nor make any subsidiary treaty with any European power.

"III. He firmly resolved to observe, in the expenditure of the civil government, a strict and rigid economy."

The Duke answered, "that these were precisely the measures for which he had ever contended, and which he would certainly support, whether he and his friends were in or out of office." Having so far succeeded, Lord Chatham, on his return to London, no longer hesitated to risk an open rupture with the Newcastle or Rockingham party, by the dismission of Lord Edgecumbe, from his office of treasurer of the household, which was conferred on Mr., afterwards Sir John, Shelley. The Duke of Portland, Lord Chamberlain, Sir Charles Saunders, first Lord of the Admiralty, the Lords Scarborough, Besborough, Monson, &c. in consequence resigned their offices. These resignations Lord Chatham purposed to supply by an intended coalition with the Bedford party; but larger concessions being required by the auxiliary party than they were thought entitled to, that negotiation terminated ineffectually. Soon afterwards Sir Edward Hawke was placed at the head of the Admiralty; Lord Le Despenser, late Sir Francis Dashwood, was appointed postmaster; Mr. Charles Jenkinson was made a Lord of the Admiralty; and Mr. Stuart Mackenzie was restored to his office of privy seal for Scotland. Lord Chatham was now universally, though erroneously, considered as reconciled to the system of the court. He, however, retired to Bath, where he sustained a paroxysm of the gout, which seemed to threaten his existence.

In the course of the preceding summer, riots and tumults had taken place in various parts of the kingdom, owing to the high price of provisions, and the magistrates were at length obliged to call in military aid. Many lives were lost, and a special commission was issued for the trial of the numerous rioters apprehended. Few examples, however, were made, the sentence of the majority being mitigated to transportation, and many receiving a free pardon.†

law: but what, after all, do the cases of Chester and Durham prove, but that under the most arbitrary reigns, Parliament were ashamed of taxing a people without their consent, and allowed them representatives? A higher and better example might have been taken from Wales: that principality was never taxed by Parliament till it was incorporated with England. We are told of many classes of persons in this kingdom not represented in Parliament; but are they not all virtually represented as Englishmen resident within the realm? Have they not the option, many of them at least, of becoming themselves electors? Every inhabitant of this kingdom are necessarily included in the general system of representation. It is a misfortune that more are not actually represented. The honourable gentleman boasts of his bounties to America—Are not these bounties intended finally for the benefit of this kingdom? If they are not, he has misapplied the national treasures. I am no courtier of America—I maintain that Parliament has a right to bind, to restrain America. Our legislative power over the colonies is sovereign and supreme. The honourable gentleman tells us, he understands not the difference between internal and external taxation; but surely there is a plain distinction between taxes levied for the purpose of raising a revenue, and duties imposed for the regulation of commerce. 'When,' said the honourable gentleman, 'were the colonies emancipated?' At what time say I in answer were they made slaves? I speak from accurate knowledge when I say, that the profits to Great Britain from the trade of the colonies, through all its branches, is two millions per annum. This is the fund which carried you triumphantly through the last war; this is the price America pays you for her protection; and shall a miserable financier come with a boast that he can fetch a pepper-corn into the Exchequer at the loss of millions to the nation? I know the valour of your troops—I know the skill of your officers—I know the force of this country; but in such a cause your success would be hazardous. America, if she fell, would fall like the strong man; she would embrace the pillars of the state, and pull down the constitution with her. Is this your boasted peace? Not to sheath the sword in the scabbard, but to sheath it in the bowels of your countrymen? The Americans have been wronged—they have been driven to madness by injustice. Will you punish them for the madness you have occasioned? No: let this country be the first to resume its prudence and temper: I will pledge myself for the colonies, that, on their part, animosity and resentment will cease. Let affection be the only bond of coercion. The system of policy I would earnestly exhort Great Britain to adopt in relation to America, is happily expressed in the words of a favourite poet:

"Be to her faults a little blind,
Be to her virtues very kind;
Let all her ways be unconfin'd,
And clap your padlock on her mind."

"Upon the whole, I will beg leave to tell the House in a few words what is really my opinion. It is, "that the stamp act be repealed, absolutely, totally, and immediately."

* Dr. Franklin, when examined at the bar of the House of Commons, declared his opinion, "That abstract resolutions of right would give the colonies very little concern, if no apprehension were entertained that attempts would be made to carry them into practice." When asked, what was the temper of America towards Great Britain before the year 1763, he answered, "The best in the world. They submitted willingly to the government of the crown, and paid, in all their courts, obedience to acts of Parliament. Numerous as the colonists are, they cost Great Britain nothing in forts, citadels, garrisons, or armies, to keep them in subjection: they were governed only at the expence of a little ink and parchment. They had not only a respect, but affection, for Great Britain, for its laws, its customs, manners, and even fashions; and to be a native of Old England, was itself a sort of claim and title to distinction among them."

† The incessant rains which fell during the summer and harvest months, afforded an alarming prospect of increasing scarcity; and it was thought expedient, when the great deficiency of the crop was fully ascertained, to lay an embargo on the exportation of corn, though as yet below the fixed and legal standard.

A. D. 1767.] The assembly of the province of New York had resolved, that they would not regard the provisions of an act passed in the last session, by which they were required to supply the troops stationed in the province with necessaries in their quarters. When this instance of contumacy was laid before Parliament, ministers, avoiding all harsh and positive penalties, enacted a law prohibiting the governor, council, and assembly, of New York to pass any act, till they had, in every respect, complied with the requisition of Parliament. This in a short time produced the desired effect. The project, however, was revived, of drawing a revenue from America, in a mode not indeed analogous to that which had been so recently abandoned, but which served to rekindle those alarms and jealousies, which had been rather allayed than extinguished. Mr. Charles Townshend, Chancellor of the Exchequer, declared, in the House, "that he knew how to draw a revenue from the colonies without giving them offence." Mr. Grenville instantly urged him to pledge himself to the execution of this project; which he hesitated not to do. When the engagement came under discussion in the cabinet, it was reluctantly assented to by the principal members of administration. Lord Chatham was not at this time capable of attending the cabinet councils, nor was he at all consulted, by the ministers. From this period, indeed, that nobleman perceived, or fancied, himself to have become a mere cypher in the administration; and having lost the confidence of the people, he became the object of court contempt.* Whilst affairs were in this state, a bill was introduced and passed, with general approbation, and great applause, for the imposition of certain duties on glass, tea, paper, &c. imported from Great Britain into the colonies. By the repeal of the stamp act, the exercise of the right of internal taxation was allowed to be virtually relinquished; but the claim of external taxation was affirmed still to remain in full force. It had been uniformly acknowledged that Britain possessed the right of commercial regulation and control; it could not be denied port duties had been at former periods imposed for the purpose of commercial regulation; it could not be pretended, that the same power did not now inhere in the British Parliament; but it was considered that this power was, in the present instance, exercised for the accomplishment of a different object; that of inveigling the Americans into the payment of that revenue which could not be extorted. When the intelligence of this new plan reached America, an angry gloom universally took place of the good humour which had predominated since the supposed relinquishment of the plan of American taxation. Mercantile combinations became general, not to import those articles on which the new duties were laid, the trivial amount of which did not diminish the odium attending them; the Americans comparing these duties to "an entering wedge, designed to make way for others which would be greater and heavier."

The prodigious acquisitions recently made by the East India Company, and the princely fortunes accumulated by those who occupied the higher departments in the service, now strongly attracted the attention of Parliament. Many of the proprietors not being satisfied with so low a dividend as six per cent. a dividend of twelve and a half per cent. as a prelude to yet greater things was declared. When the Parliament, in consequence of an application from the company for the renewal of their charter, entered into an investigation of the company's affairs, it was asserted, that a commercial company could not legally acquire territorial rights, and that the revenues annexed to those rights appertained solely to the crown. Dreading the consequences of a competition so formidable, the company voluntary offered an annual sum of 400,000*l.* to the government, in lieu of all other claims; and a temporary agreement for two years was concluded upon these terms, the question of right remaining undecided. A bill was also brought into the House, rescinding the late resolution of the general court, and confining the dividends of the company to ten per cent. during the continuance of the agreement made with the government.

From the termination of the war, the land tax had been continued at four shillings in the pound; and ministers wished that no reduction should at this time take place; but when the usual land tax bill was brought forward, it was strenuously opposed by the country gentlemen, who insisted upon its being reduced to three shillings in the pound. An amendment to this effect was carried by a decisive majority.

Negociations were now again entered into, for the formation of a new ministry; and, during the progress, died, in the month of September, Mr. Charles Townshend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That gentleman was succeeded in his office by Frederic Lord North, eldest son of the Earl of Guildford; a man then little known to the public, but who soon attained considerable eminence. Thomas Townshend succeeded Lord North as paymaster of the forces, Mr. Jenkinson, Mr. Townshend as a Lord of the Treasury. Lord Chatham had retired, oppressed with illness and chagrin, to his seat in Somersetshire.† About the end of the year, Lord Northington retiring, from ill health, Earl Gower was nominated President of the Council, in his room; Lord Weymouth, Secretary of State for the northern department, in the room of General Conway, promoted in the military line; the Earl of Sandwich, Postmaster; and Lord Hillsborough, Secretary of State for the colonies. The Duke of Bedford was prevented from taking any share in these transactions, by a domestic affliction, a few months before sustained in the unexpected death of his only son, the Marquis of Tavistock;‡ which he, with difficulty for two or three lingering sorrowful years only, survived. Though the political views and principles of the Duke of Bedford appear in many respects erroneous, his sincerity and probity remain unimpeached. Honour and rectitude of intention seemed indeed to be hereditary in the house of Russel.

In

* In a debate which subsequently took place in the House of Lords, Lord Chatham spake indignantly of "the secret influence of an invisible power, of a 'favourite,' whose pernicious counsels had occasioned all the present unhappiness in the nation—who had ruined every plan for the public good, and betrayed every man who had taken a responsible office. He said that there was no safety, no security, against his power and malignity; that he himself had been duped, he confessed with sorrow—that he had been duped when he least suspected treachery—at a time when the prospect was fair, and the appearances of confidence were strong—when he had with great pains, attention and deliberation, formed schemes highly interesting, and of the utmost importance to this country. These schemes had been proposed and approved in council, and assented to by the King; but, on his return from a short, and, in his state of health, a necessary absence at the bath, he found his plans all vanished into air."—"In the closet, he said, "he had invariably found every thing gracious and amiable—he had received the most condescending promises of support. I own," continued he, "I was credulous, I was duped, I was deceived. I soon found there was no original administration to be suffered in this country. A long train of insidious practices at length unwillingly convinced me, that there is something behind the throne greater than the throne itself."

† In the autumn of the year, died at Monaco, in Italy, Edward Duke of York, eldest brother of the King. He is generally represented as possessed of pleasing manners, and vivacity of genius, but of superficial attainments, and dissolute in his morals. He was of the naval profession, and had distinguished himself in the last war, in the attack upon Cherbourg. His affability and courage had acquired for him considerable popularity.

‡ Some time previously to these changes, the feelings of the public had been peculiarly interested, by the situation of Corsica, which now forced itself upon the notice of government. This island, on the fall of the Roman empire, was possessed by the Goths, and afterwards by the Saracens, from whom it is said to have been wrested by the celebrated Charles Martel. Corsica was soon resigned by the Kings of France, as a free gift to the Holy See, which, from the incessant irruptions of the Saracenic power, and the ungovernable spirit of the natives, finding the acquisition very unprofitable, ceded the island to the republic of Pisa. Genoa, however, gaining the ascendency over this nation, Corsica, about the beginning of the 14th century, fell under her dominion. In the wars between France and Austria, in the 16th century, Corsica made a spirited effort to recover her independence, under the protection of Francis I. and his son and successor Henry II.; but the Genoese, strongly protected by the Emperor Charles V. under the auspices of the renowned Andrew Doria, again reduced the island under their yoke, Sampieri d'Ornano, the principal leaders of the insurgents, having been assassinated, A. D. 1567, by the treachery of Genoa. After a long succession of slavery, the Corsicans suddenly and unexpectedly rose, in 1729, and possessed themselves of the city of Corte, the ancient capital of the island;

In the Parliamentary session of 1768, nothing very interesting occurred, excepting a bill introduced by the opposition, under the denomination of the nullum tempus bill, for quieting the possessions of the subject, and securing them from all obsolete and vexatious claims. This bill had a particular view to the claims of the crown, against which it was held to be a maxim of law, that no prescription could be pleaded. Passing ultimately into a law, it became the means of extending and securing the rights and liberties of the community at large.* Parliament having nearly completed the legal term of its existence, it was now dissolved, with many expressions of grateful acknowledgment from the King.†

The ensuing election is said to have been signalized above all others by the immense sums expended in electioneering contests; the rival adventurers of the East and West Indies standing forward, in considerable numbers, as candidates for senatorial honours. Long previously to this period, Mr. Wilkes had suffered a sentence of outlawry to be passed upon him; and for several years, he had resided in different parts of the continent. Now, however, he appeared publicly at Guildhall, and offered himself as a representative for the city of London. He was received by the populace with loud acclamations, and a large majority of hands appeared in his favour; but, on the poll, he was contemptuously rejected. Not dispirited by this defeat, he immediately offered himself for Middlesex, and was returned by a decisive majority.‡ Ministers, who had remained passive at his first appearance, now seemed to be awake. Mr. Wilkes, having surrendered himself to the jurisdiction of the King's Bench, obtained a reversal of his outlawry; but the verdicts which had been given against him were now confirmed by Lord Mansfield, and he was condemned to suffer two years' imprisonment; to pay a fine of one thousand pounds; and to find security for his good behaviour during the space of seven years. Enraged at this procedure, the populace rescued Mr. Wilkes from the officers who were conducting him to prison, and carried him in triumph through the city; but through his earnest entreaties, they were prevailed on to abstain from all further acts of outrage; and, at midnight, Mr. Wilkes again surrendered himself to the custody of the Marshal of the King's Bench.

On the 10th of May, the new Parliament assembled, and multitudes of people were collected about the King's Bench, and the fields adjacent, expecting to see Mr. Wilkes go to the House of Commons. At length they began to grow insolent and clamorous; and it was found necessary, to read the riot act. The mob, highly exasperated, interrupted the magistrates with throwing showers of stones, and other missiles. The soldiers, also irritated, and impatient of attack, were now ordered to fire, and upwards of twenty persons were killed or wounded at the first discharge. Some of the military, pursuing a supposed offender, unfortunately shot one Allen, a youth who had taken no part whatever in the affray, in a hovel or cow-house belonging to his father, in the very act of imploring mercy. This incident aroused the pity, as well as the indignation of the public; it was daringly averred, that the justices had caused the riot, by reading the riot act. The thanks returned in the King's name to the detachments employed in this unfortunate service, unluckily happened, in the routine of duty, to have been drafted from one of the Scotch regiments, a circumstance which greatly inflamed the passions of the populace.

At an early period, the Parliament was prorogued till November.§

island; but the republic applying for, and receiving, powerful succours from the Emperor Charles VI. an accommodation took place, and a treaty was concluded under the imperial guarantee. This having been almost immediately broken by the Genoese, the Corsicans in a few years again rose: and, after a short interval, elected Theodore Baron Neuhoff for their sovereign. The republic, no longer adhering to the political system which connected her with the court of Vienna, now applied to France for assistance; and, in 1739, a great force was sent over under the Count de Maillebois, by whose able, and at the same time relentless exertions of military skill and vigour, the island was once more totally vanquished; the French auxiliaries leaving it, at the end of the year 1741, in a state of perfect submission, exhibiting every where marks of the most frightful desolation. Scarcely, however, had the French departed, than the Corsicans were again in motion. Not only men, but women, and beardless boys, appeared in the field, and the whole nation burned with renewed ardour to burst their bonds. The war between England and France having commenced, and Genoa taking a decided part with the latter, the English fleet in the Mediterranean gave frequent and efficacious succours to the Corsican insurgents, and St. Fiorenzo and Bastia were, in 1745, recovered, by their assistance to the Genoese. Next year, the Corsicans, conducted by Count Rivarola, made proposals to the Earl of Bristol, ambassador from the court of London at Turin, to put themselves entirely under the protection of England. This was, however, in terms of respect, declined by the English court; and on the conclusion of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the Corsicans were left to their fate. The contest was, however, continued with various success; but the Corsicans having (in 1755) elected as their chief, Pascal Paoli, son of the former leader Giacinto, a man of distinguished talents and virtues, a regular government, on a democratic basis, was formed under his influence, and great advantages were gained over the Genoese in the subsequent conduct of the war. Giacinto had, many years before, retired to Naples, devoting himself to the education of his son. Embracing him at parting, he said in broken accents, "My son, I may possibly never see you more, but in my mind I shall ever be present with you; your design is a great and noble one, and I doubt not but God will bless you in it. The little that remains to me of life I will allot to your cause, in offering up my prayers and supplications to Heaven for your protection and prosperity." The proclamation issued by the King of England in 1762, under the administration of the Earl of Bute, prohibiting his subjects from giving aid or assistance in any shape to the "Corsican rebels," was a terrible blow to these unfortunate islanders, and no doubt emboldened the court of Versailles to conclude the subsequent treaty with Genoa, by which the progress of the Corsican General was arrested in the midst of his victories. The aid of France was, however, granted in a mode conformable to the insidious policy of that court, which, influenced by the aspiring councils of the Duc de Choiseul, was ambitious to annex Corsica to its other dominions. The Genoese, perceiving no prospect of a termination of the war, at length made a cession of the island to the French King; and a large body of forces was ordered to embark, for the purpose of taking possession. This could not fail to excite great jealousy and alarm in the several courts of Europe most adverse to France; and England and Holland, in particular, presented, by their respective ambassadors, strong memorials to the court of Versailles, expressive of their resolution not to suffer this addition to the French monarchy. The Duc de Choiseul consequently began to waver; and Lord Rochford, in his dispatches transmitted at this period to England, seemed not to have a doubt that France would finally concede in every point required of her. Unfortunately the Duc de Choiseul is said to have received at this critical moment, through a private medium, "a satisfactory assurance" that the cabinet of England would not involve the nation in hostilities on account of this object. Suddenly the language of the French court became haughty and peremptory. The English ministers, astonished at this alteration, and at a loss how to decide, sent, with a considerable supply of arms and ammunition, a private message (June 1768,) to General Paoli, desiring full information respecting the defence he was able to make, and how long he thought that Corsica would be competent to resist the force employed on this service. Instead of ingenuously acknowledging that the island must fall, without immediate and powerful succours from England, General Paoli affirmed that it could not be reduced in less than eighteen months: imagining, perhaps, that to magnify the strength and resources of his country, might be the most effectual means of inducing England to take a decided part in her favour. Whilst the English ministers, however, were hesitating and deliberating, the French arms made a rapid and alarming progress; and Paoli, discerning no vigour in the English councils, made a seasonable retreat, leaving his country to its unmerited fate. He was well received by the court of London on his subsequent arrival in England, and an ample pension was settled on him.

* The nullum tempus bill originated in an incident of an extraordinary nature. The Portland family had, in consequence of a grant from King William, possessed for seventy years the honour of Penrith and its appurtenances, situated in the county of Cumberland; and the forest of Inglewood, and the manor and castle of Carlisle, being considered as parts of this grant, were quietly enjoyed by the family for several descents, under the same tenure, though not particularly specified. Sir James Lowther, the son-in-law of Lord Bute, having been apprized of this omission, made a clandestine application to the crown for a lease of the premises in question; and the surveyor general of the crown lands took upon himself to decide, that these estates were still vested in the crown. Orders were consequently issued for a new grant to Sir James Lowther; but when the case was subsequently argued, before the Barons of the Exchequer, the new grant was declared invalid, and Sir James Lowther was nonsuited.

† About this period, a bill passed the Parliament of Ireland, limiting the duration of Parliaments in that kingdom to eight years.

‡ So great was the popular exultation at this event, that the people paraded the streets of the metropolis, and compelled the inhabitants to illuminate their houses, as though some signal victory had been gained; and the chief magistrate, Harley, was openly and grossly insulted by a violent assault upon the Mansion-house.

§ In August this year died Dr. Secker, Archbishop of Canterbury; a prelate, of a life rigidly virtuous, and well versed in all branches of southern department had been taken from the Earl of Shelburne, in consequence of irreconcilable cabinet differences; and he was succeeded by Viscount Weymouth. The seals of the northern department were entrusted to the Earl of Rochford. Resenting the dismission of the Earl of Shelburne, in the course of the same month, the Earl of Chatham sent the Privy Seal to the King by the hands of Lord Camden; and it was immediately transferred to the Earl of Bristol.

Lord Weymouth had addressed a letter to the Chairman of the Bench of Justices for the county of Surry, expressive of his Lordship's high approbation of the late proceedings of the magistrates, and recommending to them, in case of future tumults, to make early application for a military force in aid of the civil power. This letter fell into the hands of Mr. Wilkes, who published it, with inflammatory comments, denominating the affair in St. George's Fields, "a horrid massacre, and the consequence of a hellish project deliberately planned." On the meeting of Parliament (November 8), Lord Weymouth made a formal complaint of breach of privilege. The House of Commons resolved that Mr. Wilkes's prefatory introduction to Lord Weymouth's letter was "an insolent, scandalous, and seditious libel." Wilkes, at the bar of the House, avowed the publication, and declared his satisfaction for having properly exposed "that bloody scroll." In the course of the debate, it was urged, that Mr. Wilkes had been sentenced to a long imprisonment for former offences, and was incapable of attending his duty in Parliament; and it was moved by Lord Barrington, that he be expelled the House. His Lordship's motion was carried by a majority of 219 against 136. A new writ having consequently been issued, Mr. Wilkes was a second time almost unanimously returned. The House then resolved, "that Mr. Wilkes, having been once expelled, was incapable of sitting in the same Parliament, and that the election was therefore void." The Middlesex electors, equally determined, chose him a third time their representative; but the election was again declared void by the Commons; and, to terminate the contest, Colonel Luttrell vacated his seat in Parliament, to offer himself as a candidate for Middlesex; assured that, whatever might be the disparity of numbers upon the poll, he must be the sitting member. Mr. Wilkes, for the fourth time, was again returned by the sheriffs, the votes in his favour being 1243 to 296; but, on a petition from Colonel Luttrell, that gentleman was, after a long and vehement debate (March 3, 1769,) declared duly elected; a decision by which the nation was thrown into a paroxysm of rage and consternation.*

The Middlesex election having been thus determined, 33,000 men were voted for the sea and land service of the year. The charter of the East India Company was prolonged for the farther term of five years; the company being allowed to increase their dividend to twelve and a half per cent. during this term, provided they did not in any one year raise it more than one per cent. Should the dividend be reduced below ten per cent. the stipulated payment of 400,000*l.* per annum to the public, was to be proportionally diminished; and should the dividend sink to six per cent., the payment to the public should cease entirely. On the 2d of March, the sum of 513,000*l.* was voted, to defray the arrears of the civil list; and on the 9th of May, Parliament was prorogued.

A circular letter was subsequently transmitted by Lord Hillsborough, Secretary of State for America, to the respective colonies, informing them, "that it was the intention of his Majesty's ministers to propose, in the next session of Parliament, taking off the duties upon glass, paper, and colours, on consideration of such duties having been laid contrary to the true principles of commerce; and assuring them, that at no time had they entertained any design to propose to Parliament to lay any farther taxes on America for the purpose of raising a revenue." The duty on tea, however, was left, contrary to the inclinations and endeavours of the minister.

The irritability excited by the late decision of the House of Commons, seemed to increase in violence. A bold petition was presented to the King by the electors of Middlesex; in which they enlarged on "the uniform tendency of the measures of the present reign to destroy that harmony which ought to subsist between the Prince and the people;" and they concluded by declaring, that the right of election had been wrested from them, by the unprecedented seating of a candidate who was never chosen by the county; who, even to become a candidate, had been obliged "fraudulently" to vacate his seat in Parliament.—"Deign then," say the petitioners, "most gracious Sovereign, to listen to the prayer of the most faithful of your subjects, and to banish from your royal favour, trust, and confidence, for ever, those evil counsellors who have endeavoured to alienate your Majesty's affections from your most sincere and dutiful subjects, and who have traitorously dared to depart from the spirit and letter of those laws, which have secured the crown of these realms to the house of Brunswick." The city of London presented a similar petition to the same purport; but the city of Westminster, petitioned expressly for an immediate dissolution of Parliament; and the county of York, and fourteen other counties, with many cities and towns, followed this example. A few counter addresses were presented; one in particular from a respectable, though small body of merchants of London, who, in their procession to St. James's, were grossly insulted by the populace. The riot act was read at the Palace-gate; and Lord Talbot, Lord-Steward, attempting to interpose, had the staff of office broken in his hand. Several persons were taken into custody by the military, but the indictments subsequently preferred against them were all thrown out by the grand jury at Westminster-hall.

About this period, the celebrated "Letters of Junius," whose author has hitherto eluded the most scrutinising and indefatigable research, arraigned the conduct of Ministers in the bitterest terms of severity. Though written in a style so masterly, as to be deemed, in point of composition, equal to any literary production in the English language, they betray a deliberate malevolence of disposition; and, whilst we admire the splendid declamation and poignant invective with which they abound, we shrink with disgust, amounting almost to horror, from the foul and cold blooded malignity of the writer's heart. Of these letters, the most memorable is the one addressed to the King, in which Junius exhibits a most unflattering view of his Majesty's ministers.† On the appearance of this letter, the Attorney-General had orders to file a bill, ex officio, against the publisher, Woodfall, for uttering a false and seditious libel. Lord Mansfield, in summing up the evidence, informed of ecclesiastical learning. His sermons, &c. are distinguished by their perspicuity and elegance. He was succeeded by Dr. Frederic Cornwallis, Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry.

In the autumn of this year died also at an advanced age, the Duke of Newcastle, who, upwards of fifty years, had occupied the highest offices and honours of the state.

* In the case of Sir Robert Walpole, expelled the House, in the year 1711, for "breach of trust and corruption," and re-elected for the borough of Lynn Regis, the House resolved, that he was incapable of sitting in that Parliament; but they did not venture to declare Mr. Taylor, the candidate next upon the poll, duly elected. In the case of Serjeant Comyns, who, on being returned for Malden, in 1715, had refused to take the qualification oath, the House determined, that the votes given to Comyns were lost, and that Mr. Tuffnell, next upon the poll, was duly elected. In the case of Bedford, in the year 1727, the House, in conformity to the former decision, declared Mr. Orlebar duly elected, though inferior by 225 votes on the poll to Mr. Ongley, disqualified by holding the office of commissioner of the customs. From these authorities combined, a complete precedent might therefore be formed; the first affirming, that a member once expelled could not sit in the same Parliament; the two latter, that votes given to a disqualified person, were absolutely, and to every elective purpose, null and void.

†. "Whichever way," observes the writer at the conclusion of this letter, "you turn your eyes, you see nothing but perplexity and distress. You have still an honourable part to act—Discard those little personal resentments which have too long directed your public conduct—come forward to your people—lay aside the wretched formalities of a King,—tell them you have been fatally deceived. This is not a time to trifle with your fortune—the people of England are loyal informed the jury, that the "fact of publication" was all that came under their cognizance—the question of libel or no libel being a mere question of law, to be decided by the court.* After long deliberation, the jury returned their verdict, "Guilty of printing and publishing only;" thus "virtually negativing the seditious meaning and intention, which being of the essence of the charge, though according to the new doctrine, a question of pure law, the verdict amounted to an absolute acquittal, and the defendant was discharged amidst the universal and unbounded acclamations of the people."

Parliament met on the 9th of January, 1770; and, on the usual motion for an address, Lord Chatham arose,† and declared "that, at his advanced period of life, bowing under the weight of his infirmities, he might perhaps have stood excused if he had continued in his retirement, and never taken part again in public affairs, but the alarming state of the nation called upon him—forced him to come forward once more, and to execute that duty which he owed to God, to his sovereign, and his country. The situation of foreign affairs, was, he said, critical; but what more immediately demanded their Lordships' attention was, with grief he spoke it, the divisions and distractions which prevailed in every part of the empire. He lamented those unhappy measures which had alienated the colonies from the mother country, and which had driven them into excesses he could not justify. Such, however, was his partiality to America, that he was inclined to make allowances even for those excesses. The discontent of three millions of people deserved consideration—the foundation of those discontents ought to be removed. This was the true way of putting a stop to those combinations which the address styled 'unwarrantable,' and which he readily admitted to be alarming and dangerous. The discontents of the Americans, however, at the present crisis, were unimportant in comparison of those which prevailed in this kingdom. It was an obligation incumbent upon that House to inquire into the causes of the notorious dissatisfaction expressed by the whole English nation, to state those causes to their sovereign, and then to give him their best advice in what manner he ought to act. The privileges of the greatest and of the meanest subjects stood upon the same foundation; it was therefore their highest interest, as well as their bounden duty, to watch over and protect the rights of the people. The liberty of the subjects," continued he, "is invaded, my Lords, not only in our distant provinces, but at home. The people are loud in their complaints, they demand redress; and until the injuries they have received are redressed, they will never return to a state of tranquillity: nor ought they; for in my judgment, my Lords, and I speak it boldly, better were it for them to perish in a glorious contention for their rights, than to purchase a slavish tranquillity at the expense of a single iota of the constitution. Not being able to entertain the smallest doubt that the present universal discontent of the nation arises from the proceedings of the House of Commons upon the expulsion of Mr. Wilkes, I think that we ought in our address to state that matter to his Majesty." For this purpose, his Lordship concluded his speech by moving the following amendment to the address: "And for these great and essential purposes we will, with all convenient speed, take into our most serious consideration the causes of the discontents which prevail in so many parts of your Majesty's dominions, and particularly the late proceedings of the House of Commons, touching the incapacity of John Wilkes, Esq. expelled by that House, to be re-elected a member to serve in this present Parliament; thereby refusing, by a resolution of one branch of the legislature only, to the subject his common right, and depriving the electors of Middlesex of their free choice of a representative." The amendment was strenuously opposed by Lord Mansfield, and ultimately negatived. Lord Camden, having decisively condemned the proceedings of the House of Commons, and actually divided on this occasion with Lord Chatham, immediately relinquished the great seal; and, such was the political consternation of the moment, that no person competent to the office could be persuaded to accept it. Mr. Yorke, Attorney-General, son of the late Lord-Chancellor Hardwicke, had given, it is said, a positive assurance to the Earl his brother, that he would not, upon any terms, listen to the offers of the court; but upon being sent for by the King, and earnestly solicited, he, in a fatal moment, consented, and a patent was immediately ordered to be prepared for his elevation to the peerage by the title of Lord Morden. Waiting upon his brother, to explain to him the motives of his acceptance, he was refused admission; and, in the agitation of his mind, he rashly terminated his existence. The great seal was then put into commission, and at length (January, 1771) given to Mr. Justice Bathurst, only son of Lord Bathurst, created Baron Apsley. The removal of Lord Camden was followed by the resignation of the Dukes of Beaufort and Manchester, the Earls of Coventry and Huntingdon, and Lord Granby, Commander-in-Chief of the forces. The Earl of Bristol accepted the post of First Lord of the Bed-chamber, and the Privy Seal was delivered to the Earl of Halifax.

On the 22d of January (1770) the Marquis of Rockingham moved for fixing a day to take into consideration the state of the nation. The Duke of Grafton seconded the motion and the 2d of February was fixed upon accordingly. On the 28th of January, however, the Duke of Grafton unexpectedly resigned his office as First Lord-Commissioner of the Treasury; and Lord North was nominated his successor. Thus was formed that celebrated administration, which exercised the powers of government for twelve successive years.‡

On the day after the resignation of the Duke of Grafton, the House of Commons resolved itself into a loyal to the house of Hanover, not from a vain preference of one family to another, but from a conviction, that the establishment of that family was necessary to the support of their civil and religious liberties. This, Sir is a principle of allegiance equally solid and rational, fit for Englishmen to adopt, and well worthy of your Majesty's encouragement. We cannot long be deluded by nominal distinctions—the name of Stuart of itself is only contemptible; armed with the sovereign authority, their principles are formidable—the Prince who imitates their conduct should be warned by their example, and, while he plumes himself upon the security of his title to the throne, should remember, that, as it was acquired by one revolution, it may be lost by another."

* This distinction was not authorised by the ancient practice of the courts; and, if it be admitted, the proper use of juries is superseded; the Judge being made, what the constitution never intended him to be—the arbiter of the fate of his fellow subjects. In cases of difficulty, indeed, the jury are permitted to return a special verdict, in which the facts only are found, and it is left to the court to apply the law in conformity to such specific statement. In the case of Bushel, in the reign of Charles II. Lord Chief Justice Vaughan maintained an opinion diametrically opposite to that delivered by Lord Mansfield. "In special verdicts," says he, "the jury inform the naked facts, and the court delivers the law; but upon all general issues, the jury find, not as in a special verdict, the fact of every case by itself, leaving the law to the court, but find for the plaintiff or defendant upon the issue to be tried, wherein they resolve both law and fact compli-cately, and not the fact by itself, so as though they answer not singly to the question, 'What is the law?' yet they determine the law in all cases where the issue is joined and tried in the principal case, except where the verdict is special." Lord Raymond, on the trial of Franklin, publisher of the Craftsman, in the year 1731, appears to have been the first judge who ventured to maintain the innovating doctrine in its full extent. Junius himself remarks, in his letter to Lord Mansfield: "in other criminal prosecutions, the malice of the design is confessedly as much the subject of consideration to a jury as the certainty of the fact. If a different doctrine prevails in a case of libels, why should it not extend to all criminal cases?—why not to capital offences? What good reason can be assigned why the life of the subject should be better protected than his liberty or property?" The uniform language of Lord Mansfield on this subject, he professes to regard as evidence of a settled plan to contract the legal power of juries, and to draw questions inseparable from fact within the arbitrium of the court.

† The health of his Lordship had been, unexpectedly restored; and, to add to the tranquillity of his mind, a cordial reconciliation had been effected between him and his nearest relative, Lord Temple.

‡ Sir John Cust, who had been nine years Speaker of the House of Commons, being incapacitated by illness from executing the duties of his office, was succeeded at this period by Sir Fletcher Norton, a lawyer of considerable eminence and ability.

grand committee on the state of the nation, and Mr. Dowdeswell moved, "that the House, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, ought to judge of elections by the law of the land, and by the custom and practice of Parliament, which is part of that law." To this motion Lord North moved, as an amendment, "and that the judgment of this House, in the case of John Wilkes, Esq. was agreeable to the law of the land, and fully authorized by the practice of Parliament." This was opposed, as a perversion of the meaning of the resolution; but it was carried, on a division, by 221 against 180 voices. On the 2d of February, the day previously fixed upon by the Peers for resolving themselves into a committee, Lord Rockingham moved, "That the House of Commons, in the exercise of its judicial authority in matters of election, is bound to judge according to the law of the land, and the known and established law and custom of Parliament, which is part thereof." The motion was supported by the Earl of Chatham, who condemned the conduct of the House of Commons in terms of great asperity; denominating the vote of that House, which had made Colonel Luttrell a representative for Middlesex, "a gross invasion of the rights of election, a dangerous violation of the English constitution, and a corrupt sacrifice of their own honour." The question being put, it was resolved, that the speaker should resume the chair. The original motion having been thus evaded, Lord Marchmont, moved, "That any resolution of this House, directly or indirectly impeaching a judgment of the House of Commons, in a matter where their jurisdiction is competent, final, and conclusive, would be a violation of the constitutional right of the Commons, tending to make a breach between the two Houses of Parliament, and leading to a general confusion." This motion, after considerable debate, was carried; but a strong and animated protest was entered against it.

In the ensuing month, a second address and petition were presented to the throne by the city of London, expressed in the most reproachful terms; and beseeching his Majesty to dissolve the present Parliament, and to remove for ever from his councils, those evil ministers, who had been guilty of violating the freedom of election, and depraving the noble constitution of Parliament.

On the 1st of May, Lord Chatham presented a bill "for reversing the adjudications of the House of Commons, whereby John Wilkes, Esq. has been adjudged incapable of being elected a member to serve in this present Parliament, and the freeholders of the county of Middlesex have been deprived of one of their legal representatives."* The motion for the second reading having been negatived, Lord Gower moved for its rejection; and on a division, 89 voted for the motion, and 43 against it. Lord Chatham then desired that their Lordships might be summoned for the 4th of May; "for," said he, "I have a motion of great importance to make relative to the King."

On the day appointed his Lordship moved, "that it is the opinion of the House, that the advice inducing his Majesty's answer to the late address of the city of London, is of a most dangerous tendency; inasmuch as the exercise of the clearest rights of the subject has been thereby checked and reprimanded; an answer so harsh, as to have no precedent in the history of this country, and such as the Stuarts had never dared to venture upon in the zenith of their power."† The motion was negatived by a great majority; and the address itself gave birth to a resolution of the House of Commons, that "to deny the legality of the present Parliament, or to assert their acts to be invalid, was unwarrantable, and tended to destroy the allegiance of the subjects;" and a joint address was presented to the King by the two Houses, thanking him for his conduct on this occasion.

Lord Chatham next made a motion for an address to the King to dissolve the Parliament. This motion, as might, perhaps, have been expected, was flatly, and rudely negatived. However, on the 1st of June, a committee, delegated by the city of London, waited on his Lordship with a vote of thanks "for the zeal he had shown in support of those invaluable and sacred privileges, the right of election and the right of petition, as well as for the wishes expressed by him, that Parliaments may be restored to their original purity, by shortening their duration, and introducing a more full and equal representation."

Early in the session, Lord North had moved the repeal of the port-duties of 1767, "excepting the duty on tea," omitted, on the avowed principle of asserting the supremacy of Great Britain. Governor Pownall, who moved to include the duty on tea as an amendment to the original motion, acknowledged, that though the total repeal of the duties in question might do much, it would not restore satisfaction to America. Mr. George Grenville affirmed, that he had pursued the best of all possible systems respecting America, viz. that of compelling submission to the laws by force: his successor had adopted the next best, that of relinquishing absolutely the idea of coercion; but the present plan of modified concession and repeal would prove altogether futile; and, as the amendment did not accord with his sentiments of dignity or propriety, he should decline voting upon the question. The amendment was negatived, by 206 against 144.

About this time, Mr. Grenville introduced his bill for regulating the proceedings of the House of Commons on controverted elections, generally known as the Grenville act. This was originally limited to the short term of a year; but in the session of 1774 it was made perpetual.‡

Parliament had been only a short time prorogued, when a third address was presented to the throne by the city of London, in which they lamented the heavy displeasure under which they had fallen with his Majesty, in consequence of the sentiments expressed in their late petition and remonstrance, to which they, nevertheless, informed his Majesty they still adhered; and they again renewed their prayer for the dissolution of the present Parliament. The King in answer declared, "that he should have been wanting to the public, as well as to himself, had he not expressed his dissatisfaction at their late address; and that he should ill deserve to be considered as the father of his people, could he suffer himself to be prevailed upon to make such a use of his prerogative, as was inconsistent with the interest, and dangerous to the constitution of the kingdom." Beckford, the Lord Mayor, who presented the petition, demanded leave "to answer the King;" and, permission having been granted, he delivered an address to his Majesty, concluding as follows.—"Permit me, sire,

* He declared, "that a violent outrage had been committed, which struck at every thing dear and sacred to the liberties of Englishmen. I am afraid," said he, "my Lords, that this measure has sprung too near the throne. I am sorry for it; but I hope his Majesty will soon open his eyes, and see it in all its deformity."

† In the city address, alluded to by Lord Chatham, which bore the unusual title of "a remonstrance to the King," the addressers affirm "that the House of Commons have done a deed more ruinous in its consequences than the levying of ship-money by Charles I. or the dispensing power assumed by James II.; a deed which must vitiate all the proceedings of this Parliament; for the acts of the legislature can no more be valid without a legal House of Commons, than without a legal Prince on the throne."

‡ A money bill, originating in the usual and established mode, being about this period returned from England, to Ireland, under the seal of Britain, was rejected by the Irish Commons, under the plea that it did not originate in that House. They maintained, "that Poyning's law, and the other subsequent statutes by which that law was modified and enforced, made no specific mention of money bills, which might, therefore, be supposed accepted; that, if the origination of money bills was not in reality the sole right of the Commons, this must at least be admitted to be the better and more constitutional mode; and that, in rejecting this bill, they exercised an indubitable right, even supposing the right of the council to originate the bill to be equally indisputable." The Lord Lieutenant, Lord Townshend, though he allowed that the Irish Parliament should grant their own money in their own way, protested against the right claimed by the House of Commons, and endeavoured, but in vain, to enter his protest upon their journals. His Excellency's protest, however, was recorded on the journals of the peerage; the Parliament was immediately prorogued; and these proceedings becoming the subject of discussion in England, it was moved in the Commons, that the instructions in consequence of which the Parliament of Ireland had been prorogued, should be laid before the House. A great majority negatived this motion.

further to observe, that whoever has already dared, or shall hereafter endeavour, by false insinuations and suggestions, to alienate your Majesty's affections from your loyal subjects in general, and from the city of London in particular, is an enemy to your Majesty's person and family, a violator of the public peace, and a betrayer of our happy constitution, as it was established at the glorious and necessary revolution." His Majesty, who had been accused of the indecorum of "laughing" at the former address, now reddened with anger and astonishment, and remained in profound silence; but when the Lord Mayor, some time afterwards, went to St. James's, with the usual congratulation on the birth of a Princess, he was informed, "that as his Lordship had thought fit to speak to his Majesty, after his answer to the late remonstrance, as it was unusual, his Majesty desired that nothing of the kind might happen for the future."

Previously to the close of the session, Lord Chatham had declared, "that a great blow either had been or would be struck in some part of the world." In a few weeks it was ascertained, that a squadron of Spanish ships from Buenos Ayres had seized upon the Malouine or Falkland islands, of which the English had been some years the occupants.*

As soon as the particulars of this extraordinary affair were known in England, the whole nation appeared inflamed with resentment. In the present instance, it was said, there was no room for negotiation; "for, whatever difference of opinion might exist respecting the opposite abstract claims of the two crowns, an attack upon an English fort and garrison by an armed force, was equivalent to a declaration of war. A superior force ought, therefore, to be sent without delay, in order to retake the islands; and then it might be proper to enter into a negociation, with a view to determine what reparation was due from Spain for so unprovoked and unprecedented an outrage; after which it would be time enough to enter upon the discussion of the claim of right." A negotiation between the two courts, however, immediately commenced: but, as the English ministers insisted upon the restitution of the islands, as a preliminary step to the determination of the question of right, there was little appearance of an amicable accommodation.

When Parliament met, in November, the King stated, in his opening speech, that an insult had been lately offered to the honour of this nation, by an act of "The Governor of Buenos Ayres, in seizing one of his Majesty's possessions; and that, should satisfaction be refused by the court of Spain for this injury, preparations had been made and were still making to do ourselves justice." Ministers, who appear to have been guilty of considerable neglect and delay, now exerted themselves to the utmost in the equipment of a formidable fleet; and the court of Spain perceived, that, unless some concessions were made, a rupture must occur.† In reply to the demand of disavowal made by England, the Marquis de Grimaldi, the Spanish minister, alledged, "that as England well knew in what light the court of Madrid had ever viewed the settlement at Port Egmont, it could not be imagined that the King of Spain could really disapprove the conduct of the governor Don Buccarelli; but as it was neither the interest nor inclination of Spain to involve herself in a war with England, his Catholic Majesty was willing to make such concessions as should be consistent with his honour and the welfare of his subjects; and that instructions had been transmitted to Prince Maserano, his ambassador in London, for this purpose." Prince Maserano accordingly acquainted Lord Weymouth, the English Secretary of State, that the King of Spain had empowered him to disavow any "particular orders" given to M. de Buccarelli, and at the same time to say, that he had acted agreeably to his "general instructions" and oath as governor; that the islands should be restored; and that it was expected his Britannic Majesty would, on his part, disavow Captain Hunt's menace, which had prompted the governor to act as he had done. About this time, Lord Weymouth resigned the seals of the southern department to Lord Rochford, and a convention was soon after concluded on the terms proposed; not, indeed, with a disavowal of the menace of Captain Hunt, but with a secret article or engagement, as is understood, that the islands should be evacuated by England within a specific term. The condition of eventual restitution not being suspected at this time, it afforded no public ground of objection; and when the evacuation of the islands took place three years afterwards, the quarrel being almost forgotten, and the attention of the public otherwise engaged, it passed off with slight and transient comment.

Lord Halifax had now taken the seals of the northern department, in the room of Lord Rochford; Lord

* These islands, consisting of two larger and many of smaller size, are bleak, barren, and marshy; exposed, even during the summer, to storms and tempests almost perpetual; and no regular settlement, in the space of two hundred years, which had elapsed since their first discovery, had been attempted. Lord Anson, on his return from his voyage round the world, had remarked that the possession of a port to the southward of Brazil, would be of signal service to future navigators, for refitting, &c. previously to their passage through the Straits of Magellan, or the doubling of Cape Horn: and the Falkland islands were mentioned to him as well adapted to the purpose. When his Lordship was subsequently at the head of the Admiralty, it was in contemplation to form a settlement on the spot; but, remonstrances being made by the court of Spain, the project was relinquished. In the year 1764, however, under the auspices of Mr. Grenville, Commodore Byron was sent out to take possession of these islands; and a settlement was made, and a small fort erected, in the vicinity of a commodious harbour, to which the name of Port Egmont was given, in compliment to Lord Egmont, then at the head of the Admiralty. About the same time, a settlement was also made, and a fortress erected, by the French navigator, M. de Bougainville, on another of these islands to the eastward of the English settlement, under the name of St. Louis; but, in consequence of the representations of the Spanish court, it was in a short time freely yielded to the Spaniards, who gave it the name of Port Solidad. Brazil, Surinam, and Cayenne, countries long possessed by Portugal, Holland, and France, excepted, Spain pretended to the absolute sovereignty of the whole of South America. The new settlement of the English therefore, excited the highest alarm and uneasiness, not merely as an encroachment on the right of dominion, but as it was evident that the principal inducement of England to form this settlement, was the facility which it would give in case of a future war between the two powers, to an attack upon the Spanish territories bordering on the great South Sea. Strong remonstrances were therefore made against an encroachment, considered as unjust and invidious; but, at that period, such was the dread of the power of England, that Spain was under the humiliating necessity of submitting to an aggression which she had not the force to repel. The subsequent domestic broils in England, and the threatening aspect of affairs in the English colonies, emboldened the court of Madrid to revive its pretensions to the Falkland islands, and to take vigorous measures to enforce her rights. To this she was secretly excited, by the Duc de Choiseul, Prime Minister of France, whose ruling passion was the depression of the power of England. Towards the close of 1769, Captain Hunt, of the Tamar frigate, cruizing off the islands, fell in with a Spanish schooner belonging to Port Solidad, taking a survey of them. Agreeably to what he conceived to be his duty, he charged the commander of the schooner to depart from that coast, as it was the property of his Britannic Majesty, and threatened to fire into him if he did not desist from prosecuting his commission. The schooner obeyed; but soon afterwards returned with an officer on board, bringing with him a letter from Buenos Ayres, addressed to Captain Hunt, in which the governor in his turn warned the captain to depart from a coast belonging to the King of Spain; but, on the supposition that Captain Hunt's touching at these islands was merely accidental, the governor expressed his earnest desire to show him all possible civilities. Captain Hunt warmly replied, that these islands were the property of Britain, by discovery and by settlement. The governor maintaining with equal warmth the rights of the crown of Spain, an altercation ensued; and, in the sequel, Captain Hunt was charged with a direct violation of treaties, and the governor declared it to be his duty to transmit the particulars of this transaction to the court of Spain. Captain Hunt, not chusing to take further steps without proper authority, set sail for England, where he arrived in the month of June 1770, having left two small sloops at Port Egmont. Soon after his departure, a considerable armament, consisting of five ships of war, &c. with all the means for prosecuting a regular siege, appeared before Port Egmont. The commandant knowing the place to be untenable, submitted to a capitulation; by which he and his garrison were allowed to evacuate the place, carrying with them such of their stores as they could take. The commander of the Spanish squadron, not wishing that very early intelligence of this affair should be carried to England, enjoined Captain Farmer (the Commandant) not to sail without his permission; and in order to ensure his compliance, he caused the rudder of his ship, the Favourite, to be taken off and kept on shore, and it was not restored for twenty days. The Favourite was at length permitted to depart, and, after a voyage of ten weeks arrived safe at Portsmouth.

† The King of France, dreading a renewal of hostilities with England, on being apprized of the secret intrigues of the Duc de Choiseul at the Spanish court, and dissatisfied also with the encouragement given by the Duke to the popular party at home, sent that minister into exile, and made pressing applications to the King of Spain, to come to an amicable accommodation with England.

Suffolk succeeded Lord Halifax as Lord Privy Seal; and Sir Edward Hawke relinquished his seat at the head of the Admiralty to the Earl of Sandwich. Mr. George Grenville had died on the 13th of November, the first day of the session; and many of his friends joining the administration, the majorities in both Houses became very powerful.

Parliament assembled on the 22d of January, 1771; and in the course of the session, a remarkable bill was introduced, and passed into an act, for disfranchising a large proportion of the freemen of the borough of New Shoreham, and for extending the right of voting to the contiguous rape of Bramber, &c.*

It had long been a subject of complaint, that the speeches of the members of the Commons were, in contempt of the resolutions of the House, regularly printed in the public papers; and several members having formally stated that their speeches had been misrepresented in the report, a motion was made and carried, that the printers Wheble and Thompson should appear to answer this complaint at the bar of the House. The printers taking no notice of this general summons, a second order was issued, and declared to be final; but no more regard being paid to the second order than to the first, a motion was made that Wheble and Thompson should be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms. In consequence of information, that the parties had absconded, a royal proclamation was issued, offering a reward of 50*l.* for apprehending the two printers.† In the interim, six other printers were for similar offences ordered to the bar of the House, five of whom obeying the summons, were reprimanded and discharged; and the remaining delinquent, Miller, the printer of the London Evening Post, was ordered to be taken into custody for contempt of the House. He was consequently taken into custody by the messenger of the House of Commons, at his own dwelling, was carried before the Lord Mayor (Crosby,) and the aldermen Wilkes and Oliver, at the Mansion House. The serjeant at arms attending to demand the prisoner, the legality of the warrant was denied, the printer was discharged, and the messenger of the House, on pretext of a false arrest, was ordered to be committed to prison in default of bail. This was at first refused, but at length reluctantly given; and for these proceedings the thanks of the corporation of London were immediately voted to the Mayor and Aldermen. The House of Commons were now reduced to a vexatious perplexity; and the opposition members reminded the ministers, that to them must be imputed the odium under which the House had fallen with the people. The Lord Mayor and Mr. Alderman Oliver, as members of the House, were ordered to attend in their places; when the former pleaded, that he was bound by oath to preserve the franchises of the city, that his conduct had been strictly agreeable to law, and he demanded to be heard by counsel. This was refused, on the ground that no counsel could be heard in opposition to the privileges of the House; and the Lord Mayor's book of minutes being called for, the recognizance of the messenger was expunged from the record by order of the House; and a resolution was passed, that "to institute any proceeding at law in this case, was contrary to the privileges of the House; and also that it was a breach of privilege to apprehend the messenger of this House executing his warrant, under the pretence of an assault, and that it was a breach of privilege to hold the messenger to bail for such pretended assault." Mr. Oliver was proceeded against in a similar manner; and the two magistrates refusing to make any concession or apology, it was, by a great majority, voted that they be committed prisoners to the Tower. On the last day of the attendance of the Lord Mayor, multitudes of people assembled in the vicinity of Westminster-hall, and a riot took place, in which several of the ministerial members were grossly insulted. Mr. Wilkes, having received a summons to attend at the bar of the House, wrote to the speaker, declaring that he could attend only in his place as member for the county of Middlesex. After some unsuccessful repetitions of the order, the House, desirous to dismiss the business, ordered a new summons for the "eighth" of April, and at the same time appointed the "ninth" as the first day of meeting after the Easter recess.‡

At the beginning of May, the Earl of Chatham repeated his motion for an address to the King, requesting that he would be graciously pleased to dissolve the present Parliament; but it was negatived, by 72 voices against 23.§

At the close of the session, on the 8th of May, the King congratulated the Parliament on the prospect of a permanent continuance of peace, and earnestly exhorted them to discourage and suppress all groundless suspicions and domestic disturbances, in order that the national happiness might be rendered complete.‖

Parliament did not meet again till January 21, 1772,¶ when his Majesty confidently announced the continuance of peace, from the repeated assurances he had received of the amicable disposition of the powers on the continent. In a few days, however, a demand was made, by ministers, for 25,000 seamen to be employed in the service of the current year, under the pretext of the necessity of our maintaining a superior force, both in the East and West Indies, to the French, who had lately sent considerable reinforcements to those distant quarters

* It appeared in evidence, before the select committee appointed to try the merits of the late election for Shoreham, that a great number of the freemen of the borough had formed themselves into a society, under the name of the "Christian Club." This Christian club was merely a junto, appointed to dispose of the borough to the highest bidder; and after the election was decided, the profits were shared equally amongst the members. The attorney-general was, in consequence of an address of the House to the King, ordered to prosecute the persons who had distinguished themselves as the peculiar agents of infamy on this occasion.

† Some time afterwards, Wheble was taken by Edward Twine Carpenter, a journeyman printer, and carried before Wilkes, who not only discharged him, but took recognizance for prosecuting the person by whom he was apprehended. Mr. Dowdeswell, who attempted to interest the House of Commons in Carpenter's behalf, received the following whimsical answer from Mr. Wedderburne. "As to the affair of Mr. Twine Carpenter, I can see no reason for supporting him; as I understand it, the man is Mr. Wheble's devil. Wheble was arrested by his own devil: he was discharged out of the illegal arrest of this devil: the devil was bound over to answer: whether printer beats devil, or devil beats printer, is of no consequence; there may be the devil to do; there will be the devil to pay: if the devil has the reward that was advertised, the devil has fairly outwitted the noble Lord near me: whether he has or not I do not know; but I hope this House will have nothing to do with him."

‡ The Lord Mayor and Mr. Oliver, soon after their commitment, applied for a writ of habeas corpus, which was accordingly issued by the court of Common Pleas; but, after long pleadings, these magistrates were remanded by the court, and continued in custody till the end of the session, when their liberation was celebrated by great and universal rejoicings; and from this time forward the proceedings of Parliament, and the speeches of the members, have been published without any serious interruption or molestation.

§ About the same time, a bill was brought into Parliament, "for enabling certain persons to inclose and embank part of the river Thames adjoining to Durham-yard, &c." By some it was considered as an invasion of the property claimed by the city of London in the soil or bed of the river; but, whatever indemnification the city might be entitled to, the magnificent buildings constructed in virtue of this act, under the appellation of the Adelphi, exhibit a noble monument of architectural utility, and reflect honour on the reign of George III.

‖ The city of London, soon after the rising of Parliament, presented another petition and remonstrance to the King, in which they complain of the Adelphi bill as a violation of their chartered rights, of the arbitrary imprisonment of their chief magistrate, of the enormity of erasing a judicial record in order to stop the course of justice; and again urge, the immediate dissolution of the Parliament, and the removal from his Majesty's person and councils, for ever, of "the present wicked and despotic ministers." The petition, however intemperate, excited but little attention; and his Majesty, in answer, coldly expressed his readiness to redress the real grievances of his subjects; but he was sorry to find that a part of them renewed requests, a compliance with which he had repeatedly refused.

¶ During the recess, died the Earl of Halifax, who had filled the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to which he had been appointed in 1761, with distinguished success. The Earl of Suffolk succeeded the Earl, as Secretary of State for the northern department, and the Duke of Grafton accepted the vacant post of Lord Privy Seal.

 The opposition urged, in reply, "That this was in fact a war establishment in the midst of peace—that if so great an augmentation was in present circumstances thought necessary, it was impossible to say when it could with propriety be diminished—that the apprehension of an attack from France was futile and ridiculous, and that the naval force of that power employed in actual service was totally inadequate to any hostile attempt—that the present motion would add 500,000*l.* to the public expence—and that, bending under the quarters. The motion was carried without a division.*

About this time, a bill was introduced, for "making more effectual provisions to guard the descendants of the late King, George II. from marrying without the approbation of his Majesty, his heirs and successors, first had and obtained."† By the provisions of this bill, the "marriages contracted by the royal family from this time are declared null and void, unless the previous approbation of his Majesty be obtained; but in case the parties shall have attained the age of twenty-five years, and give notice to the privy council of their intention of marriage, such marriage should be held good in law, unless the Parliament shall, within the space of twelve months, declare its disapprobation of the same." The bill excited great dissatisfaction, and did not pass without considerable difficulty.‡

A petition, signed by some hundreds of members of the established church, humbly praying to be relieved from the obligation of subscribing to the thirty-nine articles of faith as imposed by law, was presented to the House of Commons, in the course of this session. It was rejected, however, by 217 against 71; many, even of those who were favourable to its prayer, considering, that the main force of its arguments was directed rather against ecclesiastical establishments, as such, than against the specific defects of the particular establishment of which the petitioners were members. On a motion subsequently made, a bill was brought in, for the further enlargement of the Toleration act. It passed the Commons almost by acclamation; but, in the Lords, it was rejected, by 102 against 29.

Parliament was prorogued on the 9th of June. Notwithstanding the expence attending the armament of the preceding year, some progress had been made in the reduction of the national debt; and the repeal of the port duties shewed an inclination to accommodate the differences with America. This seemed further apparent by the resignation of the Earl of Hillsborough, Secretary of State for America, who was no favourite with the colonists, and the subsequent appointment of the Earl of Dartmouth, a nobleman who had uniformly opposed American taxation. Various other changes and promotions took place during the recess: the Earl of Harcourt succeeded Lord Townshend as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Lord Stormont was appointed ambassador at the court of Versailles, in the room of Lord Harcourt; and Mr. Charles Jenkinson having been nominated vice-treasurer of Ireland, his seat at the board of treasury was filled by the honourable Charles James Fox, second son of Lord Holland, a young man who had already drawn the attention of the public by the splendor of his Parliamentary talents; a circumstance the more extraordinary, as it was known that he indulged in all the fashionable levities and dissipations of the time.

Parliament met on the 26th of November, when its attention was particularly called to the present state of the East India Company, and the difficulties in which they appeared to be involved; and his Majesty recommended making such provisions for the common benefit and security of all the various interests concerned, as they should find best adapted to the exigencies of the case.§ A bill had, late in the preceding session, been introduced, the weight of an enormous public debt, it behoved us to adopt effectual means for its reduction; instead of which, our peace establishment was every year increasing, and was now nearly double what it had been at the accession of King George I."

* On the 8th of February, this year, died Her Royal Highness Augusta Princess Dowager of Wales, in the fifty-third year of her age—a Princess possessed of many virtues, personal and relative, and much esteemed by the nation.

† This bill originated in the marriage lately contracted by the Duke of Cumberland, second brother to the King, with Mrs. Horton, relict of Colonel Horton, and daughter of Lord Irnham. It had been also long believed, that the Duke of Gloucester, elder brother to the King, was privately married to the Countess of Waldegrave, which marriage the Duke now openly avowed.

‡ Two animated protests, signed by eighteen Peers, display the arguments employed in opposition to the bill. "The descendants of George II." it is remarked, "may in time comprehend a very numerous description of people; and it would be an intolerable grievance, that the marriages of so many subjects, dispersed amongst the various ranks of civil life, should be subject to the restraints of this act." It seems indecent to the royal family, to suppose that they arrive later at the age of discretion than others, and absurd to allow them to be capable of governing a kingdom at an age when they are not to be trusted in the choice of a wife. It seems to be a mere act of power, having neither the force nor obligation of law, and contrary to the inherent rights of human nature, to disable a man from contracting marriage, perhaps for life; and it is pregnant with civil discord and confusion, as having a natural tendency, at some future period, to produce a disputed title to the crown—and all this for ends wholly disproportionate to such extraordinary efforts, as the main purposes of the bill might have been answered without creating that perpetuity of restraint, which they think themselves in conscience bound to oppose." That part of the royal message containing the assertion, "that the right of approving all marriages in the royal family had ever belonged to the Kings of this realm," being inserted in the preamble of the bill, occasioned, in the Commons a violent debate; and a motion was there made, that those words were neither founded in law nor in the opinion of the judges. The words in question, however, were, after long and repeated discussion, confirmed, by 200 against 184 voices. A clause was afterwards moved, that this bill should remain in force during the life of the present King only, and three years after, which was negatived by 150 to 132 votes; and the bill ultimately passed by a majority of 50.

§ Short as had been the interval since the acquisition of the dewannee of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, when the company appeared to be elevated to the height of prosperity, they were now reduced to a state of embarrassment and distress verging upon ruin. As soon as the presidency of Calcutta had obtained the government of those territories, a grand project was formed by the president Lord Clive, and approved by the board; agreeably to which the members of the council, and other civil and military servants of the company, might be enabled to derive vast emoluments, not only without prejudice to their principals, but with great advantage to the company's revenue. This was the establishment of a commercial association, for the purpose of carrying on an inland traffic in the important articles of salt, betel-nut, and tobacco; articles of general consumption in India, and considered as amongst the absolute necessaries of life. They had formerly been subject to the slight duty of the fortieth penny; but, to obtain the sanction of the company to the system now established, a duty of thirty-five, afterwards advanced to fifty per cent. was imposed on salt, which, with fifteen per cent. on betel-nut, and twenty-five per cent. on tobacco, produced an annual additional revenue of 160,000*l.* This, however, was regarded by the natives as a trivial grievance, in comparison of the mode in which the traffic was conducted: for the servants of the company acting at once in the twofold capacity of merchants and sovereigns, they reduced to the extreme of depression the price in the purchase, and enhanced it in the same proportion in the sale. The directors, indeed, expressed much displeasure that such extortion should be practised under their authority. Another project of plunder was, to declare void all the leases held by the natives under the government, on low and beneficial terms, by a kind of feudal tenure. Many of these leases, it was said, had been collusively obtained; impartiality therefore required that they should be now re-let, without distinction, to the highest bidder. By this proceeding, many individuals of elevated situations were entirely ruined, and immense fortunes were made by the favoured few; yet the landed revenue of the Company was very little improved. The aggregate receipts of the Company's treasury alarmingly decreased; for the natives could no longer purchase their favourite articles at the extravagant prices now demanded. Those who cultivated the soil, planted in doubt, and reaped in uncertainty; a large proportion of land was left untilled; and an unusual and long continued drought happening also at this juncture, a general scarcity of provisions, especially of rice, ensued. It was possible to exist without betel-nut and tobacco, but not without their daily food: the monopolists seized the opportunity of collecting the rice into stores; and as the Gentoos would in no extremity violate the precepts of their religion by eating flesh, they had no other alternative than to part with the remains of their property, or die with hunger. A dreadful sickness and mortality ensued: in some districts, the living scarcely sufficed to bury the dead; and pestilence and famine desolated the land.

At this time, the embarrassments of the Company were exceedingly increased by a war in which they were involved on the coast of Coromandel with the famous Hyder Ally, a powerful Prince, who, from low and obscure beginnings, had established a great empire in the southern parts of the continent. The subah, or Nizam of the Decan, a potentate of high rank in India, and whose territories bordered upon those of the Company, had entered into an alliance with Hyder; but the united forces of the Indian Princes were defeated with great loss by Colonel Smith, near Trincomallee, September 26, 1767: after which the Nizam made a separate peace with the English, yielding up to them a considerable territory called the Balagat Carnatic. The war with Hyder, who had retired to the interior and mountainous parts of his dominions, was carried on without advantage, and at a ruinous expence. By skilful manœuvres and rapid movements, he at length contrived to leave the English army several days march in the rear; and, after ravaging the dominions of the nabob of Arcot, the old and faithful ally of the Company, he suddenly appeared in force at the gates of Madras. The presidency immediately proposed a negotiation for peace, offering a truce of fifty days for that purpose; but Hyder would grant a truce for seven days only, in which time articles of accommodation were signed (April, 1769) and the conquests on both sides were reciprocally restored. The proprietors, at home, previously to their knowledge of this event, had determined to send out a committee of supervision to Bengal, with authority to introduced, under the patronage of the Company itself, for the better regulation of the government and commerce of India. Such a measure, however, was not thought likely to be effective: after the second reading, the bill was thrown aside; and, in its room, a select committee was chosen by ballot, to inquire into the state of the Company. The committee continued their sittings during the summer, and it was revived early in the present session; but, as its appointment had not originated with the minister, it was regarded by him with little satisfaction; and as soon as Parliament assembled, Lord North moved for another committee, denominated the committee of secrecy, for taking into consideration the state of the Company's affairs. These different committees, it was said, would operate as a check upon each other, and between them the House would obtain every requisite degree of information. The motion for a secret committee passed without a division; and in a short time a report was presented, stating, that, "though the Company were reduced to great pecuniary distress, they were preparing to send out an expensive commission of supervision to India; and recommending that a bill be brought in to restrain the Company for a limited time from sending out such commission of supervisors." A bill was immediately ordered in for this purpose; which, though a petition was presented against it from the Company, and counsel heard in their behalf, passed by 153 against 28. Previously to the last reading of this bill, a second report was presented by the secret committee, containing a statement of the debts, credits, and effects of the Company, both at home and abroad, by which the finances of the company appeared to be dreadfully deranged.* During the summer recess, (a) the Company, with an empty treasury, had accepted bills from Bengal to an immense amount, which were now coming round for payment. They were at the same time deeply in debt to the Bank for cash borrowed, to the Custom-house for duties unpaid, and to the Exchequer for the arrear of the annual stipulated payment of 400,000*l.* The directors were therefore under the necessity of entering into a negotiation with government for a loan. The minister coldly referred them to Parliament for satisfaction. The restraining bill passed both Houses before the Christmas adjournment; soon after which a petition was presented from the Company, with a requisition for a loan of 1,500,000*l.* for four years, at four per cent. to be repaid by instalments, on condition that the dividends of the company should not exceed six per cent. until the loan should be reduced to 750,000*l.* after which it should be lawful to divide eight per cent. and after the whole loan should have been discharged, the surplus of the Company's net profits above the said dividend should be appropriated to the payment of the Company's bond debt until it was reduced to 1,500,000*l.* and thence, that the surplus profits should be equally divided between the public and the company. The petitioners farther engaged, that the account of the Company's revenues, sales, debts, &c. should be annually laid before Parliament; and they humbly requested to be discharged from the payment of the 400,000*l.* for the remainder of the five years specified in the act of 1769, and that leave might be given to export teas, free of all duty, to America, and to foreign ports. Lord North observed, that the granting relief to the Company was a matter of obvious policy and expediency, but in no degree a claim of right or of justice: it was an axiom in politics, that such territorial possessions as the subjects of any state shall acquire by conquest, are virtually the property of the state, and not of those individuals who acquire them. He therefore inferred the justice and legality of the discretionary interposition of the state in all cases respecting the affairs of the Company. He afterwards moved, "That it is the opinion of this House, that the affairs of the East India Company are in such a state as to require Parliamentary assistance: that a loan of 1,400,000*l.* be granted to the Company, provided that due precautions shall be adopted to prevent the company's experiencing the like exigencies in future." Some days afterwards, he moved "That the Company's dividend should be restricted to six per cent. until the repayment of the sum advanced, and that the company be allowed to divide no more than seven per cent. until their bond debt be reduced to 1,500,000*l.*" He further moved, "that it is the opinion of this House that it will be more beneficial to the public, and to the East India Company, to let the territorial acquisitions remain in the possession of the Company for a limited time, not to exceed the term of six years, the charter of the Company expiring about that period: that no participation of profits shall take place between the public and the Company until after the repayment of the 1,400,000*l.* advanced to the Company, and the reduction of the Company's bond debt to 1,500,000*l.* that after the payment of the loan, and the specified reduction of the bond debt, three fourths of the net surplus profits of the Company above the sum of eight per cent. upon their capital stock, shall be paid into the Exchequer for the use of the public; and the remaining one-fourth shall be set apart, either for farther reducing the Company's bond debt, or for composing a fund for the discharge of any contingent exigencies the Company may labour under. In fine, that, as the Company had in their warehouses a stock of teas amounting to above seventeen millions of pounds, which it would be greatly to their advantage to convert into money, they should be allowed to export any quantities of it duty free."

The Company, highly alarmed at these resolutions, presented a second petition, representing, "that terms and conditions are annexed to the loan which they presumed to request from Parliament, materially differing from the propositions on which their requisition was founded;—that the limitation of the Company's dividend to seven per cent. after the discharge of the loan, is a hardship exceedingly aggravated by a consideration of the great losses which they as proprietors have sustained, and the expenses they have incurred in acquiring and securing the territorial revenues in India;—that the resolution limiting the Company to a term not exceeding six years for the possession of their territories in India appears to be altogether arbitrary, as it may be constructed into a conclusive decision against the Company respecting those territorial possessions, to which they humbly insist they have an undoubted right; that they cannot acquiesce in the resolution respecting the surplus net profits of the Company, because such disposal of their property appears to them subversive of all their rights and privileges; and rather than submit to such conditions, they desire that any claims against the Company, which can be supposed to give rise to such restrictions, may receive a legal decision, from which, whatever may be the event, they will at least have the satisfaction of knowing what they can call their own." The loan bill, however, passed with as little difficulty as the former; and, a third bill was speedily introduced by examine into and rectify the concerns of every department. Messrs. Vansittart, Scrafton, and Ford, were nominated supervisors, and sailed from England, in the Aurora frigate, in the month of September, 1769; but by some undiscovered mischance, this ship never arrived at the place of her destination. This calamity having been ascertained, it was resolved by the Company to nominate new commissioners; and six gentlemen, during the summer Parliamentary recess of the year 1772, were chosen for this purpose; but, as it was certain that Parliament would be convened at an early period, with the view of discussing the affairs of India, it was not thought advisable, to carry so important a resolve into execution till the sanction of the legislature could be obtained for that purpose.

* By the examinations which took place at the bar of the House, it appeared, that the annual expenditure of the civil and military establishments in Bengal had risen, since 1765, from 700,000*l.* to 1,700,000*l.* that including the 400,000*l.* paid by the company in consequence of the agreement made in 1767, the whole sum received by government, in customs and duties, &c, from the Company, at an average calculation of the last five years, amounted to little less than 2,000,000*l.* that, during the same term, the dividends of the Company amounted not in the aggregate to 1,000,000*l.* above the rate of six per cent. upon their capital, which was the lowest trading dividend that had ever been made during the most expensive and dangerous war. The mercantile profits of the Company, during this period, averaged 464,000*l.* annually, which would have afforded a dividend of twelve and a half per cent.

the minister, "for establishing certain regulations for the better management of affairs of the East India Company, as well in India as in Europe."* Though the majorities by which the former bills had been carried demonstrated the hopelessness of opposition, petitions were presented against the present bill by the India Company, the city of London, and the proprietors of five hundred pounds stock disfranchised by the new qualification clause, a class of men, amounting to above twelve hundred in number."† The bill, however, passed both Houses without difficulty; but a protest was entered by the Dukes of Portland, Richmond, and Devonshire, the Marquis of Rockingham, Earl Fitzwilliam, and eight other Lords, against it.

The public were reconciled to these measures, by the inquiries of the select committee, in consequence of which, scenes of unexampled oppression and iniquity were developed. A report was presented to the House by General Burgoyne, chairman of the select committee, containing heavy charges against individuals in very exalted stations, and in which the character and conduct of Lord Clive in particular underwent a most severe investigation. The General concluded the report with moving,

I. That all acquisition made under the influence of a military force, or by treaty with foreign Princes, do of right belong to the state:

II. That to appropriate acquisitions so made to the private emolument of persons intrusted with any civil or military powers of the state, is illegal:

III. That very great sums of money and other valuable property have been acquired in Bengal by persons of this description, and appropriated to their private use. These resolutions passed unanimously; and the subject being soon afterwards resumed, the chairman of the committee moved, "That Lord Clive, about the time of the deposition of Su-Rajah Dowla, &c. did obtain and possess himself of several sums, amounting to two hundred and thirty-four thousand pounds, under the denomination of private donation, and that in so doing the said Robert Lord Clive abused the powers with which he was intrusted, to the evil example of the servants of the public."

In consequence of this motion, Lord Clive entered very ably into his own vindication, showing the urgent political necessity which had induced him to embrace the measures for which he was so unexpectedly and injuriously arraigned. He states, "that the power and fortune of the English nation in India had been entirely owing to the boldness and promptitude with which those measures had been conducted; that what he had acquired for himself was inconsiderable in comparison with what he had acquired for the Company, whose welfare had ever been his great object; that he had been placed in great and eminent stations, surrounded with temptations; the civil and military powers were united in him, a circumstance which had never happened to any other individual;—that being circumscribed by no restraint but that of his own conscience, he might have accumulated a fortune too great for a subject; but that he had then determined to reject all future opportunities of gain, and from the day on which he entered the city of Moorshedabad in triumph, after the victory of Plassey, which was a space of fifteen years, he had not benefited himself a single shilling, directly or indirectly, the jaghire ‡ only accepted." On putting the question, the last clause of the resolution was rejected, though the minister declared in favour of the words of censure, and divided in the minority. An amendment was then moved, "that Lord Clive did, at the same time, render great and meritorious services to this country;" which was carried by a considerable majority, and an end was put to the inquiry.§

The different bills relative to India occupied the attention of Parliament the greater part of the session. An investigation, however, of a somewhat different nature also took place. The island of St. Vincent, ceded by France to England by the last treaty of peace, was in great part occupied by a race of yellow Caribbs, considered as the aboriginal possessors of the entire chain of the Great and Lesser Antilles; and it was supposed that, reduced as they were in number, they could still muster, within the limits of St. Vincent's, upwards of 1000 fighting men. The new settlers, perceiving that the most fertile districts of the island were in the hands of these people, urged the government to divest them of the lands which they occupied, and to bestow upon them in exchange other lands, in the island, or "elsewhere," as should be thought expedient. Orders were accordingly issued for this purpose, early in 1768; and the Caribbs very strenuously resisting the measure, a considerable force was employed to reduce them to submission. An inquiry was instituted in the House of Commons respecting this business, and the following resolutions were moved by Alderman Trecothick, one of the members for the city of London:

I. That the expedition against the Caribbs was undertaken without sufficient provocation on the part of these poor people, and at the instigation of persons interested in their destruction.

II. That sending the troops in the unhealthy season of the year, unprovided with camp equipage and necessaries, on that service, is not justifiable by any existing necessity.

* Its principal provisions were, "That the court of directors should in future be chosen for a term of four years, instead of being elected annually, six members vacating their seats each year;—that the qualification for voting should be raised from 500*l.* to 1000*l.* capital stock, and the term of previous possession be extended from six months to twelve;—that the jurisdiction of the mayor's court at Calcutta be confined to mercantile causes, and a new supreme court of judicature be established in India, consisting of a chief justice and three puisne judges, of the appointment of the crown. Lastly, that a superiority, with respect to all political concernments, be given to the presidency of Bengal over other presidencies in India; the present governor and council being confirmed by the bill, certain other persons added thereto, and a negative upon the future nomination of the Company vested in the crown."

† The Company's petition declares, "That the appointment of officers by Parliament or the crown, to be vested with the whole civil and military authority of the presidency of Bengal, independent of any choice or power of control in the directors or general courts of the said Company, is destructive of their essential rights and interests, and of the most dangerous tendency to the liberty of the subject, from the immense addition of power it must give to the influence of the crown; that the Company have never been acquainted with any charge of delinquency brought against them in Parliament; nor have they been called upon to enter on their defence, although this delinquency is made the ground of the new regulations."

§ Robert Clive, Lord of Plassey, was born at the family seat in Shropshire, in 1725, and educated at several schools, but with so little success, that his father, despairing of his becoming eminent in any profession, obtained him a place as a writer in the India Company's service. But he quitted the desk for the army in 1747, and distinguished himself with so much bravery, at the taking of a fort belonging to the Rajah of Tanjou, as to obtain the post of Commissary General. On his return to Madras he was seized with a nervous fever, and though he recovered, yet the effects ever after remained on his mind. About this time the French, under Dupleix, began to display their ambitious views in India, in procuring Chundasheb to be chosen nabob of Arcot, and by that means gaining the grant of a large territory for themselves. This roused the jealousy of the English, and the war was renewed. The French and their allies, however, gained numerous advantages, and the affairs of the English and their ally, Mohammed Ali Khan, son of the late nabob, appeared to be nearly hopeless, when Clive resumed his military character, as captain, in 1751. Tritchinopoly, the seat of Ali Khan, was then besieged by the French, and Chundasheb, on which Clive's superior genius suggested the advantage of attacking the city of Arcot, and the attempt succeeded beyond expectation. This unexpected circumstance drew off the enemy from Tritchinopoly to retake Arcot, which Clive defended in such a manner that the siege was raised. The success was followed by a series of victories, and the overthrow of the enemy. In 1753, Clive embarked for England, where he was presented by the court of directors with a sword set with diamonds. He returned to India as Governor of Fort St. David, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel; and shortly after he assisted Admiral Watson in reducing Angria the pirate. When Calcutta was taken, Clive went to Bengal and took Fort William. He defeated Su-rajah Dowla at Plassey; and the day following entered Moorshedabad, where he placed Jaffier Ali Cawn on the throne. The Mogul conferred on him the title of Omrah of the empire, with a grant of lands. In 1760 he returned to England, and was made an Irish Peer. In 1764 he went to Bengal as president, where he soon restored tranquillity, and returned home in 1767. In 1769 he was made Knight of the Bath. In 1773 the motion stated above was made; and notwithstanding the resolution of the House in his Lordship's favour, it had so serious an effect on his mind, that in a fit of despondency he soon afterwards terminated his existence. Lord Chatham called him 'a heaven-born general, who, without experience, surpassed all the officers of his time.'"

III. That

III. That an address be presented to his Majesty, desiring that his Majesty would be pleased to acquaint the House by whose advice a measure was undertaken, equally repugnant to the humanity of his Majesty's temper, disgraceful to his arms, and derogatory from the character of the British nation.

These motions were negatived by considerable majorities; but the business would probably have been soon revived, had not intelligence arrived that a treaty of peace had been concluded with the Caribbs, after several fierce encounters, in which the regular troops had severely suffered.

The bill, for the enlargement of the toleration act, was again passed by the House of Commons, in the present session, and was again rejected by the Peers.

A. D. 1774.] A spirit of gloomy and irritable discontent continued to prevail in America, and had burst forth in several instances, the details of which would now excite very little interest.—It has been stated, that, at a very early period of Lord North's administration, the duties on paper, glass, colours, &c. were repealed, the duty on tea being left as a mark of supremacy. The East India Company, finding their stock of tea to accumulate, in consequence of the loss of the American market, became urgent with the minister to repeal the American import duty of three-pence per pound, proposing in lieu thereof to pay double the sum on exportation. Things, however, remained on their old footing till, in the session of 1773, the act passed for allowing the exportation of teas duty-free. The Company, desirous of making a grand effort to relieve themselves, were flattered with the expectation, by becoming their own factors, of regaining possession of the American market; as, when the teas should have been transported across the Atlantic, and lodged in warehouses, the circumstance of their having previously paid the import duty would not, it was thought, impede the Company's sales. The Americans, however, considered this attempt as an artifice and collusion, to inveigle them into the payment of this tax, in order to establish the precedent; and they were firmly and unanimously determined that no such project should succeed. A general meeting was convened at Philadelphia, in which resolutions were passed, "declaring this new ministerial plan of importation to be a violent attack upon the liberties of America, and pronouncing it to be the duty of every American to oppose this attempt; and whoever should directly or indirectly countenance it was an enemy to his country." In the next place a committee was appointed to wait upon the consignees of the Company, and to "request" their resignation; which was complied with. At New York, on the arrival of the tea-ships, in December, they were with difficulty permitted to approach the wharf; and, as at Philadelphia, the consignees were compelled to relinquish their appointments, and the ships returned to England without discharging their cargoes. At Charlestown, after much tumult, the tea was unloaded, but was shortly lodged in damp cellars, where it finally perished. In no place was its delivery to the consignees allowed. At a general meeting of the inhabitants of Boston, the resolutions of the Philadelphians were unanimously adopted, and a committee was appointed to wait upon the consignees, to know whether they would resign their appointments; which they declared not to be in their power. At a subsequent meeting, it was voted with acclamation, "that the tea shall not be landed, that no duty shall be paid, and that it shall be sent back in the same bottoms." On an application from the captain of the Dartmouth Indiaman for a clearance, the Governor replied, "I cannot give you a pass, consistent with the laws and my duty to the King, unless the vessel is properly qualified from the custom-house." This answer being reported to the Assembly, the meeting was declared to be dissolved. All now was tumult and confusion; vast multitudes rushed forward to the quay, and a number of the most resolute, disguised as Mohawk Indians, boarded the vessels, and broke up between three and four hundred chests of tea, and discharged their contents into the sea. Measures of severity were now naturally expected. On the meeting of the general court of Massachusetts, (1774), the House of Representatives, by a new assumption of authority, determined upon an impeachment of the Chief Justice Oliver, for refusing to relinquish the salary settled upon him by the crown—which, with the hope of its augmentation, they affirmed, "must have the effect of a perpetual bribe, and expose him to a violation of his oath—that the acceptance of this salary, unprecedented in all former times, was a breach of his implied engagements on entering into his office; and that, by receiving a grant payable out of the revenue unjustly extorted from the American colonies, he had given a sanction to the injustice, counteracted the petitions of the people, and wickedly endeavoured to increase the discontents and jealousies which had arisen from the grievance." The governor refused to receive this accusation.

The English Parliament met on the 13th of January (1774) and, the ministry not being in possession of the full information from America, the speech from the throne observed a profound silence relative to the late transactions in that part of the globe. On the 7th of March, however, a message from the King informed the two Houses, that "in consequence of the unwarrantable practices carried on in North America, particularly of the violent and outrageous proceedings at the town and port of Boston, with a view of obstructing the commerce of this kingdom, and upon grounds and pretences immediately subversive of its constitution, it was thought fit to lay the whole matter before Parliament—recommending it to their serious consideration, what further regulations or permanent provisions might be necessary to be established." Lord North, in enlarging upon the documents produced on this occasion represented the conduct of the Bostonians in the most offensive light. His Lordship's speech was received with great applause, and firm and vigorous measures were at this crisis thought absolutely necessary. It was accordingly voted, "that an address of thanks should be presented to the King, assuring his Majesty that they would not fail to exert every means in their power of effectually providing for the due execution of the laws, and securing the dependence of the colonies upon the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain."

The minister soon afterwards introduced a bill for discontinuing the lading and shipping of goods, wares, and merchandise, at the town of Boston or the harbour thereof; and for the removal of the Custom-house, &c. to the town of Salem, till the King in council should declare himself satisfied as to the restoration of peace and good order in the town. Whilst this bill was pending, a petition from the natives of America resident in London was presented to the House of Commons, stating, "the deep sorrow with which they understood that this honourable House was about to pass a bill, to punish, with unexampled rigour, the town of Boston, for a trespass committed, by some persons unknown, upon the property of the East-India Company, without the said town's being apprized of any accusation brought against them, or being permitted to hear the evidence or make their defence." This bill, however, was passed, with general approbation; and, soon afterwards, a second bill was introduced, for the better regulating the government of the province of Massachusetts Bay; agreeably to which the nomination of the counsellors, judges, magistrates, and even sheriffs was vested in the crown, and all these officers were made removable at pleasure.* This bill was finally carried by 239 against 64 voices; but, in the House of Lords, it did not pass without

* On this occasion, Mr. Dowdeswell, one of the opposition members, called upon the House to "recollect that the province of Massachusetts had flourished for fourscore years under their old and democratic charter. It was granted in the reign of King William, and breathed a spirit of liberty unknown to modern times. They have increased their possessions and improved their lands to an unexpected and unexampled pitch, and we have reaped the benefit of their labour;—yet you are now," said Mr. Dowdeswell, "going to destroy that very charter which has subsisted to the mutual advantage of both this country and America. The regulations enacted by the bill in question without severe strictures; the division on the general question was 92 against 20; and an animated protest against it was signed by eleven Peers, amongst whom were the Dukes of Richmond and Portland, and the Marquis of Rockingham.

Ministers next brought in a bill for the impartial administration of justice in the province of Massachusetts Bay; which provided, "that, in case any person was indicted in that province for murder, or any other capital offence, and it should appear, by information given on oath to the Governor, that the fact was committed in exercise or aid of magistracy in suppressing riots, and that a fair trial could not be had in the province, he should send the person so indicted to any other colony, or to Great Britain, to be tried; the act to continue in force four years." The opposition to this bill was warm in words, though not vigorous in numbers. Before it passed the Commons, a second petition was presented from the natives of America resident in England, representing in strong and striking terms the fatal effects which this and the former bill were calculated to produce. The petition was ordered to lie upon the table.

The bill having been passed, by great majorities in both Houses, and the recess approaching, many members thought of retiring into the country, when their attention was claimed by another bill, for making more effectual provision for the government of the province of Quebec. It passed the Peers, where it originated, with great facility; but met with strong opposition in the Lower House.* Parliament was prorogued on the 21st of June; on which occasion, his Majesty's speech contained a high eulogium on the measures which had been adopted for the purpose of reclaiming his deluded subjects; and on the temper, firmness, and unanimity, which had been displayed in the deliberations of Parliament.

General Gage, commander of the troops stationed at Boston, having been appointed Governor of the province, arrived in that city in May. The intelligence of the Boston port bill had been received; and on the day succeeding the arrival of the General, a meeting of the inhabitants was convened, to take it into consideration. A resolution was then passed expressing their ideas of the impolicy, injustice, and barbarity of the bill, and inviting the other colonies to join with them in a general agreement to put a stop to all exportation and importation to Great Britain and the West Indies till it should be repealed. Addresses from Virginia, Pennsylvania, the Carolinas, New York, and the other provinces, in a short time arrived, exhorting them to resolution and perseverance; and declaring that they considered Boston as suffering in the common cause. A general congress now became the object of universal desire; and Philadelphia being commodiously situated, it was convened to meet there on the 1st of September. In the interim, combinations were every where entered into to suspend all commercial intercourse with Great Britain; and renouncing all communication with those who should refuse to sign this covenant, notwithstanding a proclamation from General Gage, styling such agreement "an unlawful, hostile, and traitorous combination." An address being presented to the Governor, by the corporation of Boston, in which the rights of the colonies; were asserted in high language, he would not hear it read to the end, declaring it to be an insult to the King and to his government.

The new general court met at Boston, on the 25th of May, when General Gage apprised them of their removal to Salem by the late act, and adjourned the court to the 7th of June, then to meet at Salem. The first business, after the adjournment, was to appoint deputies to the general congress. The Governor, aware of this design, dispatched his Secretary to dissolve the court; but, on his arrival, he found the doors fast locked: knocking aloud for entrance, he was informed that the House was upon very important business, and till it was finished he could not be admitted. He then read the proclamation of dissolution on the stairs leading to the hall of the assembly; but the nomination of deputies having been made, this was considered as an important advantage gained by the assembly.

Drafts of the bills for altering the charter of Massachusetts; for the impartial administration of justice; and for providing quarters for troops in America, arrived about this time at Boston, and were immediately circulated over the continent. The people at large now expressed their conviction that the æra was fast approaching when it would be necessary for them to defend their rights with the edge of the sword. Nothing was to be seen or heard of but purchasing of arms and ammunition, casting of balls, &c. All persons accepting offices under the new acts were declared enemies to their country; the mandamus counsellors, the commissioners of the customs, and all who had made themselves particularly obnoxious by their activity in seconding the measures of government, were compelled to take refuge in Boston; the seat of government at Salem was entirely abandoned; and the government itself seemed as though it had been dissolved.

The general Congress met at Philadelphia, on the 4th of September.† Amongst other measures, they published a Declaration of Rights, to which they conceived themselves entitled by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English constitution, and their several charters or compacts. They also entered into a non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation agreement; and agreed to prepare an address to the people of Great Britain, a memorial to the inhabitants of British America, and a loyal and humble petition to his Majesty.‡ Having finished its deliberations, the Congress dissolved itself, after an uninterrupted session of fifty-two days; its last resolution importing that another Congress should be held the 10th day of May, 1775, unless redress of grievances be previously obtained.§

question were, he affirmed, so bad, that it would be infinitely better to let matters take their course, than attempt the correction of any irregularities by so inadequate and at the same time so violent a remedy. He conjured the House to preserve temper and moderation in their proceedings, and to avoid such harsh and odious exertions of their authority." Lord North, in reply, declared, "that it rested upon the ground of an over-ruling political necessity; and Mr. Jenkinson avowed, as an unquestionable axiom of government, that, in matters of high political regulation, no obligation to hear the parties existed; and that justice was not violated in the present instance by the refusal of evidence."—Colonel Barré declared, that he saw "nothing in these measures but inhumanity, injustice, and wickedness, and he feared that the avenging hand of heaven would fall heavy on this country."

* The leading objects of the bill were, to ascertain the limits of the province, which were now extended far beyond those settled by the proclamation of 1763, including that vast tract of territory southward of the Lakes, and bordering upon the great rivers Ohio and Mississippi; to establish a legislative council, the counsellors to be appointed by the crown, and the office to be held during pleasure; to confirm the French laws and a trial without jury in civil cases; the English laws and a trial by jury in criminal; to secure to the Roman Catholic clergy the legal enjoyment of their tythes from all who were of their own religion. The revenue of the province was consigned in the first instance to the board of treasury, for the support of an unlimited civil list, and the administration of justice; the judges holding their offices and salaries during pleasure.

† This assembly consisted only of fifty-one members, delegated in such proportions from the different colonies as corresponded with their varied extent and population, though each colony had a distinct and separate vote.

‡ In their address to the King, they say, "We ask but for peace, liberty, and safety. We wish not a diminution of the prerogative, nor do we solicit the grant of any new right in our favour. In the magnanimity and justice of your Majesty and Parliament we confide for a redress of our grievances, trusting that when the causes of our apprehensions are removed, our future conduct will prove us not unworthy of the regard we have been accustomed in our happier days to enjoy. And appealing to that Being who thoroughly searches the hearts of his creatures, we solemnly profess that our councils have been influenced by no other motive than a dread of the impending destruction. We implore, therefore, your Majesty, as the loving father of all your people, connected by the same bands of loyalty, faith, and blood, not to suffer the transcendant relation formed by these ties to be further violated in uncertain expectation of effects which, if attained, never can compensate for the calamities through which they must be gained. So may your Majesty enjoy every temporal felicity throughout a long and glorious reign, and your descendants inherit your prosperity and dominions till time shall be no more."

§ In one of the debates respecting the probability and danger of a rupture

The general court of Massachusetts met at Salem on the 5th of October, and voted themselves into a provincial Congress; but the government refused to recognize them, and warned them to desist from their unconstitutional proceedings. To this, little regard was paid; a plan was promptly drawn up for the defence of the province; magazines of ammunition and stores were provided for 12,000 militia, and an enrolment made of a number of "minute men," so called from their engaging to turn out with their arms at a minute's warning. On the approach of winter, the Governor was desirous of providing barracks and clothing for the soldiers; but neither workmen nor necessaries could be procured; and every thing indicated the most determined spirit of animosity and resistance.

The English Parliament, having sat only six years, was unexpectedly dissolved in the month of September, and a new one met on the ensuing 29th of November. His Majesty acquainted them, "that a most daring spirit of resistance and disobedience still prevailed in the province of Massachusetts Bay, and had broke forth in fresh violences of a very criminal nature; that the most proper and effectual measures had been taken to prevent these mischiefs; and that they might depend upon a firm resolution to withstand every attempt to weaken or impair the supreme authority of this legislature over all the dominions of the crown." The address, in the Commons, produced a warm and animated debate; but the proposed amendment, "that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to communicate the letters, orders, and instructions, relative to the execution of the late acts," was negatived by 264 against 73. In the Lords the numbers were 63 against 13; but a protest against the address was entered by the minority.

It is remarkable, however, notwithstanding the high tone of the King's opening speech, that, previously to the recess, all discussion of the affairs of America was studiously avoided; that the estimates were formed entirely upon a peace establishment; that the land tax was continued at three shillings; that no vote of credit was required; that the army remained on its former footing; and, that a reduction of 4,000 seamen took place from the 20,000 voted lasted year.*

On the 20th of January, 1775—the first day of the meeting after the recess,—Lord Dartmouth laid before the Peers the official papers belonging to his department. The plan of ministerial operation had been finally settled—not, however, it is understood, without considerable opposition in the cabinet. The Earl of Chatham had formed a resolution to attend the House, if possible, on this memorable day, to make one more powerful effort to avert the calamity, the danger, and the ruin which he saw impending over the country, by moving an address to the King, for conciliation with America.† His Lordship's motion was ably seconded and supported by Lord Camden; but the language of the rupture with Great Britain, a leading member of Congress rose up and said, "I should advise persisting in our struggle, though it were revealed from Heaven that nine hundred and ninety-nine were to perish in the contest, and one only of a thousand to survive, and retain his liberty."

* Lord Sandwich, first Lord of the Admiralty, declared in the House, that he "knew" the low establishment proposed would be fully sufficient for reducing the colonies to obedience. He spoke in terms the most contemptuous both of the power and the courage of the Americans; asserting, that "they were neither disciplined nor capable of discipline; and that, formed of such materials, and so indisposed to encounter danger, their numbers would only add to the facility of the defeat."

† The House was remarkably full; and when his Lordship rose to speak, a death-like silence prevailed. Inspired as it were by his subject, dignified and graceful in decay, his language, his voice, his gesture, were such as seemed to characterize him as the guardian genius of his country. "Too well apprized," said he, "of the contents of the papers now at last laid before the House, he would not take up their Lordships' time in tedious and fruitless investigations, but would seize the first moment to open the door of reconcilement;—for, said he, every moment of delay is a moment of danger. As I have not, said his Lordship, the honour of access to his Majesty, I will endeavour to transmit to him, through the constitutional channel of this House, my ideas of America, to rescue him from the mis-advice of his present ministers. America, my Lords, cannot be reconciled, she ought not to be reconciled to this country till the troops of Britain are withdrawn from the continent; they are a bar to all confidence, they are a source of perpetual irritation, they threaten a fatal catastrophe. How can America trust you, with the bayonet at her breast? How can she suppose that you mean less than bondage or death? I therefore, my Lords, move that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, most humbly to advise and beseech his Majesty, 'that, in order to open the way towards a happy settlement of the dangerous troubles in America, it may graciously please his Majesty to transmit orders to General Gage for removing his Majesty's forces from the town of Boston.' I know not, my Lords, who advised the present measures; I know not who advises to a perseverance and enforcement of them; but this I will say, that the authors of such advice ought to answer it at their utmost peril. I wish, my Lords, not to lose a day in this urgent pressing crisis;—an hour now lost in allaying ferments in America may produce years of calamity. Never will I desert, in any stage of its progress, the conduct of this momentous business. Unless fettered to my bed by the extremity of sickness, I will give it unremitted attention. I will knock at the gates of this sleeping and confounded ministry, and will, if it be possible, rouse them to a sense of their danger. The recall of your army I urge as necessarily preparatory to the restoration of your peace. By this it will appear that you are disposed to treat amicably and equitably, and to consider, revise, and repeal, if it should be found necessary, as I affirm it will, those violent acts and declarations which have disseminated confusion throughout the empire. Resistance to these acts was necessary, and therefore just; and your vain declarations of the omnipotence of Parliament, and your imperious doctrines of the necessity of submission, will be found equally impotent to convince or enslave America, who feels that tyranny is equally intolerable, whether it be exercised by an individual part of the legislature, or by the collective bodies which compose it. The means of enforcing this thraldom are found to be as ridiculous and weak in practice as they are unjust in principle. Conceiving of General Gage as a man of humanity and understanding; entertaining, as I ever must, the highest respect and affection for the British troops; I feel the most anxious sensibility for their situation, pining in inglorious inactivity. You may call them an army of safety and of defence, but they are in truth an army of impotence and contempt; and to make the folly equal to the disgrace, they are an army of irritation and vexation. Allay then the ferment prevailing in America, by removing the obnoxious hostile cause. If you delay concession till your vain hope shall be accomplished of triumphantly dictating reconciliation, you delay for ever: the force of this country would be disproportionately exerted against a brave, generous, and united people, with arms in their hands and courage in their hearts—three millions of people, the genuine descendants of a valiant and pious ancestry, driven to those deserts by the narrow maxims of a superstitious tyranny. But is the spirit of persecution never to be appeased? Are the brave sons of those brave forefathers to inherit their sufferings as they have inherited their virtues? Are they to sustain the infliction of the most oppressive and unexampled severity, beyond what history has related, or poetry has feigned?

——— Rhadamanthus habet durissima regna,
Castigatque, auditque, dolos.

But the Americans must not be heard; they have been condemned unheard. The indiscriminate hand of vengeance has devoted thirty thousand British subjects of all ranks, ages, and descriptions, to one common ruin. You may no doubt destroy their cities; you may cut them off from the superfluities, perhaps the conveniences of life; but, my Lords, they will still despise your power, for they have yet remaining their woods and their liberty. What though you march from town to town, from province to province, though you should be able to enforce a temporary and local submission, how shall you be able to secure the obedience of the country you leave behind you, in your progress of eighteen hundred miles of continent animated with the same spirit of liberty and of resistance! This universal opposition to your arbitrary system of taxation might have been foreseen: it was obvious from the nature of things and from the nature of man, and, above all, from the confirmed habits of thinking, from the spirit of Whiggism flourishing in America. The spirit which now pervades America is the same which formerly opposed loans, benevolences, and ship-money in this country; the same spirit which roused all England to action at the Revolution; and which established at a remote æra your liberties on the basis of that great fundamental maxim of the constitution, that no subject of England shall be taxed but by his own consent. What shall oppose this spirit, aided by the congenial flame glowing in the breast of every generous Briton? To maintain this principle is the common cause of the Whigs on the other side of the Atlantic and on this; it is liberty to liberty engaged. In this great cause they are immovably allied; it is the alliance of God and nature, immutable, eternal, fixed as the firmament of heaven. As an Englishman, I recognize to the Americans their supreme unalterable right of property. As an American, I would equally recognize to England her supreme right of regulating commerce and navigation. This distinction is involved in the abstract nature of things; property is private, individual, absolute; the touch of another annihilates it. Trade is an extended and complicated consideration; it reaches as far as ships can sail or winds can blow; it is a vast and various machine. To regulate the numberless movements of it several parts, and combine them into one harmonious effect, for the good of the whole, requires the superintending wisdom and energy of the supreme power of the empire. On this grand practical distinction then let us rest;—taxation is theirs, commercial regulation is ours. As to the metaphysical refinements, attempting to show that the Americans are equally free from legislative controul and commercial restraint, as from taxation for the purpose of revenue, I pronounce them futile, frivolous, and groundless. When your Lord-the Cabinet Lords was high and decisive; it was declared, that the mother country should never relax till America confessed her supremacy, and obedience must be enforced by arms; and the motion was finally rejected by 68 voices against 18.* This great majority, however, did not discourage Lord Chatham from persisting in his exertions for restoring peace to the empire; and, early in February, he proposed a bill, under the title of "A Provisional Act for settling the Troubles in America, and for asserting the supreme authority and superintending power of Great Britain over the colonies." This bill, which comprehended a vast extent of matter, and seemed to require much separate discussion, was negatived, by 61 against 32.—On the following day, Lord North moved, in the Commons, an address to the King, "To return thanks for the communication of the American papers, and to declare, that having taken them into their most serious consideration, they find that a rebellion at this time actually exists in the province of Massachusetts Bay; which was affirmed to be the more inexcusable, from reflecting with how much temper his Majesty and the Parliament had acted in support of the laws and constitution of Great Britain; and solemnly assuring his Majesty, that it is their fixed resolution, at the hazard of their lives and fortune, to support his Majesty, against all rebellious attempts, in the maintenance of his just rights and those of the two Houses of Parliament." A vehement debate ensued, and an amendment was proposed by Mr. Fox. Omitting all but the preliminary words, he moved to substitute the following: "But deploring that the information which the papers laid before them had afforded, served only to convince the House that the measures taken by his Majesty's servants tended rather to widen than to heal the unhappy differences between Great Britain and America, and praying an alteration in the same." The amendment was rejected, by 304 voices against 105; but, on receiving the report, Lord John Cavendish moved for its recommitment, and a second warm debate took place, when the numbers were 288 against 106. The next day, a conference was held with the Lords, to propose their Lordships' joining in this address. The debate which followed, in the Lords, was equally violent with that in the Commons; and, to the unbounded surprise of the House, Lord Mansfield declared, "that the imposition of the port duties of 1767 was a measure the most absurd and pernicious that could be devised, and the cause of all our present and impending evils." Lord Shelburne, Lord Camden, and the Duke of Grafton, also severally declared, that they had no share in that measure, and had never given it their approbation. The Marquis of Rockingham, who had petitions from the American and West India merchants to present to the House, moved the previous question, that the allegations of the merchants might be heard, before any decisive step should be taken; but on the division it was negatived by 104 against 29, and the original motion, for uniting with the Commons in the address, was put, and agreed to.

Lord North next moved for a bill to restrain the trade and commerce of the New England provinces, and to prohibit them from carrying on the fisheries on the banks of Newfoundland. This, as a measure of political necessity, was agreed to.

Before this bill had passed, Lord North announced a conciliatory proposition, which he introduced by a speech, in which he affirmed the offer to be founded on that passage of the late address, which declared, that "whenever any of the colonies shall make a proper application to Parliament, we shall be ready to afford them every just and reasonable indulgence.†

The intention of the minister is allowed, even by his enemies, to have been just and laudable; but the opposition treated the proposition as nugatory, insidious, and ridiculous; and the partisans of administration, still known as the Bedford party, exclaimed against the motion, as a total abandonment of principle, as in direct opposition to the address, as a contradiction to all the acts and declarations of Parliament, as a virtual acknowledgment of injury, and as a mean prevarication, which could tend to no other purpose than to sacrifice the dignity of that House. They declared that they would make no concessions to rebels with arms in their hands; nor agree to any terms of conciliation, in which an express and definitive acknowledgment of the supremacy of Parliament should not be a preliminary article. Amidst the tumult occasioned by this motion, the solicitor general, Wedderburne, affirmed, "That it was far from the design of the proposition to assent to a dereliction of the rights of Parliament, or to yield in any degree to the insolence of the Americans; but, on ships have perused the papers transmitted us from America, when you consider the dignity, the firmness, and the wisdom with which the Americans have acted, you cannot but respect their cause. History, my Lords, has been my favourite study, and in the celebrated writings of antiquity have I often admired the patriotism of Greece and Rome; but, my Lords, I must declare and avow, that, in the master states of the world, I know not the people, or the senate, who, in such a complication of difficult circumstances, can stand in preference to the delegates of America assembled in general congress in Philadelphia. I trust it is obvious to your Lordships, that all attempts to impose servitude upon such men, to establish despotism over such a mighty continental nation, must be in vain, must be futile. Can such a national principled union be resisted by the tricks of office or ministerial manœuvres? Heaping papers on the table, or counting your majorities on a division, will not avert or postpone the hour of danger. It must arrive, my Lords, unless these fatal acts are done away; it must arrive in all its horrors; and then these boastful ministers, in spite of all their confidence and all their manœuvres, shall be compelled to hide their heads. But it is not repealing this or that act of Parliament, it is not repealing a piece of parchment, that can restore America to your bosom; you must repeal her fears and resentments, and then you may hope for her love and gratitude. But now, insulted with an armed force, irritated with an hostile array before her eyes, her concessions, if you could force them, would be suspicious and insecure. But it is more than evident that you cannot force them to your unworthy terms of submission; it is impossible; we ourselves shall be forced ultimately to retract; let us retreat while we can, not when we must. I repeat it, my Lords, we shall one day be forced to undo these violent oppressive acts; they must be repealed, you will repeal them; I pledge myself for it, that you will in the end repeal them; I stake my reputation on it; I will consent to be taken for an idiot if they are not repealed. Avoid then this humiliating disgraceful necessity. With a dignity becoming your exalted situation, make the first advances to concord, to peace, and to happiness. Concession comes with better grace and more salutary effect from superior power; it reconciles superiority of power with the feelings of man, and establishes solid confidence on the foundation of affection and gratitude. On the other hand, every danger and every hazard impend to deter you from perseverance in the present ruinous measures; foreign war hanging over your heads by a slight and brittle thread; France and Spain watching your conduct, waiting for the maturity of your errors, with a vigilant eye to America and the temper of your colonies, more than to their own concerns, be they what they may. To conclude, my Lords, if the ministers thus persevere in misadvising and misleading the King, I will not say that they can alienate the affections of his subjects from the crown; but I affirm, they will make the crown not worth his wearing. I will not say that the King is betrayed, but I will pronounce that the kingdom is undone."

* In the Commons the American papers were referred to a committee of the whole House, on the 26th of January, 1775; previously to which, petitions were presented from the merchants of London, Bristol, Glasgow, &c. which, by a ruse d'etat were consigned to a separate committee, to meet on the 27th of January; the day after the House must have come to a final decision on the grand question. The petition from the American congress to the King having been referred, amidst the common mass of paper, to the House, the American agents, Mr. Bollan, Dr. Franklin, and Mr. Lee, petitioned the House to be heard at the bar in its support. The ministers, however, alledged, "that the congress was no legal body; and to hear evidence on the subject of their petition would be giving that illegal body some degree of countenance:—that with respect to the pretended grievances alledged in the petition, the House could hear the colonies only through their legal assemblies, and their agents properly authorised; and that any deviations from this rule would destroy the whole order of colony government." The petition was rejected by 218 against 68.

† The proposition was as follows:—"That when the governor, council, and assembly or general court of his Majesty's provinces, or colonies, shall propose to make provision according to their respective conditions, circumstances, and situation, for contributing their proportion to the common defence, such proportion to be raised under the authority of the general court or general assembly of such province, or colony, and disposable by Parliament; and shall engage to make provision also for the support of the civil government, and the administration of justice in such province or colony; it will be proper if such proposal should be approved of by his Majesty in Parliament, and for so long as such provision shall be made accordingly, to forbear, in respect of such province or colony, to levy any duties, tax, or assessment, or to propose any further duty, tax, or assessment, except only such duties as it may be expedient to propose for the regulation of commerce; the net produce of the duties last mentioned to be carried to the account of such province, colony, or plantation respectively."

the contrary, it held forth a more wise and effectual method of enforcing the claims of the one, and repressing the arrogance of the other." Sir Gilbert Elliot reconciled the apparent deviation of the motion from the tenor of the address, and the other measures of administration, by observing that the address contained two correspondent lines of conduct; the one to repress rebellion, protect loyalty, and enforce the laws; the other, to afford indulgence to those who would return to their duty. Lord North, alarmed at the idea of a minority, acquiesced in this explanation; adding, that his motion was founded on the well known maxim, "Divide et impera!"—that he had never expected the Americans would embrace this proposal, but that it was intended to disunite the colonies and unite the people of England." The question was then carried, by 274 against 88; and a second bill, "To restrain the trade of the colonies of East and West Jersey, Pensylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, and the counties on the Delawar," was passed almost without opposition.

On the 22d of March, with the view of effecting a peace, upon a solid and rational basis, Mr. Burke moved a series of thirteen propositions, which he enforced by a most able and eloquent speech. These resolutions went to recognize the legal competency of the colonial assemblies for all the various purposes of taxation; to acknowledge that this legal competency had had a just and beneficial exercise; and that experience had shewn the benefit of their grants, and the futility of Parliamentary taxation as a method of supply. Some of the propositions related to the settlement of an independent judicature; to the regulation of the courts of Admiralty, and to the repeal of the late coercive acts of Parliament. The previous question, however, was moved on the first resolution, and carried, in favour of ministers, by 270 voices against 78; and the remainder were negatived without a division.

A few days afterwards Mr. Hartley moved, "That letters of requisition should be issued, agreeably to ancient precedent under authority of the crown, with a view to procure a permanent and voluntary contribution from the several colonies towards the general expences of the empire." This motion was also negatived without a division.* On the 15th of May, Mr. Burke presented to the House of Commons a paper intituled "A Representation and Remonstrance from the general assembly of New York;" a province which had been considered less disaffected than any other, which, with North Carolina, had refused an unreserved acquiescence in the resolutions of the congress, and had not been included in the late restraining acts. The remonstrance, however, was rejected, as containing claims inconsistent with the authority of Britain; a rejection which completed that union which it seemed to be the policy of government to prevent. At the close of the session, his Majesty expressed "the most perfect satisfaction in the conduct of his Parliament, and his entire conviction that the most salutary effects must result from such measures formed and conducted on such principles."

In the spring of this year, General Gage having received intelligence of a considerable magazine, at Concord, about twenty miles from Boston, where the provincial congress was also held, detached, on the night of the 18th of April, 800 grenadiers and light infantry, under the command of Colonel Smith. They proceeded with great silence; but by the firing of guns and ringing of bells they perceived that they were discovered; and on their arrival at Lexington, at five on the morning of the 19th, they found the company of militia belonging to that place drawn up on the green. Major Pitcairn, who led the advanced guard, cried out, "Disperse, rebels! down with your arms, and disperse!" This not being immediately complied with, he ordered the soldiers to fire; when eight or ten of the provincials were killed, and the others precipitately retreated. The King's troops immediately marched on to Concord, destroyed such stores as they found, and spiked three or four pieces of cannon. On their return, the passage of a bridge was disputed, when a skirmish ensued, in which several were killed on both sides. The whole country was now alarmed; and, had not General Gage, apprehensive of the danger of the service, early in the morning, ordered Lord Percy, with a second detachment, to march to Lexington, Colonel Smith would have found great difficulty in forcing his way back to Boston. In the course of the day, during their retreat, the loss of the King's troops was estimated at nearly 300 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, while that of the provincials, it is said, did not exceed 90. A few days afterwards, the provincial Congress of Massachusetts resolved, that 30,000 men be forthwith raised, of which Generals Ward, Putnam,† Heath, and Thomas, were appointed to the command; and a strong military force collecting in the vicinity of Boston, formed the entire blockade of that town.

In the month of May, the general Congress met at Philadelphia, where they passed resolutions for raising a continental army, and for establishing a paper currency; declaring, also, that by the violation of the charter of Massachusett's bay, the compact between the crown and that colony had been dissolved. The provinces of New York and North Carolina now likewise declared their resolution to unite with the others in every effort to retain their rights and liberties.

The Generals Howe, Burgoyne, and Clinton, having arrived at Boston, with large reinforcements, the force stationed in that neighbourhood was now about 10,000 men. General Gage issued a proclamation, offering a pardon to all who should lay down their arms; excepting only Samuel Adams and John Hancock. Those who did not accept of the proffered mercy were declared rebels and traitors, and martial law was established. The Congress immediately chose the proscribed Mr. Hancock their president; and, at the same time George Washington, Esq. was chosen General and commander-in-chief of the continental army; Horatio Gates, Esq. was appointed Adjutant-General; and Artemas Ward, and Charles Lee, Esqrs. first and second Major-Generals. The last of these officers was a man of extraordinary and eccentric genius, who had served with great reputation in Portugal and elsewhere during the last war. Passionately attached to the principle of democratic liberty, rather from a proud disdain of superiority than from the pure and genuine ardour of benevolence—on the prospect of a war with the colonies, he had resigned his commission in the British army, and immediately offered his services to Congress, by whom they were gladly accepted; and on his military talents, skill, and experience, they justly placed very great dependence.

The British commanders had formed a plan to possess themselves of the heights of Dorchester, southward of the town; but, on the morning of the 16th of June, they found that a redoubt, breast work, and entrenchment had been thrown up in the night, on an eminence called Bunker's hill, to the north of Boston, on a peninsula divided by a narrow channel from that on which the town of Boston itself stands. It was immediately determined to attack this post; and a detachment of 3000 chosen troops, under the command of General Howe, ascended the hill with great resolution, but with slow and deliberate step. The Americans, under General Putnam, reserving themselves till the British forces were within ten or twelve rods, suddenly poured in a tremendous fire, which threw them into great disorder. Rallied, however, by the exertions of their officers, they again advanced, till a second discharge renewed the confusion. The Generals Howe and Clinton, placing themselves at the head of the troops, for a time almost unsupported, led them to a third attack. The assault was most furious; the redoubt was carried; and the Americans were compelled to retreat across the Isthmus, to Cambridge, with the loss of about 450 men. On the part of the British, however, about 1100 were killed or wounded, and amongst them 89 officers, who were particularly aimed at by the American riflemen.*

* About this time the city of London presented another address, remonstrance, and petition, distinguished by the circumstance of being delivered to his Majesty by Mr. Wilkes, as Lord Mayor, to which office he had been elected at the close of the preceding year. His Majesty's answer was as follows: "It is with the utmost astonishment that I find any of my subjects capable of encouraging the rebellious disposition which unhappily exists in some of my colonies in North America. Having entire confidence in my Parliament, the great council of the nation, I will steadily pursue those measures which they have recommended for the support of the constitutional rights of Great Britain, and the protection of the commercial interests of my kingdoms."

† General Putnam, who had served under Lord Amherst, had since retired to a remote farm; and when the intelligence of his appointment was notified to him, he was found, in a leathern frock and apron, employed amongst his labourers. He instantly laid down his spade, and, within eighteen hours, he was at the head quarters at Lexington, nearly a hundred miles distant.

Early in July, General Washington arrived at the head-quarters near Boston; which, with Bunker's-hill, now occupied by the English, continued to be closely invested. The American army was at this time suffering under every species of privation, and extremely deficient in powder, ammunition, and military stores of every kind; but, from some unaccountable cause, no attempt was made by the English generals to molest them.† Georgia having now acceded to the confederacy, which henceforward assumed the appellation of the Thirteen United Colonies, they issued a declaration setting forth the causes and necessity of their taking up arms, which was read at the head of every regiment, and received with great applause. At the same time, the Congress resolved upon a second petition to the King, which was transmitted to England through the medium of Mr. Penn, proprietary governor of the province of Pennsylvania. To this petition, however, no answer was given.

Hopes had been entertained, that the Canadians might be induced to take an active part in this war against America; and 20,000 stand of arms were, in that expectation, actually sent to Quebec. The militia of the province, however, absolutely refused to pass their own limits; declaring, that this was a quarrel which did not concern them, and in which they were determined to take no part. A project was, in consequence formed by the Americans for the invasion of that province; and General Montgomery, with an army of 3000 men, having been appointed to conduct this expedition, immediately proceeded to St. John's, on the banks of Lake Champlain, before which he encamped in the middle of September. After a very gallant defence, that important fortress was surrendered on the 2d of November. General Montgomery had succeeded in reducing a great part of the province, when he was killed, in attempting to carry Quebec by assault; and Colonel Arnold, the second in command, having been dangerously wounded, the Americans withdrew to some distance, and converted the siege of Quebec into a blockade.

Lord Dunmore, the governor of Virginia, having found it impracticable to appease the disputes which had long subsisted between him and the people, was induced to take refuge on board the Fowey man of war, in the month of June; and attempted to transfer thither the sittings of the assembly—a requisition with which the legislative body refused compliance. His Lordship then proclaimed martial law, and immediate emancipation to all negroes and indented servants able and willing to bear arms in his Majesty's service—a measure which caused great irritation and resentment. At length, a demand was made by the shipping in the bay of the Chesapeak, to the inhabitants of the town of Norfolk, for supplies for his Majesty's service. This being peremptorily refused, a heavy cannonade was by order of the governor commenced against the town, which, in a few hours, was reduced to ashes. The loss was estimated at 300,000*l.* In the Carolinas, Lord William Campbell and Governor Martin, were also compelled to withdraw for safety on board the King's ships lying off the coast. In Pennsylvania, a military association was established throughout the province; and a similar spirit seemed to pervade the whole chain of colonies. In Massachusett's bay, the town of Falmouth, from similar causes of offence with that of Norfolk, was set on fire, and destroyed by a tremendous cannonade.

The garrison of Boston was maintained at a heavy expence by supplies from England, a great proportion of which was intercepted by the American cruisers. Towards the end of February (1776,) General Washington determined to take possession of the heights of Dorchester, situated in a peninsula stretching into the bay to the south of Boston. This design ultimately succeeded; the English were compelled to evacuate the town; and, early in the morning of the 17th of March, the whole of the troops, with such of the inhabitants as were attached to the royal cause, put to sea on board the transports lying in the harbour. After a tempestuous and dangerous voyage, they landed safely at Halifax. On the following day, General Washington entered Boston in triumph, and found there a great quantity of stores and provisions which the British commander had not been able either to remove or to destroy.‡

At the meeting of Parliament, on the 26th of October, the conduct of the colonies was mentioned with much severity of remark in the King's opening speech. The Duke of Grafton, whose attempts to effect a reconciliation between England and America had failed, had previously given in his resignation.§ On the motion for the usual address to the throne, Lord Rockingham moved an amendment, condemning, most pointedly, the proposed measures of coercion. In this, he was warmly supported by the Duke of Grafton; but the amendment was negatived, by a large majority, as was an amendment, of a similar nature, moved for in the House of Commons.

The Duke of Richmond (November 10) moved for the examination of Mr. Penn, at the bar of the House of Lords; which, having been agreed to,‖ the Duke moved,

* This was one of the warmest and most bloody conflicts ever known. for the time it lasted; the number of British troops engaged was 3000; that of the Americans was estimated at 4000. During the action, Charlestown, on the opposite peninsula, containing several hundred houses, was set on fire by the English forces, and entirely consumed.

† It is deserving of remark, that the general Congress had, in the beginning of June, come to a resolution, that the colonies of America would not only continue to grant extraordinary aids in time of war, but also, if allowed a free commerce, pay into the sinking fund such a sum annually for a hundred years, as should be more than sufficient in that time, if faithfully applied, to extinguish all the present debts of Britain. The intelligence, however, at this period, arriving of the prohibitory and other acts of the English Parliament, it was not suffered to be entered upon the minutes.

‡ Previously to this, the Oneidas and other Indian nations had sent to the Congress a deputation of their chiefs and warriors, who, in their simple, yet poetical stile, disclosed the purport of their commission in the following terms:—"Brothers! we have heard of the unhappy differences and great contention between you and old England. We wonder greatly, and are troubled in our minds. Brothers, possess your minds in peace respecting us Indians. We cannot intermeddle in this dispute between two brothers. The quarrel seems to us unnatural. You are two brothers of one blood; we bear an equal affection to both. Should the great King apply to us for aid, we shall deny him: if the colonies apply, we shall refuse. We Indians cannot find or recollect in the traditions of our ancestors a case similar to this. Brothers, were it an alien that had struck you, we should look into the matter. We hope, through the wise government and good pleasure of God, your distresses may be soon removed, and the dark clouds be dispersed. Brothers, as we have declared for peace, we desire you will not apply to our Indian brethren for assistance. Let us Indians be all of one mind, and you white people settle your disputes between yourselves." Many of the tribes, however, bordering on the great lakes and rivers, were afterwards prevailed upon, to take part with the English.

§ On the resignation of his grace, Lord Dartmouth was advanced to the dignity of Lord Privy Seal; and Lord George Germaine, so notorious as Lord George Sackville, was appointed to the vacant post of Secretary of State for the colonies. Lord Rochford also retiring, Viscount Weymouth was reinstated in the office of secretary for the southern department.

‖ On this occasion, Mr. Penn declared his firm belief, "That the Congress had hitherto entertained no designs of independency; that the members of that assembly were men of character, fairly elected, and fully competent to declare the sense of their constituents; that the different provinces would certainly be governed by their decisions; that the war was levied and carried on by the colonists, merely in defence of what they conceived to be their undoubted rights and liberties; that the spirit of resistance was general, and that they believed moved, "That the petition from the continental congress to the King was ground for a conciliation of the unhappy differences subsisting between Great Britain and America." This motion was negatived by 86 against 33 voices.

Lord North having moved, in the Commons, that the land tax for the ensuing year, be four shillings in the pound, the country gentlemen were congratulated by the opposition on this additional taxation, as the first fruits of their scheme for the coercion of America; and it was predicted, that below the present level the land tax would never again be reduced. Irritated by the increase of the tax, and by the bitter sarcasms by which it was accompanied, and displeased also with the language now held by Lord North, "that the contest was not for taxation but for sovereignty," the country members declared, that "they had supported government in its plans of coercion, in the firm persuasion that their burthens would be eventually diminished by a great revenue to be drawn from America; but if the idea of a revenue were abandoned, they could not think of expending any more money in a contest attended with so many evils, and wholly unproductive of benefit; and they would therefore oppose the noble Lord's motion for the increase of the land tax." His Lordship, however, immediately assured them, "that the idea of taxation, and of levying a productive revenue from America, was never abandoned; and that when any thing of that sort was affirmed, nothing more was meant than that it was dropped for the present; taxation being a matter of secondary consideration only, when the supremacy of the country was at stake. He even declared, that no means existed by which the legislative authority and commercial controul of this country over the colonies could be insured, but by combining them with taxation." The motion was now carried by a great majority.

On the 15th of November, several motions made in the Upper House by the Duke of Grafton, for estimates to be laid before the House respecting the state of the army in America, and the addition of force necessary for the service of the ensuing campaign, were negatived without a division; and, on the day following, Mr. Burke, in the Commons, moved for leave to bring in a bill "for quieting the present troubles in America." The great object of the bill, he said, was "a renunciation of the exercise of taxation, without at all interfering with the question of right; it preserved the power of levying duties for the regulation of commerce; but the money so raised (agreeably to an excellent idea suggested by the conciliatory motion of Lord North) was to be at the disposal of the several general assemblies. The tea duty of 1767 was to be repealed, and a general amnesty granted." This plan, though it met with a less unfavourable reception than any hitherto attempted, was negatived by a majority in the proportion of two to one.

Soon afterwards, Lord North brought in his Prohibitory bill, interdicting all trade and intercourse with the Thirteen United Colonies. All property of Americans, whether of ships or goods, on the high seas or in harbour, was by this measure declared forfeited to the captors. This, the opposition affirmed to be a formal act of abdication of our government over the colonies; it drove the two countries to the fatal extremity of absolute conquest on the one side, or absolute independency on the other. The repeal of the Boston Port, and Fishery-restraining acts, being included in this bill, as superseded by its operation, Mr. Fox moved an amendment, to leave out the whole title and body of the bill excepting the parts relative to such repeal. This amendment was rejected by 192 against 64 voices. In the Lords, the bill was again strongly combated, but without effect.*

The assembly of Nova Scotia had transmitted a petition to Parliament, presented to the House on the first day of the session, by the Speaker, founded on the basis of Lord North's conciliatory proposition; and it was now moved by his Lordship, that the proposal of a poundage duty ad valorem upon all commodities imported, not being the produce of the British dominions in Europe or America, to be diposed of by Parliament, should be accepted, and the duty fixed at eight per cent. in lieu of all other taxes; and in reward of this overture, the act of Navigation itself was in part dispensed with in their favour, and they were allowed to import oranges, lemons, &c. directly from the place of their growth and produce. No bill, however, was brought forward in consequence of these resolutions.

A. D. 1776.] The Earl of Harcourt, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, had recently proposed to the Parliament of that kingdom, on the part of his Majesty, who had pledged his royal word, "that twelve thousand regular troops on that establishment should always remain stationary in that country; requesting four thousand of the said troops to be employed in the service of Great Britain, and engaging that Ireland should be relieved from the expense of the same; and also, that the said troops should be replaced, if desired, by four thousand foreign Protestant troops, to be likewise paid by Great Britain." After the Christmas recess, a motion was made in the English House of Commons, by Mr. Thomas Townshend, "that the Earl of Harcourt was herein chargeable with a breach of privilege, and had acted in derogation of the authority of that House, and that a committee be appointed to inquire into the same." It was urged, "that it was the highest presumption in the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to engage for the payment of any specific sums by the Parliament of Great Britain; and much worse to pledge the Parliament to the fulfillment of a contract so absurd and extravagant as to defray the expence of eight thousand men for the service of four thousand; and the design of introducing foreign troops into Ireland was represented as fraught with danger and mischief." The minister seemed embarrassed on this occasion; but, Mr. Jenkinson, and others, insisted upon the King's right of introducing foreign forces into any part of his dominions, when the exigencies of the state rendered it expedient or necessary. That part of the motion which went to the appointment of a committee of inquiry was negatived by 224 against 106, and the previous question, on the clause of censure, was carried without a division.

On the 20th of February, Mr. Fox moved, "that it be referred to a committee, to inquire into the ill success of his Majesty's arms in America." This motion was rejected by 240 against 104 voices. The treaties with the Landgrave of Hesse, the Duke of Brunswick, &c. for hiring large bodies of their troops for the American service, amounting to about eighteen thousand men, having been laid before the House, and a motion made by the minister for referring them to a committee of supply, a vehement debate ensued; but the question was carried, in favour of the ministers, by 242 against 88 voices. The same question experienced a similar delieved themselves able to defend their liberties against the arms of Great Britain; that the colonies had been greatly dissatisfied with the reception of their former petitions, but had formed great hopes on the success of that brought over by him, which was stiled by them 'The Olive Branch,' and that he had been congratulated by his friends upon his being the bearer of it: that it was greatly to be feared, that, if conciliatory measures were not speedily pursued, they would form connections with foreign powers, and that such connections, once made, it would be found very difficult to dissolve. He affirmed, that the prevailing wish of America was restoration of friendship with England; but that the most intelligent men on the continent were of opinion, that a rejection of the present petition would prove an insuperable bar to reconcilement. He said, that the Americans were well satisfied with the repeal of the Stamp act, notwithstanding the declaratory law which accompanied it, and if no innovations had been afterwards made, they would have remained content; that they would allow the imperial authority of Great Britain, but not its right of taxation."

* Lord Mansfield remarked, "That we had passed the Rubicon, and were not now at liberty to consider the questions of original right or wrong, justice, or injustice. We were engaged in a war, and we must use our utmost efforts to obtain the ends proposed by it." Quoting the laconic speech of a gallant officer in the army of Gustavus Adolphus, who, pointing to the enemy, said to his men, "See you those lads! Kill them, or they will kill you," his Lordship affirmed the sentiment to be applicable to the present case. "If we do not get the better of America, America will get the better of us.—Are we to stand idle because we are told this is an unjust war, and wait till they have brought their arms to our very doors? The justice of the cause must give way to our present situation."

cision in the House of Peers. A demand, made by the Secretary of War for the sum of 845,000*l.* for army extraordinaries, was also carried by 180 against 57. On the 14th of March, the Duke of Grafton moved "for an address to the King, that, in order to prevent the further effusion of blood, a proclamation might be issued, declaring, that if the colonies shall present a petition to the commissioners appointed under the late act, setting forth what they consider to be their just rights and real grievances, that in such a case his Majesty will consent to a suspension of arms; and that assurance shall be given them, that their petition shall be received, considered, and answered." The noble moverobserved, "that the adoption of the present motion, or of something equivalent, seemed to be absolutely necessary, from two circumstances. The first was the doctrine of unconditional submission: it was the object of the present motion to disarm the Americans of the rage and horror which this doctrine had excited in their minds; and to inculcate the idea that there were terms and conditions implying mutual concessions, on which a satisfactory and lasting accommodation might be founded, and their constitutional rights secured. The second circumstance was the certain notice which his Grace had himself received, that the two French gentlemen, charged, as there was good reason to believe, with a commission of high and momentous import, had lately been introduced by General Washington to the Congress, with whom conferences had been actually commenced. Thus a direct interference on the part of foreign powers in our civil contentions had undoubtedly taken place, and from a most dangerous and hostile quarter. No time was, therefore, to be lost to counteract its effects, and upon the decision of the present moment the fate of the empire depended." The Lords in administration, however, avowed and vindicated the doctrine of unconditional submission; asserted the impossibility of an effectual resistance on the part of America; and declared their utter disregard and disbelief of any interference on the part of France, or any other foreign power, which, possessing colonies of its own, could never be so devoid of policy as to encourage the spirit of revolt in those of another nation. The motion was ultimately rejected by 91 voices against 31.

Parliament was prorogued on the 23d of May, by a speech, in which the King intimated "his hope, that his rebellious subjects would still be awakened to a sense of their errors; at the same time expressing his confidence, that if due submission could not be obtained by a voluntary return to their duty, it would be effectuated by a full exertion of the great force entrusted to him."*

The blockade of Quebec was continued through the winter, by Colonel Arnold, and afterwards by General Sullivan; but early in the spring, before the colonists could be joined by their expected reinforcements, a naval armament from England, consisting of the Isis of 54 guns, accompanied by the Surprise frigate and the Martin sloop, forced their passage through the ice. This was effected before the navigation of the St. Lawrence was thought practicable. General Carleton encouraged by succours thus obtained, immediately marched out to attack the American camp. The besiegers, however,

* Louis XV. who, for 59 years, had reigned with arbitrary sway over France, died nearly at the commencement of the present troubles (May 10th, 1774). He was succeeded by his grandson Louis the Dauphin, who had scarcely attained the twentieth year of his age. This young Prince had, in 1770, married the Arch-duchess Marie Antoinette, daughter of the Empress Queen—a Princess adorned with all the facinating graces of her sex. By this apparently auspicious alliance, the peace of Europe seemed to be secured. The appellation of "Louis the desired," universally given to the young monarch, was the bitterest satire on the memory of his predecessor. —The Count de Maurepas, who had been thirty years in exile, was raised by Louis XVI. on the accession, to the post of Prime Minister. At nearly fourscore years of age he retained all the vivacity of youth. The new King, desirous of recommending himself to his subjects, began his reign with the dismission of the Duc d'Aiguillon, and his co-adjutors, the Chancellor Maupeo, and the Comptroller-general L'Abbe Terrai, which was regarded as the certain prelude of the restoration of the ancient Parliaments; and on the 12th of November, 1774, the recall of the Parliament of Paris took place amid the unbounded acclamations of the people. On holding the bed of justice, the King declared to the Parliament, "that he was determined to preserve his authority in all its plenitude, and that he expected they would give to his subjects an example of submission." A powerful party immediately arose at the court, of which the Queen, a woman of high spirit, was considered as the head. This faction burned with a desire to avenge the disgraces of the last war; and the Americans received strong encouragement to persist in their resistance to England. The Queen also was believed to be actuated by an ardent desire of advancing the interests of the House of Austria. The views, however, of M. de Maurepas, were assidiously directed to the extension of Commerce, and the re-establishment of the French marine. That union of counsels which, since the æra of the family compact, had marked the politics of the Bourbon courts still subsisted. To consolidate the friendship of the two crowns, the late King of France had made an entire cession of the province of Louisiana.

The Spanish discontents, prevailing since the accession of the reigning monarch, and which at length burst forth, were appeased by the dismission of the Marquis de Squillacio, and the other Neapolitans who had accompanied the King from Italy; and the attention of the court of Madrid had been for some years much occupied with the means of effecting the expulsion of the Jesuits from the kingdom; which was ultimately effected, under circumstances of great cruelty. The other branches of the house of Bourbon, (France, Naples, and Parma,) followed the example set by Spain; and this once famous Order now found themselves in almost every country the objects of reproach, hatred, and persecution. Pressing solicitations were made by the Catholic powers to the Pope Clement XIII. for the utter abolition of this Order; but the Holy Father persisted in refusal. At length, oppressed with years, grief, and infirmities, this inflexible pontiff sunk into his grave; and the famous Ganganelli, who assumed the name of Clement XIV. was elected, (May 1769,) his successor. The pontificate of Ganganelli was rendered memorable by the abolition of the Order of the Jesuits, in virtue of a bull, issued in 1773, charging them with having adopted opinions scandalous, contrary to good morals, and of dangerous import to the church and all Christian states. Ganganelli died in 1774, much beloved and regretted, and not without suspicion of poison.

During the war which had commenced between Russia and Turkey, a grand object was formed by the courts of Vienna, St. Petersburgh, and Berlin, originally suggested by the King of Prussia, for the partition of Poland. On the accession of the Empress of Russia to the conspiracy of sovereigns, manifestoes were published (1772) by all these powers, stating their claims and pretensions to such provinces as happened to be most commodious for their purpose, and lying contiguous to their own territories. To Russia was allotted the whole country westward of the rivers Dwina and Nieper. The emperor seized upon a vast tract of land, extending from the frontiers of Moravia to the province of Volhynia, and situated in a direct course to the northward of Hungary and Transylvania, on which the pompous appellations were bestowed of the kingdoms of Gallicia and Ludomiria. The whole of Royal Prussia, with some adjoining districts of Great Poland, fell to the share of the King of Prussia. In vain did the King and diet of Poland protest against these unheard of claims and extravagant pretensions. The diet was in the end compelled to ratify these claims. At this time, a grand alliance, projected by the cabinet of Versailles, between the courts of Versailles, London, Madrid, and Turin, to counterbalance that subsisting between the courts of St. Petersburgh, Vienna, and Berlin, not meeting with encouragement from England, perished in embryo.

Frederic V. King of Denmark, died January 1766, and was succeeded by his son Christian VII. who in a few months after his accession espoused the Princess Carolina Matilda, youngest sister of the King of England. In 1768, the young King arrived in England, where he was entertained with great magnificence. Thence he passed into France and Germany, and did not return to Denmark till 1769. The apparent weakness and incapacity of the King, sufficiently showed that he had gained no useful knowledge by his travels. Struensee, a certain German physician, who had attended the King abroad, had acquired an ascendency over him, and being created a count, was placed at the head of affairs; the Ministers of the late King, Counts Bernstorf, Holke, &c. having been disgraced. Struensee attempted to introduce many innovations, which rendered him extremely odious. The credit in which he stood with the Queen also gave rise to imputations unfavourable to her Majesty's character. At length, by an extraordinary revolution, conducted by the Queen Dowager and her son Prince Frederic, Struensee and his chief adherents were arrested under the sanction of a warrant compulsorily signed by the King; and (January 1772) the Queen herself was committed close prisoner to the castle of Cronenburg. Struensee suffered on a public scaffold; and the Queen was allowed, through the interposition of England, to retire from the Danish dominions, and found an asylum in the city of Zell, where, after residing some years, she died in obscurity and neglect.

High disputes had for many years subsisted between the King of Sweden and the Senate. At length, the King died, early in the year 1771, and was succeeded by his son Gustavus the Third, then absent at the court of Versailles. On his return to Sweden, he passed some days at Berlin, where the project of a revolution in the government of Sweden was undoubtedly concerted. By a system of artful management, he soon effected the establishment of a new constitution, by one of the articles of which the King was vested with the power of assembling and dissolving the States at pleasure; by another, he was to have the sole disposal of the army, the navy, the finances, and all employments civil and military; by a third, all existing taxes were made perpetual; and the King, in case of pressing necessity, might impose new taxes till the States should be assembled: by a fourth, the States, when assembled, were to deliberate only on those questions which the King thought proper to refer to them. Thus was a revolution accomplished, which converted one of the most limited monarchies in Europe into one of the most absolute, without shedding a single drop of blood.

reduced by hardship and disease, and despairing of success, had already begun their retreat, abandoning their baggage, artillery, and stores, and directing their march towards Sorel, which they soon reached in a miserable condition. By the end of May, all the reinforcements having arrived from England, a great force was collected in Canada, the general rendezvous of which was appointed at Trois Rivieres, half way between Montreal and Quebec, about ninety miles apart. General Burgoyne, second in command, had orders to pursue the continental army up the Sorel to St. John's. This post was now abandoned by the Americans, who retreated in confusion to Isle aux Noix, and thence to Crown Point. Montreal, and Chamblee had been also evacuated, and the garrisons with difficulty avoided being entirely cut off. The Americans, however, remained masters of Lake Champlain.

A squadron, commanded by Sir Peter Parker, with about 3000 land forces on board, sailed from Cork in February, and on the 3d of May, anchored off Cape Fear, where the Admiral was joined by General Clinton. Finding that nothing could be attempted in Virginia, it was determined to attack the city of Charlestown. On the 28th of June, the Bristol and Experiment, of 50 guns each, supported by several smaller ships, had with some difficulty crossed the bar, and advanced to the attack of the fort on Sullivan's Island, constructed of the palmetto, a soft spongy wood, in which a ball can make no extended fracture. A furious cannonade, from the shipping, was returned with equal fury and more effect from the fort; the ships were almost torn to pieces; the slaughter was dreadful; and, in consequence of the military force not being able to get up, the ships drew off, the design on Charlestown was abandoned, and Sir Peter Parker sailed for New York.

The delegates of all the Thirteen Colonies having at length assembled in General Congress, the Declaration of Independence was solemnly promulgated on the 4th of July, 1776.*

The great naval and military force now collected against America was intrusted to Lord Howe and his brother. His Lordship, anxious to obtain an enlargement of his powers as commissioner, to effect his favourite purpose of pacification, did not leave England till May, and he then directed his course for Halifax, where he arrived in June; but found, by a letter left for him, that his brother, the General, had already departed for New York; to which place he instantly proceeded without coming to an anchor, and reached Staten Island, the head-quarters of the General, on the 12th of July. There, he was informed of the Declaration of Independence. Adjutant-General Paterson was soon afterwards deputed by General Howe with a message to General Washington, stating, that the commissioners were invested with great powers, and that they would derive the greatest pleasure from effecting an accommodation. General Washington replied, "that, by what had transpired, their powers extended merely to the granting of pardon; that those who had been guilty of no fault wanted no pardon; and that they were only defending what they deemed their indisputable rights." Both sides now prepared seriously for action; General Howe found himself at the head of 30,000 veteran troops, supported by a formidable fleet. On the 22d of August, the whole army having re-embarked, was safely landed on the south-western extremity of Long Island, on the opposite side of which, in view of the island and city of New York, lay encamped, near the village of Brooklyn, a large body of Americans commanded by General Sullivan. General Howe, having formed his plan, stationed General Grant at the head of the left wing, in a position to guard the coast, and, if practicable, to force a passage through the Narrows. The intermediate time having been occupied in skirmishes, in which the Americans were great sufferers, a general action commenced early on the morning of the 27th, by a warm cannonade on the right of the American lines, from the Generals de Heister and Grant; the ships of war in the mean time attacking a battery at Red Hook, in the rear of the American encampment, in order to call off their attention from the left centre, where the real danger lay. The Americans, suddenly attacked by General Clinton in the rear, were thrown into the utmost confusion; and, in the effort to retreat back to the lines of Brooklyn, great numbers were killed or taken prisoners: among the latter were General Sullivan and ten other field officers, and many were drowned or suffocated in attempting to pass the marsh. A signal victory was thus obtained with inconsiderable loss; and such was the ardour of the British troops, that scarcely could they be restrained from storming the American lines, which might then, in all probability, have been quickly forced, in the consternation occasioned by the loss of the battle. No hope remained for the Americans but in a retreat, which was in the succeeding night effected, under cover of a thick fog; General Washington having crossed over in person, and taken the conduct of the whole. When the fog cleared up, the last boats of the Americans were seen passing the river, but out of the reach of the English batteries; and General Howe derived no other advantage from his victory than the acquisition of the deserted works of Brooklyn. Soon after this affair, General Sullivan was sent upon parole, with a message from Lord Howe to the Congress, importing, that, though he could not then treat with them in a legal character, he was desirous of conferring with some of the members of that assembly in their individual capacity. The Congress replied, that "being the representatives of the free and independent States of America, they could not with propriety send any of their members to confer with his Lordship in their private characters; but that ever desirous of establishing peace on reasonable terms, they would send a committee of their body, to know whether he had any authority to treat with persons authorised by Congress, and what that authority was." Dr. Franklin, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Rutledge, accordingly met Lord Howe upon Staten Island, September 14, where they were entertained by his Lordship with great politeness; but the conference proved fruitless. No suspension of arms having taken place, several ships of war had been sent up the East and North rivers, which wash the coast of the peninsula, at the extremity of which the city of New York is situated. General Washington's army being stationed, partly in the environs of the city and partly at Kingsbridge, on the isthmus which connects the peninsula with the continent, apprehensions were entertained

* This Declaration commences with the acknowledgement, "That respect to the opinions of mankind requires, that, when in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation; and they assert the unalterable right of the people, whenever government becomes destructive of those ends for which it is instituted, to form a new government on principles most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence indeed will dictate, that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and all experience hath shewn that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they have been accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former system of government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States." They proceed to enumerate the particulars of his Majesty's conduct in relation to America; and in conclusion they say, "In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injuries. A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people. We, therefore, the representatives of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intention, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, Free and Independent States, and that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved; and in support of this declaration, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour."

tertained that the English General, by landing his forces in the centre, would cut off the communication between them. A resolution was therefore taken, to evacuate the city; and on the landing of the British forces, the Americans retreated with precipitation and some loss to Kingsbridge, where they had erected strong works. Great part of the army had re-embarked, and again landed near West Chester, with a view to gain the rear of General Washington's encampment, and to surround him. The American commander, immediately decamping with his whole army, took a new and strong position at White Plains, the deep river Brunx covering his front, and the North River flowing at some distance in the rear. On the 28th of October the royal army advanced in two columns within cannon-shot of the American lines; and, in the night of the 1st of November, General Washington drew off his troops, and took another and still stronger position, amidst the woods and high lands bordering on the North Castle district. General Howe then made a sudden movement towards Kingsbridge, and unexpectedly invested Fort Washington, a strong post on the North River. The commander of the fortress refusing to surrender, it was by a vigorous assault carried sword in hand, and more than 2000 men made prisoners of war. General Washington, who had passed the North River, with a view to the protection of the province of Jersey, was now compelled to retreat with a diminished force to Newark, whence he fell back on the approach of Lord Cornwallis to Brunswick, leaving Newark the very morning that his Lordship entered it. His Lordship pursued him to the banks of the Delawar, where a cessation of the pursuit became indispensible, as no boats could be procured for transporting the troops over that great river.

General Lee, at the head of a considerable body of troops, had followed Lord Cornwallis, but at too great a distance to be of any service to the commander-in-chief. While he lay carelessly at a place called Basking-ridge, Colonel Harcourt formed a plan for capturing this officer, who was stiled by the English army "the American Palladium." This project was carried into execution, with such address and activity that the General was seized by a party of light horse, conducted by the Colonel in the night of the 13th of December, and carried safely off to the British camp, though several guarded posts and armed patroles lay in their way. His capture caused great exultation, and he was confined in the closest manner.*

General Clinton, with a body of troops, and a squadron of men of war, was detached to the attack of Rhode island, which was immediately abandoned, on the very day that General Washington crossed the Delawar.

At this period, the affairs of America were considered to be in a very critical situation. Early, however, in the morning of December the 26th, a day selected on the supposition that the Christmas festivity might favour the project of surprise, General Washington crossed the Delawar, though with extreme difficulty, from the quantity of ice in the river, nine miles above Trenton, and began his march in the midst of a storm of snow and hail at the head of an army not exceeding 3000 in number, and reaching Trenton by day-break. Here about 1600 men were stationed, chiefly Hessians, under the command of Colonel Rahl, who, unsuspicious of danger, were thrown into confusion at the first attack. Colonel Rahl himself was mortally wounded, the disorder increased, and, abandoning their artillery, they attempted to make their retreat to Prince-town. Finding resistance and escape equally impracticable, the three regiments of Rahl, Lossberg, and Knyphausen, surrendered themselves prisoners of war—the remainder of the troops retreating with difficulty by way of Bordenton. General Washington then repassed the Delawar, carrying with him the prisoners, their artillery, and colours, and entered the city of Philadelphia in triumph. In consequence of this success, great numbers of the Americans, who had deserted their colours, again repaired to the standard of their commander, who soon found himself at the head of a considerable army, in a condition once more to cross the Delawar; and Lord Cornwallis, who was actually at New York on his way to England, found himself under a necessity of returning to the defence of the Jerseys. Approaching the American army, strongly posted near the town of Trenton, he made immediate dispositions for an attack; but in the dead of night (January 2, 1777) General Washington silently withdrew his troops, leaving fires burning in his camp, to deceive the enemy, and by a circuitous march arrived by sun-rise at Prince-town. Lord Cornwallis, finding himself out-manœuvred, abandoned his camp, and retired to Brunswick.

On the 19th of September the commissioners of the crown had caused a proclamation to be published, promising in his Majesty's name a revision of all such instructions as might be construed to lay an improper restraint on the freedom of legislation in the colonies, and also to concur in the revisal of such acts by the operation of which they might think themselves aggrieved. In October, the inhabitants of New York, then in the possession of the English, presented a petition to the commissioners, signed by 946 names, declaring their allegiance to the King, and their acknowledgment of the constitutional supremacy of Great Britain, and praying to be restored to his Majesty's peace and protection. This petition was followed by another from Queen's County, in Long Island. On the 30th of November another proclamation was published by the commissioners, offering a pardon and indemnity to all persons who should, within the space of sixty days, surrender themselves to any of his Majesty's general officers, Admirals, &c. and suscribe a declaration of loyalty and obedience. This proclamation was issued during the success attending the royal arms, and many persons consequently subscribed to the declaration.

Congress removed their session from Philadelphia to Baltimore in Maryland, where "they declared the property of the subjects of Great Britain taken on the high seas to be lawful prize; they resolved upon raising eighty-eight battalions to serve during the war; they nominated three of their body, of whom Dr. Franklin was one, commissioners to the court of Versailles, to solicit aid and assistance, and to propose the plan of a treaty of friendship, commerce, and alliance; they enlarged the powers of their general, vesting in him a kind of dictatorial authority for the space of six months; and they resolved that all bills of credit emitted by Congress should pass current in all transactions, and whoever refused to receive the same in the common course of payment should be deemed an enemy to the liberties of America, and should be treated accordingly."

Parliament assembled on the 31st of October, when the King informed the two Houses, "That so daring and desperate was the spirit of those leaders, whose object has only been dominion and power, that they have now openly renounced all allegiance to the crown, and all political connection with this country; they have rejected, with circumstances of indignity and insult, the means of conciliation held out to them, and have presumed to set up their rebellious confederacies as independent states. If their treason be suffered to take root, much mischief must grow from it to the present system of all Europe." His Majesty further informed them, "That the successes already obtained had been so important as to give the strongest hopes of the most decisive good consequences; but, notwithstanding this fair prospect, it was necessary, at all events, to prepare for another campaign." Addresses, the echo of the speech, were moved in both Houses; but an amendment was moved by Lord John Cavendish in the Commons, and by the Marquis of Rockingham in the Lords, containing a recapitulation of what were termed the manifold errors of that system which had caused the entire alienation, and at length the open revolt, of so large a part of his Majesty's once loyal and affectionate

* An offer being made by the Congress to exchange six field officers for the General, it was answered, that General Lee, being a deserter from his Majesty's service, did not come under the denomination of a prisoner of war, nor was he entitled to the benefits of the cartel; and the menace of retaliation alone prevented their proceeding to the last extremity against him.

subjects. On a division, however, the amendment was rejected in the Commons by 242 against 87; and in the Peers by 91 against 26. Soon afterwards, Lord John Cavendish exhibited in the House a printed paper, purporting to be a proclamation of his Majesty's commissioners in America, and called upon ministers to inform him as to its authenticity; which having been immediately admitted, his Lordship moved, "that the House should resolve itself into a committee to consider of the revisal of all acts of Parliament by which his Majesty's subjects in America think themselves aggrieved." Ministers alledged, that the paper in question was not of sufficient moment to be laid before Parliament, being no treaty nor part of a treaty, but barely a preliminary which might possibly lead to one; and, after a long and violent debate, the motion was negatived by a considerable majority. From this time many of the opposition, especially of the Rockingham party, absented themselves from the House.

After the recess Lord North introduced a bill "To enable his Majesty to secure and detain persons charged with or suspected of the crime of high treason committed in America, or on the high seas." With such negligence was this bill framed, that, by the enacting clauses the crown was enabled, at its pleasure, to commit any person resident in any part of the British dominions to custody, without bail or main-prize, under his Majesty's sign manual, in any place of confinement situated in Great Britain or elsewhere. The minister, however, who appeared not to have been apprised of the nature of the bill, frankly and explicitly disavowed all design of extending its operation beyond its open and avowed objects. The bill was consequently amended before it passed.

On the 9th of April, the King informed the House of the difficulties which he laboured under from the debts incurred by expences of the civil government, amounting, on the 5th of January preceding, to upwards of 600,000*l.* The minister consequently moved, "That the sum of 618,000*l.* be granted, to enable his Majesty to discharge the debts of the civil government; and that the sum of 100,000*l.* per annum, over and above the sum of 800,000*l.* be granted as a farther provision for the same." A debate of some warmth ensued; but the motion was carried without difficulty, in both Houses. The Speaker of the House of Commons, on presenting the bill a few days afterwards, for the royal assent, addressed his Majesty in the following terms:—"In a time, Sire, of public distress, full of difficulty and danger, their constituents labouring under burders almost too heavy to be borne, your faithful Commons, postponing all other business, have not only granted to your Majesty a large present supply, but also a very great additional revenue, great beyond example, great beyond your Majesty's highest expence; but all this, Sire, they have done in the well grounded confidence, that you will apply wisely what they have granted liberally." The King was little pleased with this unexpected liberty. On the return of the Speaker, the thanks of the House were immediately voted him. Mr. Rigby, however, in a subsequent debate, arraigned the conduct of the Speaker, as conveying little less than an insult on the King, and as equally misrepresenting the sense of Parliament and the state of the nation. The Speaker appealed to the vote of thanks which had been passed, as a proof that he had not been guilty of the misrepresentation imputed to him; and the minister expressed a wish that the subject might not be farther discussed. Mr. Fox declared, "That a serious and direct charge having been brought, the question was now at issue. Either the Speaker had misrepresented the sense of the House, or he had not. He should therefore, in order to bring this question to a properand final decision, move, "that the Speaker of the House, in his speech to his Majesty at the bar of the House of Peers, did express, with just and proper energy, the sentiments of this House." The Speaker himself declared, "that he would sit no longer in that chair than he was supported in the free exercise of his duty. He had discharged what he conceived to be his duty, intending only to express the sense of the House; and from the vote of approbation with which he had been honoured, he had reason to believe he was not chargeable with any misrepresentation." Ministers, in pressing terms, now recommended the withdrawment of the motion; but this was positively refused. Mr. Rigby moved for the House to adjourn; but, as it appeared sensible of the degradation which its dignity must sustain from any affront offered to the chair, Mr. Rigby in some degree conceded, professing, "That he meant no reflection upon the character of the Speaker, but that what he had said was the mere expression of his private opinion, and the result of that freedom of speech which was the right and privilege of every member of that House, without respect of persons; and that, if what he had advanced was not agreeable to the sense of that House, he would readily withdraw his motion of adjournment." Mr. Fox's motion was then unanimously carried; and the thanks of the House were voted to the Speaker for his conduct in this affair.

On the 30th of May, towards the close of the session, Lord Chatham went down to the House of Peers, wrapped in flannel, and bearing a crutch in each hand. He presented himself, thus oppressed with infirmities, for the purpose of moving their Lordships, who had been previously summoned, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, most humbly to advise his Majesty to take the most speedy and effectual measures for putting a stop to the present unnatural war against the colonies, upon the only just and solid foundation, namely, the removal of accumulated grievances.* The Peers in administration denied any danger from France, and asserted, that "the assistance given to the Americans proceeded neither from the court nor the ministers,

* "The present motion," said his Lordship, "will open the way for treaty. It will be the harbinger of peace, and will convince the Americans, that Parliament is sincerely disposed to reconciliation. We have tried for unconditional submission—let us now try what can be gained by unconditional redress. The door of mercy has been hitherto shut against them: you have ransacked every corner of Germany for boors and ruffians to invade and ravage their country; for to conquer it, my Lords, is impossible—you cannot do it. I may as well pretend to drive them before me with this crutch. I am experienced in spring hopes and vernal promises, but at last will come your equinoctial disappointment. But were it practicable, by a long continued course of success, to conquer America, the holding it in subjection afterwards will be utterly impossible. No benefit can be derived from that country to this, but by the good will and pure affection of the inhabitants: this is not to be gained by force of arms; their affection is only to be recovered by reconciliation and justice. If ministers are founded in saying, that no engagements are entered into by America with France, there is yet a moment left; the point of honour is still safe; a few weeks may decide our fate as a nation. Were America suffered to form a treaty with France, we should not only lose the immense advantages resulting from the vast and increasing commerce of our colonies, but those advantages would be thrown into the hands of our hereditary enemy. America, my Lords is now contending with Great Britain under a masked battery of France, which will open as she perceives this country to be sufficiently weakened by the contest. France will not lose so fair an opportunity of separating for ever America from this kingdom. This is the critical moment—for such a treaty must and will take place, should pacification be delayed; and war between England and France is not the less probable because professions of amity continue to be made. It would be folly in France to declare it now, while America gives full employment to our arms, and is pouring into her lap her wealth and produce. While the trade of Great Britain languishes, while her taxes increase, and her revenues diminish, France is securing and drawing to herself that commerce which is the basis of your power. My motion was stated generally, that I might leave the question at large to the wisdom of your Lordships. But, my Lords, I will tell you fairly what I wish for—I wish for a repeal of every oppressive act passed since 1763: I would put America precisely on the footing she stood at that period. If it be asked, why should we submit to concede? I will tell you, my Lords: because you have been the aggressors from the beginning: you ought, therefore, to make the first overture. I say again, my Lords, you have been the aggressors, you have made descents upon their coasts, you have burned their towns, plundered their country, made war upon the inhabitants, confiscated their property, proscribed and imprisoned their persons;—you have injured, oppressed, and endeavoured to enslave them. America is therefore entitled to redress. Let, then, reparation come from the hand that inflicted the injuries; let conciliation succeed to oppression: and I maintain, that Parliament will again recover its authority; that his Majesty will be once more enthroned in the hearts of his subjects; and that your Lordships, as contributing to so great, benignant, and glorious an event, will receive the prayers and benedictions of every part of the British empire."

but

but from the spirit of military enterprise and commercial adventure; and finally, that the motion arraigned, in the most improper terms, measures which had received the sanction of Parliament." The motion was negatived, by 99 against 28.

On the 7th of June, Parliament was prorogued; his Majesty expressing his entire approbation of their conduct.*

The American campaign of this year commenced at an early period of the spring, with varied success; but, by some unaccounted-for contingency, the British army, at New York, was not able to take the field till June, for want of tents and camp equipage. General Howe at length passed over into the Jerseys, determined, if possible, to bring the American commander to a general action; but on approaching his camp at Middlebrook, it was found inaccessible, from the nature of its situation and its artificial defences; and finally, the English General was under the necessity of evacuating the Jerseys, without effecting a single object of his expedition. Great preparations were next made for an important naval effort; and, on the 23d of July the whole army, excepting a sufficient force for the defence of New York, embarked, and after a long and tedious voyage, were landed at the head of Chesapeak Bay. General Washington, who had long been kept in suspense as to the destination of the British army, had recently passed the Delawar; and he now took possession of the heights on the eastern side of the river Brandywine, which falls into the Delawar below Philadelphia. Early on the 11th of September the English advanced in two columns; both of which were, in a considerable degree successful; the first forcing the passage of the ford, and the latter surprising and routing the right wing of the enemy. General Washington consequently retreated towards Philadelphia; but, on the advance of General Howe, he withdrew; the English army passed the Schuylkil without opposition; and, on the 26th of September, entered Philadelphia in triumph, the Congress having previously removed their sittings to York-town in Virginia. On the receipt of this intelligence, Lord Howe moved round with the fleet from the Chesapeak to the Delawar, the navigation of which the Americans had endeavoured to render impracticable by various works and batteries; and, across the mid-channel they had sunk several vast machines composed of transverse beams firmly united and pointing in various directions, strongly headed with iron. The head-quarters of the British army at this time were at German-town, six miles from Philadelphia. General Washington, who was posted about sixteen miles off, on the banks of the Schuylkil, thinking this a favourable opportunity of attack, decamped in the evening of the 3d of October, and arrived at three the next morning at German-town. Colonel Musgrave's regiment, which was first attacked, made so gallant a resistance, that the whole army had time to form; and Major-General Grey bringing up the left wing by a rapid and seasonable movement, the Americans were forced to act on the defensive, and, after a long conflict in darkness and confusion, they were compelled to retreat.

On the 22d of October, an attempt was made, by a corps of Hessians, to storm the fortress of Red Bank, on the Delawar; but they were repulsed with great slaughter, their leader having been mortally wounded. A fierce attack was at the same time made by the shipping on the works of Fort Island, on the opposite bank, on which they made little impression; and the Augusta man of war, and Merlin sloop, in endeavouring to avoid the chevaux-de-frize, or iron-shod beams, in the mid-channel, were stranded. The Augusta by accident was blown up. On the 15th of November the attack was renewed, the works were nearly demolished, and the garrison retired in the night across the river to Red Bank, which was also soon afterwards evacuated. The free navigation of the river was now restored; but the season for military action had elapsed, and no further enterprise of moment was attempted during the remainder of the campaign.

Subsequently to the evacuation of Canada by the Americans, in the summer of the preceding year, great exertions were made by the English to acquire a naval superiority on Lake Champlain.† Early on the 11th of October (1776,) the English flotilla proceeding up the Lake, discovered the enemy's squadron drawn up in a line. A warm action ensued, in which the Americans were entirely defeated; and General Arnold was under the necessity of setting fire to his own ship, to prevent her falling into the hands of the English. Thus was Lake Champlain recovered, a few of the enemy's small vessels only making their escape to Ticonderoga, where they concentrated their force. General Carleton went into winter cantonments in Canada.

Of the Indians in his service, he had made but little use, and they were now dismissed on a general promise of returning when called for. On this, or on some other account, offence was taken at his conduct, and he was superseded in the command by General Burgoyne, who arrived in America, early in the spring of 1777.

General Burgoyne proceeded up Lake Champlain, and landed a little to the northward of Crown Point, where he met the Indians in Congress, and in compliance with their customs gave them a war feast. After a short stay, the army proceeded under convoy of the shipping on the Lake to Ticonderoga, a post of great natural strength, which had been rendered famous by the disastrous attack made upon it by General Abercrombie in the preceding war. On the first approach of the English, however, it was suddenly evacuated, (on the night of the 5th of July) by direction of the Commander-General St. Clair, leaving behind them their artillery, provisions, and stores. The flight of the enemy was no sooner discovered, than preparations were made for a vigorous pursuit. The main body of the Americans was quickly overtaken and entirely defeated by General Frazer; and their remaining naval forces, which had rendezvoused at Skenesborough, were destroyed by General Burgoyne. The fugitives retreated with the utmost precipitation to Fort Edward, on the North of Hudson's River, where General Schuyler, Commander-in-Chief of the American northern army, had fixed his head-quarters. The English, elated at the successes which had hitherto attended them, now exerted indefatigable industry in clearing the Wood Creek, (a continuation of Lake Champlain) from the obstacles which impeded the passage of the batteaux; and in conveying gun-boats, provision-vessels, and batteaux, over land into Lake George.‡ Their heavy train of artillery, however, was a great incumbrance, and it was

* In the course of the session, a memorial had been delivered by Sir Joseph Yorke, ambassador at the Hague, to the States General, in which his Excellency declared, "That the King, his master, had hitherto borne with unexampled patience the irregular conduct of the subjects of their High Mightinesses, in their interested commerce at St. Eustatia, as also in America." His Excellency then proceeded to state, "That M. Van Graaf, Governor of St. Eustatia, had permitted the seizure of an English vessel, by an American pirate, within cannon shot of the island; and that he had returned from the fortress of his government the salute of a rebel flag." The ambassador concluded with demanding, "a formal disavowal of the salute by Fort Orange, at St. Eustatia, to the rebel ship, and the dismission and immediate recall of the Governor Van Graaf;" declaring, that "until such satisfaction shall be given, they are not to expect that his Majesty will suffer himself to be amused by mere assurances, or that he will delay one instant to take such measures as he shall think due to the interest and dignity of his crown." The States, offended at the language of this memorial, gave no answer to the ambassador, but ordered their resident in London, to deliver into the King of England's own hand a counter-memorial, in which they complain of the menacing tone that reigns throughout that of the English court: adding, however, "That from the sole motive of demonstrating their regard to his Majesty, they have actually dispatched orders to M. de Graaf to surrender himself within the republic without delay, in order to give the necessary information respecting his conduct; nor do they scruple to disavow, in the most express manner, any act or mark of honour which may have been given by their officers to any vessels belonging to the colonies of America, so far as it may imply a recognition of American independence." The King declared himself satisfied with these concessions; but considerable coolness from this time subsisted between the two powers.

† The naval fleets were commanded by land officers; General Carleton and General Arnold.

‡ From Fort Anne, at the extremity of the Wood Creek, where the

was not till the 30th of July, that General Burgoyne fixed his head-quarters at Fort Edward, whence the Americans had retired to Saratoga. On the 15th of August, he had only four days' provisions in store; and, understanding that a large magazine was collected at Bennington, twenty miles to the eastward of Hudson's River, for the use of the enemy, he detached Colonel Baum, at the head of about five hundred men, to surprise the place: moving himself with the whole army, up the eastern shore of Hudson's River, and encamping nearly opposite to Saratoga. Colonel Baum finding his destination discovered, and his force insufficient, took post near Bennington, whence he communicated intelligence of his situation to General Burgoyne, who dispatched Colonel Breyman to his assistance. Baum, however, was surrounded, defeated, and taken, before the arrival of Breyman; who, in turn, was routed, with heavy loss. In the interim, Colonel St. Leger, who commanded a separate corps on the Mohawk River, and had, in conjunction with Colonel Johnson and a body of Indians, invested Fort Stanwix, was compelled to raise the siege, and to leave behind him his artillery, stores, &c.

About this time, General Gates superseded General Schuyler in the command of the northern army; and the spirits of the colonists being raised by their late successes and the long inaction of General Burgoyne, a formidable and increasing army was collected in the vicinity of Still Water, on the western bank of Hudson's River, southward of Saratoga. Notwithstanding the present unpromising prospect, General Burgoyne having now about thirty days' provision in store, resolved to pass the river, which he effected about the middle of September, and encamped on the heights of Saratoga. As he advanced along the western bank of the river, he found the country covered with thick woods and intersected with creeks, which made a continual repair of bridges necessary. At length, on the 19th of September, he was attacked near Still Water by the Americans: the action lasted from noon till sun-set, when the King's troops were left in possession of the field. They lay all night on their arms, and in the morning they took a position in front of the enemy's camp, fortifying their right wing, and extending their left to the banks of the river. General Burgoyne received a letter from General Clinton, informing him of his design to make a diversion in his favour, which he, in reply, urged the immediate performance of. Early in October, General Clinton, at the head of about 4000 troops, accordingly proceeded up the North River to Forts Montgomery and Constitution, which he reduced. He afterwards broke an immense boom and chain extending from shore to shore, and burnt several ships and armed vessels lying in the river; also destroyed many desirable mansions on the banks, and the whole of the beautiful village of Esopus.* It was now unquestionably in his power to proceed without interruption to Albany; but the loss which he had sustained in the midst of his successes, and the apprehension that his communication with New York would be in the end cut off, probably induced him to return, and the northern army was left to its fate. A considerable hostile force had now formed in the rear of General Burgoyne, which, making itself master of the posts on Lake George, effectually cut off all supplies of provisions and stores, in that direction. General Burgoyne found it necessary to lessen the rations of the soldiers. On the 7th of October, a detachment of 1500 men, conducted by the General himself, made a movement to the right, to discover if there were any means of forcing a passage. The detachment, however, was vigorously assailed, and compelled to retreat with great loss, General Frazer having been killed in the action. Perceiving the lines weakened by this movement, the Americans fell with the utmost fury on the left and centre of the British army. General Arnold, who commanded the attack, was severely wounded, and obliged to retire. Night at length put an end to the conflict, but not before the German entrenchment had been carried sword in hand, and a lodgment made which left every other quarter of the camp dangerously exposed. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary to take a new position; and, amidst the darkness and horrors of this fatal night, the whole army retreated in mournful silence to the heights in the rear of the encampment which they had formerly occupied.

Next day, General Burgoyne continued his retreat to Saratoga, where, on his arrival, he found the passes in possession of the enemy. All resources having been cut off, the distressing necessity became apparent, of proposing terms of capitulation. A convention was accordingly concluded, by which it was agreed, that "the British army should march out of camp with the honours of war, and then lay down their arms; and be allowed a free embarkation from Boston to Europe, upon condition of not serving again in America during the present war." Such was the fate of an army, consisting, at its departure from Canada, of above 10,000 men, but now reduced to little more than half its original number. The whole plan and conduct of this campaign were most severely censured; and, as it has been justly observed, "the catastrophe of Saratoga will afford irrefragable demonstrations, that Lord George Germaine was as little to be dreaded in the cabinet as Lord George Sackville had been in the field."

Parliament assembled on the 20th of November. The King's speech betrayed no symptoms of dejection; but his Majesty "intimated the necessity of preparing for such farther operations as the contingencies of the war and the obstinacy of the rebels might render expedient. He expressed his determination steadily to pursue the measures in which they were engaged, and his hope that the deluded and unhappy multitude would finally return to their allegiance."—In the Commons, the Marquis of Granby moved an amendment to the address, recommending measures of accommodation, and an immediate cessation of hostilities, as necessary for accomplishing so desirable a purpose. This was negatived by 243 against 86. In the Upper House, Lord Chatham moved an amendment of similar import to that of Lord Granby, which he supported with all his accustomed energy and eloquence; notwithstanding which, it was negatived, by 97 against 28. A fortnight afterwards, Mr. Fox moved for an inquiry into the state of the nation, in which the minister professed his cordial acquiescence; but a previous motion, for certain papers, to elucidate the subject, was negatived, through the influence of the minister, by 178 against 89; although, upon the motion of the Duke of Richmond, in the other House, on the same day, the required papers were granted. On the following day (December 3) the disclosure of the melancholy catastrophe at Saratoga took place; when, after a period of silent astonishment and consternation, a torrent of invective, accompanied by taunts the most bitter and sarcastic, was poured forth by the leaders of the opposition against the ministers, whose pride, ignorance, and incapacity, they averred, had occasioned a more signal disgrace and calamity than had ever before, in the most disastrous war, befallen the British arms. Mr. Fox denounced the minister as "a political Sangrado. Bleeding was his only prescription for all ills. Should mortal symptoms appear in the body politic in consequence of this regimen, still this state empiric will persist in crying out for more blood, merely because he has staked his reputation on the assertion that this is the only effectual remedy." Lord North dejectedly acknowledged "that he had indeed been unfortunate, the batteaux navigation ends, to Fort Edward, a distance scarcely exceeding twenty miles, the difficulties attending the march of the army were inconceivably great. In this short space they had no fewer than forty bridges to construct, one of which was over a morass two miles in extent, and the roads were every where obstructed by large timber trees laid across with their branches interwoven.

* "The flames from the frigates and galleys," observes Stedman, in his History of the American war "suddenly bursting forth, as every sail was set, the vessels soon became magnificent pyramids of fire. The reflection on the steep face of the opposite mountain, and the long train of ruddy light that shone upon the water for a prodigious distance, had a wonderful effect; whilst the ear was awfully filled with the continued echoes from the rocky shores as the flames gradually reached the cannon. The whole was sublimely terminated by the explosions, which again left all to darkness."

fortunate, but that his intentions were ever just and upright; that he had originally been, in a manner forced into an office which he would most willingly and gladly resign, could his resignation facilitate the obtaining that peace and reconciliation for which he had ever earnestly wished."

On the 5th of December, the Earl of Chatham moved, "that an address be presented to his Majesty, to cause the proper officers to lay before the House copies of all orders and instructions to General Burgoyne, relative to the late expedition from Canada."* The motion having been negatived, his Lordship next moved, "that all orders and treaties relative to the employment of the Indian savages be laid before the House." Lord Gower opposed the motion; asserting, "that the noble Lord had himself employed savages without scruple in the operations of the last war." Lord Chatham prereniptorily denied this charge, and challenged the ministers, if any such instructions of his were to be found, to produce them. Lord Amherst reluctantly admitted that Indians had been employed on both sides—the French employed them first, he said, and we followed their example; but, that he had been authorised to take them into his Majesty service by instructions from the ministers, his Lordship would not affirm. The motion was disposed of by the previous question; and, a few days afterwards, Parliament adjourned to the 20th of January, 1778.

A. D. 1778.] Soon after the recess, the ministry having, in the interim, formed a determination to prosecute the war with renewed energy, the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. Fox, resolved itself into a committee on the state of the nation. After taking a retrospective view of the whole conduct of the present administration respecting America, the measures which led to the war, and the manner in which it had been prosecuted, Mr. Fox moved, as a resolution of the committee, "that an address should be presented to his Majesty, beseeching his Majesty that no part of the national force in these kingdoms, or in the garrisons of Gibraltar or Minorca, should be sent to America." Greatly to the surprise of the public, no debate ensued, no reply was made; but the motion was negatived by 259 against 165; the minority being larger than any that had before appeared in this Parliament.

Mr. Burke soon afterwards moved for the papers relative to the employment of the Indians; reprobating the measure as replete with disgrace and infamy. After a long debate, the motion was negatived by 223 against 137. Several other motions having also been negatived, Lord North, at length, gave notice that he had digested a plan of conciliation; and, on the 17th of February, he moved for leave to bring in—

"I. A bill for removing all doubts and apprehensions concerning taxation by the Parliament of Great Britain in any of the colonies and plantations in North America; and,

"II. A bill to enable his Majesty to appoint commissioners with sufficient powers to treat, consult, and agree upon the means of quieting the disorders now subsisting in certain of the colonies in America."

In opening his plan, Lord North acknowledged, that "he had always known that American taxation could never produce a beneficial revenue—that it was not his policy to tax them, but that he had found them taxed when he unfortunately came into administration—and that he could not possibly suspect the regulation he had introduced in relation to the tea-duty could have been productive of such fatal consequences. With respect to the coercive acts, they had appeared necessary to remedy the distempers of the time; the events of war had turned out very differently from what he had a right to expect from the great and well appointed force sent over; but to events, and not expectations, he must make his plan conform. The appointment of five commissioners was in contemplation, who should be enabled to treat with the Congress, "as though it were a legal body;" or with any individuals in their present civil capacities, or military commands;—that they should have a power to order a suspension of arms, to suspend the operations of all laws, and to grant all sorts of pardons. "A preliminary renunciation of Independency would not be required of America, and a contribution in any shape from America was not to be insisted upon as a sine qua non of the treaty. These concessions were founded on reason and propriety; and if the question were asked, Why they had not been sooner proposed? he should reply, that the moment of victory, for which he had anxiously waited, seemed to him the only proper season for offering terms of concession. But though the result of the war had proved unfavourable, he would no longer delay the desirable and necessary work of reconciliation." These propositions were assailed by objections from all quarters. The Tories lamented the degradation which the bills would bring upon the government of this country; insisted that our resources were great and inexhaustible; and bitterly deplored that pusillanimity in our councils, which, after so great an expense of blood and treasure, could submit, not only to give up all the objects of the contest, but to enter into a public treaty with armed rebels, which, after all, would not produce the end proposed. The opposition members expressed their reluctant agreement in the probable truth of this prediction; but they would not, they said, impede or delay the execution of a plan which had conciliation for its object. Mr. Fox was particularly severe. "What censure," he asked, "would be found sufficient, on those ministers who had adjourned Parliament, in order to make a proposition of conciliation, and then neglected to do it until France had concluded a treaty with the United and Independent States of America, and acknowledged them as such? He did not speak from surmise, he had it from authority he could not question, that the treaty he mentioned had been signed in Paris ten days before; he therefore wished that the noble Lord would give the House satisfaction on that interesting point." Lord North reluctantly acknowledged, "that it was but too probable that such a treaty was in agitation, though he had no authority to pronounce absolutely that it was concluded." A direct communication was soon after made, "that a rescript had been delivered by the ambassador of his most Christian Majesty, containing a direct avowal of a treaty of amity, commerce, and alliance, recently concluded with America; in consequence of which offensive communication on the part of the court of France, his Majesty had sent orders to his ambassador to withdraw from that court; and, relying on the zealous support of his people, he is prepared to exert all the force and resources of his kingdoms, to repel so unprovoked and unjust an aggression." Addresses were voted by both Houses, containing the strongest assurances of assistance and support.†

The Duke of Richmond, at the close of the grand committee

* "A system destructive of all faith and confidence had been introduced," his Lordship affirmed, "within the last fifteen years, at St. James's, by which pliable men, not capable men, had been raised to the highest posts of government. A few obscure persons had obtained an ascendency where no man should have a personal ascendency, and by the most insidious means the nation had been betrayed into a war of which they now reaped the bitter fruits. The spirit of delusion had gone forth; ministers had imposed on the people; Parliament had been induced to sanctify the imposition; a visionary phantom of revenue had been conjured up for the basest of purposes, but it was now for ever vanished. The abilities of General Burgoyne were confessed, his personal bravery not surpassed, his zeal in the service unquestionable. He had experienced no pestilence, nor suffered any of the accidents which sometimes supersede the wisest and most spirited exertions of human industry. What then is the cause of his misfortunes?—Want of wisdom in our councils, want of ability in our ministers. The plan of penetrating into the colonies from Canada was a most wild, uncombined, and mad project; and the mode of carrying on the war was the most bloody, barbarous, and ferocious, recorded in the annals of history. The arms of Britain had been sullied and tarnished by blending the scalping knife and tomahawk with the sword and firelock. Such a mode of warfare was a contamination which all the waters of the Hudson and the Delawar would never wash away. It was impossible for America to forget or forgive so horrid an injury."

† A consequent debate in the Lords was remarkable for disclosing an important difference of opinion between the Peers in opposition, respecting the recognition of American Independence. The Rock-committee of inquiry, moved an address to the King on the state of the nation, recommending immediate recognition of American independance. Lord Chatham, expecting that this point would come under discussion, had resolved, though labouring under heavy corporeal infirmities, to make his appearance in the House, to bear testimony against such recognition.* When the Duke of Richmond had sat down, his Lordship rose, and began by lamenting, "that his bodily infirmities had so long and at so important a crisis prevented his attendance on the duties of Parliament." He declared, that "he had made an effort almost beyond the powers of his constitution, to come down to the House on this day, perhaps the 'last' time he should ever be able to enter its walls, to express the indignation he felt at the idea which he understood was gone forth of yielding up the sovereignty of America. My Lords," said he, "I rejoice that the grave has not closed upon me, that I am still alive to lift up my voice against the dismemberment of this ancient and noble monarchy. Pressed down as I am by a load of infirmity, I am little able to assist my country in this most perilous conjuncture; but, my Lords, while I have sense and memory, I never will consent to tarnish the lustre of this nation by an ignominious surrender of its rights and fairest possessions. Shall a people so lately the terror of the world, now fall prostrate before the House of Bourbon? It is impossible! In God's name, if it is absolutely necessary to declare either for peace or war, and if peace cannot be preserved with honour, why is not war commenced without hesitation? I am not, I confess, well informed of the resources of this kingdom, but I trust it has still sufficient to maintain its just rights, though I know them not.—Any state, my Lords, is better than despair. Let us at least make one effort—and, if we must fall, let us fall like men." The Duke of Richmond professed himself "totally ignorant of the means by which we were to resist with success the combination of America with the House of Bourbon." He urged the noble Lord "to point out any possible mode, if he were able to do it, of making the Americans renounce that Independence of which they they were in possession." His Grace added, that "if 'he' could not, no man could; and that it was not in his power to change his opinion on the noble Lord's authority, unsupported by any reasons, but a recital of the calamities arising from a state of things not in the power of this country now to alter." Lord Chatham, apparently much moved, made an eager effort to rise; but, before he could utter a word, pressing his hand on his bosom, he fell down suddenly in a convulsive fit. The Duke of Cumberland, Lord Temple, and other Lords, caught him in their arms; the House was immediately cleared; his Lordship was carried into an adjoining apartment; and the debate was adjourned. Medical assistance having been obtained, his Lordship in some degree recovered, and was conveyed to his favourite villa of Hayes, in Kent, where, after lingering a short time, he expired on the 11th of May, in his 70th year.†

Towards the close of the session, Sir George Saville obtained leave to bring in a bill "for the repeal of certain penalties imposed by an act passed in the 10th of King William, intituled An Act for preventing the farther Growth of Popery;" which penalties Sir George stated to be, "the punishment of popish priests, or jesuits, as guilty of felony, who should be found to officiate in the services of their church; the forfeiture of estate to the next protestant heir, in case of the education of the Romish possessor abroad; the power given to the son, or other nearest relation, being a Protestant, to take possession of the father's estate during the life-time of the proprietor; and the depriving Papists of the power of acquiring any legal property by purchase." This bill was passed without a single negative.

It was about this time that General Burgoyne returned to England, on his parole; but he experienced a cold and indifferent reception from ministers, and was refused admission to the royal presence. Highly resenting this treatment, he avenged himself by loud complaints of the misconduct of ministers; a mode of retaliation, which contributed little to raise his character in the estimation of the public. He was subsequently ordered to re-join his troops in America, whom the Congress refused to release till the convention of Saratoga should be formally ratified. With this injunction, he refused to comply; and he was therefore divested of all his posts and offices.

Parliament was prorogued on the 3d of June, when thanks were returned by the King, "for the zeal shewn by Parliament in supporting the honour of the crown, and their attention to the real interests of the nation, manifested in the wise, just, and humane laws which have been the result of their deliberations."

Early in the month of June, the new commissioners, Lord Carlisle, Mr. Eden, and Mr. Johnstone, formerly Governor of Florida, arrived at Philadelphia; more than a month having elapsed, since the ratification of the treaty between France and America had been formerly exchanged. Amongst the concessions now offered to the Americans, was an engagement, "that no military force should be kept up in the different states, without the consent of the General Congress, or of the several assemblies—to concur in measures calculated to discharge the debts of America, and to raise the credit and value of the paper circulation—to admit of representatives from the several states, who should have a seat and voice in the Parliament of Great Britain—to establish a perfect freedom of legislation and internal government, comprehending every privilege short of a total separation of interests, or consistent with that union of force on which the safety of the common religion and liberty depends."

From the Declaration of Independence, however, the Congress had no wish to recede; and an answer, to that effect, brief but conclusive, was returned. The president, Henry Laurens, added, "That he is directed to inform their Excellencies of the inclination of Congress to peace, notwithstanding the unjust claims from which this war originated, and the savage manner in which it had been conducted. They will, therefore, be ready to enter upon the consideration of a treaty of peace and commerce, not inconsistent with treaties already subsisting, when the King of Great Britain shall demonstrate a sincere disposition for that purpose; and the only solid proof of this disposition will be an explicit acknowledgment of the Independence of the United States, or the withdrawing his fleets and armies." In consequence of this communication, the commissioners returned to England.—The Earl of Carlisle had brought with him an order, for the immediate evacuation of the city of Philadelphia, and the retreat of the army to New York; a measure which, however mortifying, had been rendered very necessary, by the departure of a strong squadron from Toulon in April, ingham connection, maintained the necessity of admitting the independence of America; whilst the Earls of Chatham, Temple, Shelburne, and others disclaimed the idea of relinquishing America, and deprecated its Independence as the greatest of all political and national evils.

* The last moments of this renowned statesman are eminently entitled to notice. He was dressed in a rich suit of black velvet, with a full wig, and covered up to the knees in flannel. On his arrival, he refreshed himself in the Lord Chancellor's room, where he staid till prayers were over, and till he was informed that business was about to begin. He was then led into the House by his son and son-in-law, Mr. William Pitt, and Lord Viscount Mahon, all the Lords rising and making a lane for him to pass. He appeared pale and emaciated; but his eye retained all its native fire. It was,

"An eye, like Jove's, to threaten, or command!"

† Colonel Barré was the gentleman who communicated the melancholy information to the House of Commons. The motion which he made, "that the remains of the Earl of Chatham be interred at the public expence," was unanimously adopted; with the addition, "that a monument be erected to his memory in the collegiate church of St. Peter, Westminster." Lord John Cavendish then moved for an address to the King, "that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to make a permanent provision for the family of the late William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, in consideration of the services performed by that able statesman;" and a bill was consequently brought into Parliament, and unanimously passed, by which a clear annuity of 4000*l.* per annum, payable out of the civil list, was for ever to be annexed to the Earldom of Chatham, and the sum of 20,000*l.* voted for the discharge of his debts and incumbrances.

which was supposed to be destined for the Delawar, and which the naval force under Lord Howe was not in a condition successfully to resist.

General Howe having resigned the command to Sir Henry Clinton, the whole British army passed the Delawar on the 18th of June. In their march through the Jerseys, encumbered with an enormous train of baggage, extending twelve miles in length, the whole country hostile, the bridges broken down before, and a vigilant enemy pressing close behind, the utmost prudence and circumspection of the General were necessary for their safety. He, therefore determined, by bending his march to the right, and approaching the sea coast, to disappoint the expectation of the enemy, and to avoid the difficulty attending the passage of the Rariton. On the evening of the 27th, the royal army encamped in the vicinity of Monmouth court-house, and early the next morning they re-commenced their march. Scarcely, however, were they in motion, when the enemy were discovered moving in force at some distance on both flanks. A severe action ensued, with considerable loss on both sides. The Americans were obliged to retreat; Sir Henry renewed his march; and, on the 30th, he arrived in safety at Sandy Hook, whence he passed over to New York.*

Soon after the departure of Lord Howe from New York, Count d'Estaign arrived off the coast, and anchored in the night of the 8th of July at the mouth of the Delawar; so that his Lordship very narrowly escaped a surprise. On the 11th, the French fleet, consisting of fifteen sail of the line, appeared off Sandy Hook, to which Lord Howe could oppose only eleven ships of inferior size and metal. The large French ships, however, were unable to pass the bar; so, after eleven days' stay, D'Estaign sailed to Rhode Island, to co-operate with General Sullivan in an enterprise against Newport. The hostile fleets were both dispersed by a storm, which occasioned the French Admiral to proceed to Boston, to refit. This circumstance obliged the American General, Sullivan, to raise the siege of Newport, which had been commenced under very favourable auspices. In the month of October following, Lord Howe resigned the command to Admiral Gambier; and, in the beginning of November, D'Estaign sailed to the West Indies, to second the operations of the Marquis de Bouillé, governor of Martinico, who had already taken the important island of Dominique. The same day that the French fleet left Boston, a detachment of 5000 troops, under convoy of Commodore Hotham, sailed from Sandy Hook, and arrived, without encountering the enemy, at Barbadoes, on the 10th of December. Without allowing the troops to disembark, an expedition was resolved upon against the island of St. Lucia, where on the 13th a landing was effected. General Meadows and Admiral Barrington, upon whom the command had devolved, had carried several of the advanced posts, when D'Estaign arrived, with a superior force, in the hope of effecting the entire reduction of the British islands. On the morning of the 15th, he bore down with ten sail of the line, but met with so warm a reception, that he soon drew off. A renewed attack proved equally unsuccessful. At length, he landed a body of 5000 troops, and putting himself at their head, marched to the assault of the British lines. Again repulsed, with great loss, the Count re-embarked his troops, and left the island, which soon after surrendered to the British arms. This conquest was considered as much more than an equivalent for the loss of what had been taken by the French.

In the month of July, an expedition had been undertaken by Colonel Butler, in conjunction with Brandt, a half Indian by birth, against the beautiful and flourishing settlement of Wyoming: this was an infant colony, on the eastern branch of the Susquehanna, consisting of eight townships, in a country and climate luxuriantly fertile. The assailants appeared in force, to the number of about sixteen hundred men, of whom about one-fourth were Indians, and invested the fort. The commandant, incapable of making any effectual defence, dispatched a flag to Colonel Butler, to know what terms he would grant on a surrender. The reply was, in two words, "The hatchet;" sending in at the same time the bloody scalps of the victims who had already fallen into his hands. The garrison, though determined to sell their lives as dearly as possible, were soon overpowered; and the savage conquerors, after gratifying their diabolical rage by a bloody military execution, shut up the greater part of the survivors in the barracks, to which they set fire, and consumed the whole in one general blaze. "The entire settlement," observes a modern writer, "was now delivered up to all the horrors of Indian barbarity, of which the detail is not to be endured. A terrestrial paradise was in a short time converted into a frightful waste; and men, women, and children, underwent one common butchery, in all the possible varieties of torture. A provincial officer, of the name of Bedlock, being stripped naked, had his body stuck full of sharp pine splinters; and a heap of knots of the same wood being then piled around him, the whole was set on fire—two other officers also, Captains Ransey and Durgie, being thrown alive into the flames."†

Major-General Grey was detached, in September, from New York to a place called Fair-Haven, on the coast of New England, where he destroyed about seventy sail of shipping, together with the magazines, wharfs, and stores, and proceeding to Martha's Vineyard, a delightful island in the vicinity, he carried off an immense booty in oxen and sheep, which afforded a welcome supply to the army at New York.

Sir Henry Clinton now detached a considerable body of troops under the command of Colonel Campbell, convoyed by Sir Hyde Parker, to attempt the recovery of the province of Georgia—General Prevost, Governor of East Florida, having at the same time orders to co-operate with them. On the 23d of December, the armament arrived at the mouth of the Savannah, and the town of that name immediately surrendered.

Admiral Keppel, on the personal solicitation of the King, having been prevailed on to accept the command of the Channel fleet, sailed from St. Helen's on the 13th of June with twenty ships of the line. At the entrance of the Bay of Biscay he fell in with the Licorne and the Belle Poule, two French frigates; and on their refusal to obey the signal to bring to, a chase ensued, when the Licorne, after discharging a broadside, struck to the America. The Belle Poule, after a warm engagement with the Arethusa, escaped by running on shore; and the Pallas, another French frigate, was captured. From the papers found on board these frigates, the Admiral discovered, that the French fleet, in Brest, amounted to thirty-two sail of the line: he was therefore under the immediate necessity of returning to port for a reinforcement. On the 9th of July, he again sailed with twenty-four ships, and was soon afterwards joined by six more. In a few days he came in sight of the French fleet off Ushant, commanded by M. d'Orvilliers.

The action which ensued, though warm, was partial; but Admiral Keppel having in a short time sufficiently repaired his damages, made the signals for the van and rear divisions to take their respective stations. This order was promptly obeyed by Sir Robert Harland, of the van; but Admiral Sir Hugh Palliser, of the rear division, who had fallen to leeward, neglected the signals. Admiral Keppel, after waiting perhaps too long, sent the Fox frigate at five o'clock with peremptory directions to Sir Hugh Palliser, to bear down into his wake in order to renew the engagement. Sir Hugh answered, that he was knotting and splicing,

* In consequence of a difference between General Lee and General Washington, upon this affair, the former wrote the latter a passionate letter, which occasioned his being put under immediate arrest; and a court martial having been held upon him for disobedience of orders, misbehaviour in action, and disrespect to his commander, he was found guilty, and suspended from all his military commands for twelve months.

† Campbell, one of the first writers of the present day, has constructed a most beautiful and affecting poem, intituled "Gertrude of Wyoming," upon the sacrifice of this ill-fated settlement.

but would obey the order as soon as possible." The day, however, finally closed before Sir Hugh Palliser rejoined his commander. In the night the French made sail for their own coast, and in the morning scarcely were the rearmost ships discernible from the topmast heads of the English fleet. Admiral Keppel, therefore, returned to Portsmouth to refit. In his public letter, no reason was assigned for not renewing the engagement in the afternoon, except the expectation of the Admiral that the French would fight it out handsomely the next day.* A letter appearing some time afterwards in the newspapers severely reflecting on the conduct of Sir Hugh Palliser, that officer thought proper to require from the commander-in-chief a formal disavowal of the charges it contained, and a public justification of his character. Admiral Keppel declining, the Vice-Admiral immediately exhibited articles of accusation against him, for misconduct and neglect of duty on the 27th of July, 1778, although he had, in the month of October, a second time sailed with Admiral Keppel, and had never before whispered a word to his prejudice. The Lords of the Admiralty accordingly fixed a day (January 7, 1779,) for the trial of the commander-in-chief;† who was not only unanimously acquitted by the court martial, but received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament for his services. Sir Hugh Palliser afterwards demanded a court-martial upon himself, and was also acquitted; the sentence declaring, that his behaviour, on the 27th and 28th of July, was highly meritorious and exemplary. The resentment of the public, however, was so great, that Sir Hugh Palliser resigned his place at the board of Admiralty, his Lieutenant-Generalship of marines, his government of Scarborough castle, and also vacated his seat in the House of Commons.‡ The acquittal of Admiral Keppel was celebrated with illuminations and rejoicings in all parts of the kingdom; and the houses of Lord Sandwich and Sir Hugh Palliser were insulted by the populace; the demolition of them being with difficulty prevented.

After the Christmas recess, Mr. Fox moved a vote of censure upon Lord Sandwich "For sending Admiral Keppel, with twenty ships of the line only, to a station off the coast of France, thereby hazarding the safety of the kingdom, the Brest fleet consisting at that time of thirty-two ships of the line, besides a great superiority of frigates." The motion was negatived by a majority of 34 voices only. Mr. Fox then moved, "That the state of the navy, at the breaking out of the present war, was inadequate to the exigencies of the service." In the course of the debate, upon this motion, Lord Howe declared his resolution to decline all future service so long as the present ministers continued in office. On this occasion, the previous question was moved, and carried, by 246 against 174.

At the opening of Parliament, on the 26th of November, 1778, the royal speech complained of "The unexampled and unprovoked hostility of the court of France; and regret was expressed that the efforts which had been made for disappointing the malignant designs of the enemy had not been attended with all the success which the justice of the cause, and the vigorous exertions which had been made, seemed to promise." The usual addresses were carried by great majorities.

A. D. 1779.] Lord Howe and his brother, the General, having earnestly solicited a Parliamentary inquiry into their conduct in America, Lord North at length assented; and the result was, in general, "That the force sent to America was at no time equal to the subjugation of that continent; that the people of America were almost unanimous in their enmity and resistance to Great Britain; that the nature of the country was, beyond any other, difficult and impracticable for military operations; and that there was no fairer prospect of success, in any subsequent attempt at conquest, than in those which had been already made." The committee, however, was suddenly dissolved, without any formal decision.—Motions for an address to the King, for the removal of the Earl of Sandwich, from the person and councils of his Majesty for ever, were negatived, in both Houses, by considerable majorities. Some time before the prorogation, a royal message was delivered to Parliament, informing them, that "A manifesto had been presented to his Majesty by the Count d'Almodovar, ambassador of the King of Spain, containing a declaration of hostility on the part of the Catholic King, who had in consequence ordered his ambassador to depart without taking leave." This event called forth much eloquence and invective from the opposition, who did not fail to remind ministers of their blindness, obstinacy, and incredulity on this subject—of the contempt with which they had treated every warning of danger—and of their repeated and triumphant declarations "that Spain could have no interest in joining our enemies—Spain had colonies of her own, and would not set so bad an example as to afford aid or succour to our rebellious colonies. The honour, sincerity, and fidelity of the court of Spain were held up as sacred; and thus were Parliament and the nation kept in a constant state of delusion, until they were awakened from their dream by the imminence of the impending ruin." An address, however, with the fullest assurances of support, was unanimously carried. A subsequent motion, by Lord John Cavendish, for withdrawing the troops from America, was got rid of by an adjournment.

A plan was now proposed for augmenting the militia, to double the actual number. A bill for that purpose passed the Commons without difficulty; but it met with an unexpected opposition with the Lords; and, on a division, the compulsatory clause was thrown out by 39 against 22 voices.

Parliament was prorogued § on the 3d of July, with a speech, in which the King mentioned it as a happy omen of the success of his arms, that the increase of difficulties seemed only to augment the courage and constancy of the nation.‖

In the spring of 1779, much skirmishing, and predatory enterprise, with various success, took place in Ame-

* The French Admiral asserted, that, "During the action, the English had, as he conceived, the advantage; but that, after the firing had ceased, he out-manœuvred Admiral Keppel. He considered, that he had completely deceived the British commander, by impressing on him an idea, that he, the Count, intended to renew the action on the morrow.

† Moderate men considered that there was an impropriety in prosecuting a charge after so long an interval; and a memorial, signed by several of those who had been, and were amongst the leading and most distinguished characters in the British navy, was presented to the King, beseeching him to stop all further proceedings, as they conceived the prosecution of the charge would be totally subversive of the rules and discipline of the navy.

‡ The demon of party appears, in many instances, on both sides of the question, to have taken full possession of many, who, both as officers and men, stood deservedly in the highest rank of public opinion. By his condescending manners, Admiral Keppel had rendered himself almost the idol of the service, and considerably ingratiated himself with the whole mass of his countrymen. Palliser, on the other hand, was neither so well nor so generally known, nor from his more reserved carriage, so much beloved. He was industriously represented as the tool of administration; the whole of his conduct was interpreted as tending to a wish of sacrificing his commander-in-chief, and the charge violently imputed to malicious rancour.

§ During the recess, Lord Stormont was made Secretary of State, in the room of the Earl of Suffolk deceased. Lord Weymouth again resigned the seals of the southern department, which were transferred to Lord Hillsborough, and Lord Bathurst, late Chancellor of Great Britain, was nominated president of the council, in the room of Earl Gower. The great seal had been consigned, in the course of the preceding year, to the Attorney-General Thurlow, created Baron Thurlow; a man endowed by nature with uncommon talents, which were clouded by moroseness, bigotry, and malevolence of disposition.

‖ The memorial of Count d'Almodovar, and a long justificatory manifesto subsequently published by the court of Madrid, were filled with heavy complaints of the conduct of the English court for several years past, though grounded on no solid reason; his Britannic Majesty truly affirming, "That with regard to Spain he had nothing to reproach himself with; and that his desire to cultivate peace and amity with that power had been uniform and sincere." The only circumstances really important and interesting in this singular manifesto is the discovery that the mediation of Spain had been offered and accepted by Great Britain and France soon after the commencement of hostilities; and that a negotiation between these two courts had been actually carried on for nearly three quarters of a year.

rica, but nothing of decisive moment occurred. In the West Indies, Admiral Barrington was joined by Admiral Byron; when, the English fleet being superior to that of the French, endeavours were made, but ineffectually, to force the enemy to a general engagement. Admiral Byron, however, deeming it expedient to convoy the trade ships, collected at St. Christopher's in June, part of their voyage, Count d'Estaign took the opportunity of detaching a considerable force to the island of St. Vincent, which surrendered, though garrisoned by seven companies of regular troops, without firing a shot. This was ascribed to the dread entertained of an insurrection of the Caribbs. The French commander, having been joined by a large reinforcement of ships and troops, sailed from Fort Royal early in July, for the island of Grenada, which, though bravely defended, was soon compelled to surrender at discretion. Admiral Byron hearing of the capture of St. Vincent's, immediately determined to make an effort for its recovery; but, on his passage thither, he received the still more unwelcome intelligence of the attack of Grenada, of which he immediately resolved to attempt the relief. On the 6th of July the two fleets came in sight; and a warm but indecisive action ensued between the respective van divisions, in the course of which the English discovered, to their astonishment, the French colours flying on the fortress of St. George. In the sequel the English squadron bore away for Antigua, and the French returned to Grenada. D'Estaign directing his course to Georgia, captured the Experiment, of 50 guns, with supplies on board for Savannah, and three other frigates. On the 9th of September he anchored off the mouth of the Savannah, and sent a haughty summons to General Prevost to surrender to the arms of his Most Christian Majesty. On the following day, d'Estaign having been joined by General Lincoln, a regular siege commenced, which was very ably sustained by General Prevost. The French commander, impatient at the slow progress made, determined upon a general assault; and, after a heavy cannonade, the allies advanced to the attack of the British lines on the morning of the 9th of October. They were every where repulsed with heroic valour; d'Estaing himself was wounded in the action; and the troops having sustained great loss, the siege was converted into a blockade, and soon afterwards entirely raised. A precipitate retreat was made by the Americans, and the French Admiral retired to the West Indies; whence he returned to France in much chagrin.

On the 26th of December, Sir Henry Clinton sailed with the greater part of the army from New York, under convoy of a fleet commmanded by Admiral Arbuthnot. He arrived off Charlestown-bar (which the men of war passed with some difficulty) on the the 20th of March, 1780. On the 1st of April the British troops broke ground in front of the American lines; and, after proceeding in due military form, preparations were made for a general assault. General Lincoln, on being informed that the lines were no longer defensible, seeing no prospect of relief, and the flesh provisions remaining in store not being sufficient to furnish rations for a week, agreed to surrender the city; in consequence of which, about 6000 men became prisoners of war. This was on the 4th of May 1780. The general submission of the inhabitants ensued. Sir Henry Clinton soon afterwards returned to New York, leaving the command in Carolina to Lord Cornwallis.

Much alarm had been created in England by the junction of the fleets of France and Spain, which took place soon after the delivery of the Spanish manifesto. In August (1779) they entered the Channel to the number of sixty-five ships of the line, besides frigates, sloops, fire-ships, &c. Sir Charles Hardy, who commanded the Channel fleet, having received no instructions to prevent this formidable junction, was utterly unable to encounter so prodigious a force; and, consequently, was compelled to retire to the narrow part of the Channel, whilst the flags of France and Spain menaced and insulted the English coasts without molestation or control. Plymouth had been left so destitute of the means of defence, that the docks and shipping in the harbour, had their unprotected state been known, might have been destroyed without difficulty. On the approach of the equinox, Count d'Orvilliers steered his course back to Brest, without effecting any thing farther than the capture of the Ardent man of war, which had accidentally fallen in with the combined fleets.*

In the course of the summer an encounter took place between Sir Richard Pearson, of the Serapis man of war, accompanied by the Scarborough frigate, having under their convoy the trade from the Baltic, and Captain Paul Jones, an adventurer of desperate courage, who was commander of a small American squadron, which had some time infested the British seas. Both the Serapis and Scarborough, the convoy having been first secured, were compelled to strike their colours, and were carried by the captors to the Texel. A strong memorial was in consequence presented to the States General by Sir Joseph Yorke, who urged in the most pressing terms, "that those ships and their crews may be stopped and delivered up, which the pirate Paul Jones, who is a rebel subject and a criminal of the State, has taken." Their high mightiness as answered, "that they will in no respect whatever pretend to judge of the legality or illegality of the actions of those who have on the open seas taken any vessels which do not belong to this country, and bring them into any ports of the republic; and that they are not authorized to pass judgment either on those prizes, or on the person of Paul Jones."

Early intelligence of the war with France having been sent by express over-land to India, the factories of Chandernagore, Carical, and Masulipatam, were taken possession of without difficulty. The city of Pondicherry was invested by the troops of the Company and of the government, commanded by Sir Hector Monro, in the autumn; and, after a gallant resistance by the governor, it surrendered to the British arms. The settlement of Senegal, however, and the British forts in the river Gambia, were captured by a squadron of his Most Christian Majesty.

Parliament met on the 25th of November, when the King informed them, "that he had met them at a time when they were, in concert with him, called upon by every principle of duty, and every consideration of interest, to exert their united efforts in support and defence of their country, attacked by an unjust and unprovoked war, and contending with one of the most dangerous confederacies that ever was formed against the crown and people of Britain. Aided by the protection of Providence, the zeal of the nation, and the justice of his cause, he was firmly resolved vigorously to prosecute the war, for the purpose of compelling the enemy to equitable terms of peace. In the midst of his care and solicitude for the safety of this country, he had not been inattentive to the state of his loyal and faithful kingdom of Ireland; and, in consequence of the addresses presented to him the preceding session, he had ordered such papers to be laid before them as might assist their deliberation, and he recommended it to them to consider what further benefits and advantages might be extended to that country." The usual motion for an address in answer to the speech from the throne, called forth an amendment from the Marquis of Rockingham, censuring, in strong language, the facility with which the two ambassadors, Lord Grantham and Lord Stormont, had suffered themselves to be deceived by the craft of Spain and France; and the confidence with which ministers had assured Parliament that treaties inimical to the interests of Great Britain were not in existence, or even in embryo; also beseeching his Majesty "to reflect upon the extent of territory, power, and opulence, of reputation abroad and concord at home, which distinguished the opening of his Majesty's reign, and marked it as the most splendid and happy period in the history of this nation; and to turn his eyes on the present endangered, impoverished, distracted, and even dismembered, state of the empire, after all the grants of successive Parliaments, liberal even to profusion, and trusting to the very utmost extent of rational confidence;—and finally stating to his Majecty, that if any thing could prevent the consummation of public ruin, it can be only new counsels and new counsellors, a real change from the conviction of past errors,—and not a mere palliation, which must prove fruitless." Lord Stormont, in reply, imputed a great part of the public misfortunes to the incautious and too often violent language held in Parliament. Lord Mansfield declared himself persuaded that nothing but a full and comprehensive union of all parties and all men could effect the salvation of the country. He was old enough to have seen violent party struggles; but no previous time presented an image of the present. How far the temper of the nation and the state of parties might admit of a coalition, he could not decide; but the event was devoutly to be wished. The amendment was negatived, by 82 against 41 voices. A similar amendment, moved in the House of Commons, by Lord John Cavendish, was, after a violently stormy debate, negatived, by 233 against 134. Lord North admitted that it was the duty of Parliament to cause bad ministers to be removed; but he insisted that proof should first be made of their delinquency. The disapprobation of that House must and ought to sweep ministers before it; and whenever his day of account should come, he declared himself ready to meet it without fear. On the 6th of December, a resolution of censure on the ministers was moved in the House of Commons by the Earl of Upper Ossory, relative to the affairs of Ireland.* This motion was supported by Mr. Dunning, a lawyer and speaker of great eminence, and by Mr. Burke, who drew a parallel between the situation of Ireland and that of America.† Lord North, who opposed the motion, declared his intention to bring forward certain resolutions respecting Ireland in a few days, which he trusted would meet the ideas of gentlemen on both sides of the House. The motion was then negatived by 173 against 100; and a similar motion, in the Peers, by the Earl of Shelburne, was negatived by 82 against 37. Lord North, agreeably to his intimation, brought forward his propositions respecting Ireland, comprising several important concessions, particularly that Ireland should be allowed the free exportation of her woollens. These resolutions passed unanimously, and were received in Ireland with delight and exultation.

* The most remarkable consequence resulting from the appearance of this vast armament in the British seas, was the resolution with which it inspired the inhabitants of the kingdom of Ireland. Seeing themselves in a manner abandoned by England, their troops withdrawn, their commerce unprotected, their grievances unredressed, military and mercantile associations began every where to be formed; and in a short time, an army of 500,000 volunteers was created, disciplined, and equipped; and resolutions were almost universally passed against the use of British manufactures. The English ministers furnished the new-raised army with arms from the royal magazines. The Irish Parliament met on the 12th of October, and, to the usual address, an amendment was moved and adopted by a great majority, to insert in the body of the address:—"We beg leave humbly to represent to your Majesty, that it is not by temporary expedients, but by a free trade, that this nation is now to be saved from impending ruin." The Lords concurred; and the addresses were carried up to the Lord Lieutenant amidst the acclamations of the people. The thanks of both Houses were unanimously voted to the volunteer corps throughout the kingdom, for their patriotic exertions; and a six months' money bill passed the Commons, in order to prevent a sudden prorogation.

Eighty-five thousand men had been, early in the session, voted for the sea service, and before the recess, 111,000 for the land service, exclusively of militia, amounting, with the additional volunteer companies, to upwards of 42,000. The foreign troops in British pay were calculated at 24,000, and the artillery, at 6000. The aggregate therefore, was nearly 270,000, besides the troops upon the Irish and Indian establishments. To support this force, 12,000,000*l.* were raised by way of loan, in addition to the permanent means of supply.

A spirit of economy now began to be called for by the people. About the commencement of the year 1780, public meetings were convened in many of the counties, and petitions to Parliament were framed, expressly with this view. The county of York took the lead on this occasion; and its petition ‡ was presented to the House on the 8th of February, by Sir George Saville, member for the county, who stated, that it was signed by above eight thousand freeholders.§

A. D. 1780.] Several other similar petitions having been presented, Mr. Burke brought forward a specific plan of reform, aiming at two grand objects: "first, the reduction of the national expenditure; second, the diminution of regal influence—that influence which took away all vigour from our arms, wisdom from our councils, and every shadow of authority and credit from the most venerable parts of the constitution."—In pursuance of this plan, Mr. Burke moved for leave to bring in certain bills "For the better regulation of his Majesty's civil establishments, for the sale of forest and other crown lands, for more perfectly uniting to the crown the principality of Wales, the counties palatine of Chester and Lancaster, and the duchy of Cornwall." These bills, after much violent discussion, in the course of which the minister was more than once left in a minority, were finally lost. A bill was soon afterwards brought in, for instituting a commission of accounts, consisting of persons not members of the House of Commons. In the Peers, on the day that the petition from the county of York was presented to the Commons, the Earl of Shelburne moved, "For the appointment of a committee of members of both Houses of Parliament, possessing neither employments nor pensions, to examine into the public expenditure, and the mode of accounting for the same." This motion was negatived by 101 against 55; the largest minority that had for many years been known in the Peers.

It was on the 6th of April that the House of Commons resolved itself into a grand committee, on the motion of Mr. Dunning, to take the petitions of the people into consideration. On this occasion a very remarkable debate occurred. "The first object," the honourable mover said, "which he meant to submit to

* His Lordship observed, that "the ministers seemed totally to have abandoned the government of that country to chance. They neither felt for its distresses nor provided against its resentments. The present state of Ireland was truly alarming, and seemed to portend a sudden dissolution of the constitutional connection which had so long subsisted between the two countries. To the shameful inattention and criminal neglect of the ministry, who might, in the early stages of the miseries of that kingdom, have granted the Irish nation substantial relief, was the present spirit of resistance wholly imputable. To what had the conduct of ministers led? Either to an unreserved acquiescence in every proposition which Ireland, in her present distempered state, might think proper to demand, or the horrible alternative of a civil war, while engaged in the present unequal contest with France, Spain, and America."

† "In Ireland," said Mr. Burke, "as a few years since in America, non-importation agreements had taken place. The Irish, like the Americans, had resolved to consume no more British manufactures. They had armed and arrayed themselves, and now insisted upon a free trade, or were determined to break off all political connection with this country. Why then, had not the ministry adopted the same measures respecting Ireland as they had respecting America? Why had they not treated Dublin as they had treated Boston? Why had they not shut up the port of Dublin, burnt Cork, and reduced Waterford to ashes? Why had they not prohibited all popular meetings in that kingdom, and destroyed all popular elections? Why had they not altered the usual mode of striking juries, as was done by the Massachussets Bay charter Bill? Why were not the Dublin rioters brought over to this country to be tried by an English jury? Why were not the principal leaders of the Irish armed associations proscribed, and the whole kingdom declared to be in rebellion? The answer was plain and direct. The ministers dared not. Sad and dear-bought experience had even taught them the folly, as well as the impracticability, of such measures. The danger of the present awful moment had made insolence and arrogance give way to fear and humiliation."

‡ The petitioners earnestly requested, "that, before any new burdens were laid upon this country, effectual measures might be taken by that House to enquire into and correct the gross abuses in the expenditure of the public money; to reduce all exorbitant emoluments; to rescind and abolish all sinecure places and unmerited pensions; and to appropriate the produce to the necessities of the state in such manner as to the wisdom of Parliament should seem meet."

§ "This petition," he observed, "had been procured by no underhand arts or public canvass; it was first moved in a meeting of six hundred gentlemen; and there was, he believed, more property in the hall where it was agreed to, than was contained within the walls of the House of Commons. It was a petition, he said, to which the administration would not dare to refuse a hearing, however the arts of ministerial artifice and finesse might be employed to defeat the purpose of it."

the House, was a proposition collected from the several petitions, which, if agreed to, would establish the grounds of their prayer for redress. His second proposition should include the means of that redress. Should the House concur in his propositions, he meant to follow them up with real, substantial, and practicable measures. But, should they dissent from them, or endeavour to evade or procrastinate, there would be at once an end of the petitions and a full answer to the petitioner. His first motion was, that it should be resolved by this House, 'that the influence of the crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished.'" This motion was warmly supported by the speaker of the House, who, seldom taking part in their debates, declared, "That, on an occasion like the present, he should deem himself criminal in remaining silent; the resolution proposed contained an allegation which was too notorious to require proof—which, in its full extent, did not admit of proof—it could be known only to the members of that House:—as they were the only persons competent to resolve it, they were bound as jurors by the conviction arising in their own minds, and were obliged to determine accordingly. The powers, constitutionally vested in the executive part of the government, were (he said) amply sufficient for all the purposes of good government, but its undue influence had increased to a degree absolutely incompatible with every just idea of a limited monarchy. What the petitioners demanded should have originated within those walls; they were sitting as the representatives of the people, solely for their advantage and benefit, and were pledged to them for the faithful discharge of their trust." The Lord Advocate of Scotland, Henry Dundas, moved, as an amendment, to prefix the words "It is now necessary to declare;" but the original motion was carried, by 233, against 215; so that ministers were left in a minority of 18. Mr. Dunning then moved, "that it was competent to that House to examine into and to correct abuses in the expenditure of the civil list, as well as in every other branch of the public revenue, whenever it shall seem expedient to the House to do so." This motion was also carried. It was then moved, by Mr. Thomas Pitt, "That it was the duty of that House to provide, as far as might be, an immediate and effectual redress of the abuses complained of in the petitions presented to the House from the different counties, cities, and towns, in this kingdom." Lord North most earnestly implored the committee, as he had done on the former motion, to desist, but the resolution was agreed to. Mr. Fox then moved, "that the resolutions should be immediately reported to the House." This was protested against by Lord North, as violent, arbitrary, and contrary to the established usage of Parliament. The motion, however, was carried; and the chairman reporting the resolutions accordingly, they were severally agreed to by the House. Four days afterwards, the committee being resumed, Mr. Dunning moved, "that there be laid before the House every session, within seven days after the meeting of Parliament, an account of all moneys paid out of the civil revenue to, or for the use of, or in trust for, any member of Parliament since the last recess." This, though objected to by ministers, was carried without a division. Mr. Dunning next moved, "that the persons holding the offices of treasurer of the chamber, treasurer of the household, cofferer of the household, comptroller of the household, master of the household, clerks of the green cloth, and their deputies, should be rendered incapable of a seat in that House." This also was opposed; but, on a division, it was carried by 215 against 213. So far the opposition had triumphantly proceeded, when the sudden illness of the speaker obliged the House to adjourn to the 24th of April; when, the committee having been resumed, Mr. Dunning moved for an address, "that his Majesty would be pleased not to dissolve the Parliament or prorogue the present session until the objects of the petitions were answered." This motion, to the unbounded astonishment and chagrin of the opposition, was rejected, by 251 against 203. It was evident, that, during the recess, a sudden change had taken place in the temper and disposition of the House. Mr. Fox, after the division, severely reprobated the conduct of these men who had thus receded from the solemn engagements which they had so recently entered into; and Mr. Dunning charged them with direct treachery to the nation, considering this resolution as an effectual bar to all future means and efforts of redress. On a subsequent resumption of the subject, he moved "that the two resolutions passed on the 10th of April be reported." A motion, however, was made from the opposite side of the House, "that the chairman leave the chair," which, on a division, was carried by 177 to 134. Thus miserably ended those memorable deliberations.

During the session of 1778, an act had been passed relieving the Roman Catholics from some of the heavier penalties inflicted upon them in the last century. This measure was much approved in England; but in Scotland, it excited great indignation, and dangerous popular commotions. Violent tumults took place at Edinburgh and Glasgow; the Popish chapel in the metropolis was destroyed; and the houses of the principal Catholics were attacked and plundered; and the fanatics formed themselves into a society, termed the "Protestant Association," to oppose any remission of the laws against the Papists. Of this association, Lord George Gordon, a man in the highest degree wild, eccentric, and enthusiastical, was chosen president. This association gradually extended to England; much pains were taken to prejudice the minds of the vulgar against the relaxation of the penal code; and it was at length determined to prepare a petition for a repeal of the law alluded to, which is affirmed to have obtained 120,000 signatures, chiefly of men of the lowest orders of society. Lord George Gordon, who was a member of the House of Commons, declined to present this petition, unless he were accompanied to the House by at least 20,000 men. A meeting of the association was, consequently, convened in St. George's Fields (June 2, 1780) whence it was supposed that not fewer than 50,000 persons proceeded in regular divisions with Lord George Gordon at their head, to the House of Commons, where his Lordship presented their petition. Towards evening this multitude began to grow very tumultuous, and grossly insulted several members of both Houses, compelling them, in passing to and from the House, to cry, No Popery! and to wear blue cockades. During the debates on the petition, Lord George Gordon frequently addressed the mob without, stating to them, "that the people of Scotland had no redress till they pulled down the Popish chapels." Subsequently to the adjournment, the mob, agreeably to this suggestion, proceeded to demolish the chapels of the Sardinian and Bavarian ambassadors. The military were ordered out; and, though they were unable to prevent the mischief, they apprehended several of the rioters. The following day, Saturday, passed quietly; but on Sunday the rioters re-assembled in vast numbers, and destroyed the chapels and private dwellings belonging to the principal Catholics in the vicinity of Moorfields. On Monday they extended their devastations to other parts of the town; and the house of Sir George Saville, in Leicester Fields, was totally demolished; Sir George having been the proposer of the obnoxious bill. They also destroyed a Catholic chapel, in Virginia Street, Ratcliffe Highway, and a valuable library belonging to the priests. On Tuesday, the day for taking the petition into consideration, the mob again surrounded the Parliament House, repeating their outrages and insults. After passing some resolutions adapted to the occasion, and expressive of their indignation, the House adjourned. In the evening, the populace attacked the prison of Newgate, where their comrades were confined, and, setting the building in flames, liberated upwards of three hundred felons and debtors. They next proceeded to Lord Mansfield's house, in Bloomsbury square, which they totally demolished, his Lordship himself escaping with some difficulty. The prisons of Clerkenwell were also forced, many private houses were plundered or destroyed, and scarcely did the

the night afford any cessation of the riots. On Wednesday, the mob, more desperate than ever, attacked with incredible fury the houses of various individuals, chiefly Catholics, which they had previously marked for destruction. In the evening the King's Bench, the Fleet Prison, the New Compter, and a large distillery in Holborn, were set on fire; and, with a prodigious number of private dwellings in different parts of the town burning at the same time, formed a tremendous scene of conflagration. Attempts were also made on the Bank and Pay Office; but these, being strongly guarded, fortunately escaped destruction. At this time, the public indignation was much excited by the supineness of the magistracy of London. At length a privy council was convened, at which several members of the opposition attended, and the King himself declared, "That, although the magistrates had not done their duty, he would not be deficient in his." General orders were then immediately transmitted to the military to fire upon the rioters, without waiting for directions from the civil magistrate; in consequence of which, by noon, on Thursday, order and tranquillity were perfectly restored, though at the expence of several of the rioters' lives. Lord George Gordon was taken into custody, and, after a strict examination before the privy council, committed close prisoner to the Tower on a charge of high treason. On his trial, however, he escaped punishment, rather from an impropriety in the charge, as to the nature of his crime, than from actual innocence. A special commission was issued for the trial of the rioters, of whom a great number, consisting of men very opposite in description and character, were apprehended. Lord chief justice De-Grey, whose infirm health, and benignant disposition, were ill-suited to this task, resigning his office, the attorney general Wedderburne was advanced to the chief justice-ship, under the title of Lord Loughborough. His Lordship proceeded against the delinquents with great severity; fifty-nine of the prisoners being capitally convicted. After proper inquiries had been made, the sufferers in these tumults received full compensation for their losses.*

In opening the Parliament, on the 19th of June, his Majesty "lamented the necessity which had obliged him, by every tie of duty and affection to his people, to employ the force entrusted to him for the suppression of those acts of felony and treason, which had overborne all civil authority, and threatened the immediate subversion of all legal power, the destruction of all property, and the confusion of every order in the state;—at the same time renewed his assurances, that he had no other object than to make the laws of the realm, and the principles of the constitution, the rule and measure of his conduct." The address of thanks for this speech was voted without a single negative. Parliament was prorogued on the 18th of July, nothing of importance having occurred during the session.

Requisition had been made by the English court to the States General, soon after the declaration of war against Spain, for the succours stipulated by the treaty of 1678; but no answer could be obtained. Loud complaints on the contrary were made of the conduct of the English court, which had caused to be seized, and carried into the different ports of Britain, ships belonging to the subjects of the republic, navigated under the faith of treaties, and not laden with contraband goods. England complained, with equal truth, "That France received from Holland, continual supplies of naval and military stores, contrary to the faith of treaties; that the principle of self defence warranted the seizure and detention of all vessels laden with such exceptionable cargoes." Thus, the questions respecting the rights of the neutral flag were again revived. On the 1st of January, in the present year, Commodore Fielding fell in with a fleet of Dutch merchant ships off Portland, under convoy of Count Byland. The English commodore desiring permission to visit the merchant ships, to ascertain whether they contained contraband goods, was refused; on which he fired a shot a-head of the Dutch Admiral, who answered with a broadside. Commodore Fielding returned the compliment, and the Dutch immediately struck their colours. The merchant ships which had naval stores on board were stopped, and Count Byland was informed that he was at liberty to hoist his colours and prosecute his voyage. He refused, however, to quit his convoy, and accompanied Commodore Fielding to Portsmouth. A peremptory demand was made, by the Dutch Count, of reparation and redress, but without effect; and on the 17th of April a declaration was issued by the King of Great Britain, announcing, "That repeated memorials having been presented by his Majesty's ambassador to the States General, demanding the succours stipulated by treaty, to which requisition they had given no answer, nor signified any intention of compliance, his Majesty considered their high mightinesses as having deserted the alliance that had so long subsisted between Great Britain and the Republic: and his Majesty from this time suspended, provisionally, all the stipulations of the several existing treaties, particularly of the marine treaty concluded at London, A. D. 1674."†

Scarcely had the war between England and Spain commenced, when the blockade of Gibraltar was formed by sea and land; the hope of recovering that fortress having probably operated as no inconsiderable inducement with Spain to engage in the war. Sir George Rodney was appointed to the command of a powerful fleet, for the relief of that place, having on board Prince William Henry, (now Duke of Clarence) the King's third son. On the northern coast of Spain he fell in with a convoy of twenty-two merchantships richly laden, under the protection of a squadron of seven ships of war, to which he immediately gave chace, and in a few hours, the whole were taken. On the 16th of January, off

* On the very day that the riots commenced, the Duke of Richmond gave notice of his design to bring in a bill for annual Parliaments, and a more equal representation of the people in the House of Commons. His Grace declared the national representation to be flagrantly and grossly corrupt. The constitution had been impaired, and was impairing daily by the accumulation of abuses: Parliament was becoming more and more servile: and the tendency of the prevailing system was, to make the will of the sovereign the rule and measure of the government. He even proceeded to assert, that the present Parliament was in reality no Parliament at all, because it was not founded on that principle which could alone constitute them the legitimate representatives of the people. The most effectual remedy for the existing evils would be to shorten the duration of Parliaments, rendering them annual; and to cause every man in the kingdom, of full age and not disqualified by law, to be represented in the House of Commons. His Grace proposed, that this bill should be read once only during the present session, and then be left upon the table, that it might be fully considered by their Lordships during the recess. At this very time, the House was prevented from listening by the outrages of the lawless multitude without, who, according to the principles of this dangerous bill, were henceforth to be invested with the power of returning representatives to Parliament: the populace were on the point of rushing into the House, opposed only by the activity and resolution of the door keepers and attendants. Several Peers were grossly insulted, and on entering exhibited proofs of the indignities which they had sustained; and the House at length adjourned in the utmost confusion. This crude and indigested measure was never again revived in either House of Parliament; but the bold and plausible, though erroneous and pernicious, principles on which it was founded, were many years publicly avowed by the Duke of Richmond, and under his sanction they acquired great credit.

† The powers of the North, in more decided language than Holland, declared their resolution to adopt such measures as were necessary for their own security. In the spring of this year the Empress of Russia had addressed a declaration to the courts of London, Versailles, and Madrid, containing an explicit statement of the principles on which she had determined to act for the removal of those molestations which had interrupted the navigation of her subjects, and for the protection of the liberty of commerce in general. The main principles laid down were:—

"I. That neutral ships should enjoy a free navigation even from port to port, and on the coasts of the belligerent powers.

"II. That all effects belonging to the subjects of the belligerent powers shall be looked upon as free on board such neutral ships, excepting only warlike stores or ammunition—but neither the vessels, passengers, nor the rest of the goods, shall be liable to seizure or detention."

To these principles, the Empress declared "she was firmly resolved to adhere; and, for the honour of her flag, and the security of her subjects, she had ordered a considerable part of her naval forces to be equipped, to act wherever her honour, interest, or necessity, should require." Denmark and Sweden acceding to this declaration of Russia, and ordering similar equipments of the marine, this confederacy acquired the appellation of "the armed neutrality;" and the basis on which it was founded seemed to give much satisfaction throughout Europe,—excepting to England.

Cape St. Vincent, he descried a Spanish squadron, consisting of fourteen sail of the line. At four in the afternoon an action began, and in little more than half an hour, the San Domingo, one of the Spanish ships, blew up. The engagement, however, continued with unabating fury, in the midst of darkness and confusion, increased by the tempestuousness of the weather, and before morning the Phœnix of 80 guns, Don Juan de Langara, the Spanish Admiral's own ship; the Monarca, the Princessa, the Diligente, of 70 guns each, struck their colours; the St. Julien and St. Eugenio were also captured, but through the violence of the weather were afterwards driven on shore and lost. The others escaped in a very shattered condition; and the whole squadron, as to any immediate capability of service, might be considered as annihilated. The force of Admiral Rodney was greatly superior; and his skill and courage were displayed in the mode of conducting the attack, which the violence of the storm, the darkness of the night, and the vicinity of a lee-shore every where encircled with shoals and breakers, rendered very dangerous. His own ship, the Sandwich, and several others, were in great danger of being lost on the shoals of St. Lucar, and did not get into deep water till the next day. Having effected the relief of Gibraltar, Sir George proceeded to the West Indies, sending home his prizes under the care of Admiral Digby, who, on his passage, captured the Prothée, a French ship of 64 guns, and part of her convoy of merchant ships. In the West Indies, he made every possible exertion to bring on a general action; but Count de Guichen, who commanded the French fleet, cautiously evaded his efforts. Intelligence, however, having been received that, in the night of the 15th of April, they had put to sea with their whole force, the English Admiral, who was stationed at St. Lucie, followed, and early on the morning of the 17th came in sight of the enemy. At noon, Sir George, being to windward, made the signal for a general and close engagement, bearing down upon the French Admiral, whom he fought with unremitting fury, attempting, in vain, by a manœuvre long unpractised, to break the enemy's line of battle, till de Guichen bore away, leaving the Sandwich a mere wreck. Some other partial and indecisive encounters afterwards took place.

About this time, the Spanish governor of Louisiana, reduced the British settlements on the Mississippi, and made great progress in the conquest of the province of West Florida. By the English, an expedition had been undertaken from Jamaica to the Spanish main; and the fortress of Omoa, which contained a considerable booty in specie and merchandise, was taken by storm, but soon afterwards evacuated. A heavy misfortune took place in the autumn of this year, in the entire capture of the outward bound East and West India fleets, in the Bay of Biscay, by the Spaniards. Such a booty was never before carried into the port of Cadiz.

In the northern provinces of America, the war seemed, during the summer of 1780, to be nearly at a stand. On the 10th of July, a large body of French troops, said to be only the vanguard of a much greater force, commanded by the Comte de Rochambeau, under convoy of a considerable fleet, arrived at Rhode Island. Sir Henry Clinton and Admiral Arbuthnot soon afterwards planned a combined attack against the French and Americans at Rhode Island. A large proportion of the forces stationed at New York were embarked for that purpose; but General Washington, by a rapid movement, compelled them to desist.* In the autumn, a remarkable event took place in the defection of the American General Arnold, who commanded a considerable body of troops at West Point on the North River. Having some time held a secret correspondence with Sir Henry Clinton, he had agreed to deliver into his hands that important post, and the whole of the troops entrusted to him. The intercourse between the American and English Generals was carried on through the medium of Major André, a young man of singular accomplishments, who had passed up the river unknown and unsuspected, from the head-quarters at New York, to the post of West Point. On his return by land, however, (September 23,) he was taken in disguise, and with a false passport, by three American privates, to whom he in vain offered large rewards if they would suffer him to escape. On examination, the papers found upon him discovered all the particulars of the conspiracy. His case being referred to a board of general officers, of which the Marquis de la Fayette (who afterwards made so conspicuous a figure in the French revolution) was one, they unanimously determined that he came under the denomination of a spy; and that, agreeably to the law and usage of nations, he ought to suffer death. This, notwithstanding the solicitations and menaces of Sir Henry Clinton, who anxiously sought the means of saving him, was, on the 2d of October, inflicted by the hands of the hangman! a deed, the memory of which must rest, for ever, as a foul and indelible stain upon the character of Washington.† General Arnold, with great difficulty, made his escape to New York, where he was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General in the service of his Majesty.

Subsequently to the departure of Sir Henry Clinton from Carolina, Lord Cornwallis was left with a force apparently inadequate to maintain possession of the province against the increasing armies of the Americans, of which General Gates, the conqueror of Burgoyne, had taken the command. The British forces, having advanced towards the north frontier of the province, found their further progress intercepted by the enemy, who with far superior numbers were posted near the town of Camden. The English General, sensible that a retreat would be equal to an abandonment of the recent conquests, determined to risk an engagement; and in the night of the 15th of August, the troops were put in motion, in hope of surprising General Gates in his camp. That commander, with a similar intention respecting Lord Cornwallis, had marched his troops during the night to the attack of the British camp, and the advanced parties of the two armies unexpectedly met in a wood near Camden. Both parties were quiet till day-light appeared, when the action commenced on the part of the British, who were well pleased to observe that the Americans had been under the necessity of taking a disadvantageous and confined position, bounded by swamps, which prevented their making any efficacious use of their great numerical superiority. The militia, of whom General Gates's army chiefly consisted, were unable to resist the attack of the bayonet, and fled at the first onset. The continental troops maintained their ground, till, finding themselves deserted by the militia, they were compelled to retreat with the loss of nearly 2,000 men, leaving behind them their cannon, camp-equipage, &c. This victory seems to have been the most complete which was obtained in the whole course of the war: the pursuit continued for more than twenty miles; and Colonel Tarleton, coming up with a detached corps at the Catawba fords under General Sumpter, charged them with such vigour that they were instantly broken, and the greater part either cut to pieces or taken prisoners. General Gates left the remains of his army to the care of General Smallwood, and retired into North Carolina. Lord Cornwallis, desirous of improving his victory to the utmost, advanced, as soon as the excessive heats would permit, to the vicinity of Salisbury,

* This year, the legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act, in commemoration of their own independence, "That no child born hereafter shall be a slave; that Negro and Mulatto children shall be servants only till twenty-eight years of age; that all slaves shall be registered before the 1st of November next; that they shall be tried like other inhabitants; and that no Negroes or Mulattoes, other than infants, shall be bound for longer than seven years."

† Poor André, for whose fate many a tear will yet be shed, made it his earnest, sole, and last request, that he might be permitted to die as a soldier, not as a felon! He might have anticipated the words of the gallant Porlier, sacrificed by the besotted government of Ferdinand the VIIth of Spain, in the winter of 1815. "Be not affected at the kind of death they inflict upon me, since it can dishonour only the wicked, but covers the good with honour and glory!"

on the frontier of North Carolina, having first detached Major Ferguson to the western side of the province to collect and arm the Royalists in that quarter. As soon as the communication of Ferguson with Lord Cornwallis was interrupted by the extension of the distance, a plan was formed to surround and cut him entirely off. Divers corps of the provincial militia effected a rapid junction with the mountaineers of the western districts, under the command of Colonels Williams and Cleaveland, to the amount of several thousand men, and, marching in quest of Ferguson, soon discovered his encampment on King's Mountain. The Americans ascended the hill in various directions. Major Ferguson was successful whenever he directed his efforts; but as soon as one division was driven back, the former resumed its station; so that his exertions were entirely unavailing. His unconquerable spirit, however, disdained the idea of surrender, and the unequal conflict continued till he received a mortal wound; no chance of escape being left, nor prospect of successful resistance remaining, the second in command called for quarter; which was granted, and more than eight hundred men laid down their arms, about three hundred having been killed or wounded in the action.

On the first intelligence of this disaster, Lord Cornwallis retreated to Wynnesborough, where he was much harassed by the irregular but continual attacks of the provincials.

An important occurrence now attracted the attention of the British government. On the 3d of September, the Mercury, a Congress packet, was taken by the Vestal frigate off the banks of Newfoundland; and Mr. Laurens, late president of the Congress, charged with a commission to Holland, was found on board. When brought to England, he was examined by the privy council, and committed to the Tower, on an accusation of high treason. His papers had been thrown overboard, but by great dexterity and diligence they were recovered and deciphered and found to contain the sketch of a treaty of amity and commerce between the Republic of Holland and the States of America. This treaty appeared to be in a train of negociation, and to have received the sanction and approbation of M. Van Berkel, counsellor and pensionary of Amsterdam. Such was the offence taken by the British court at this discovery, that immediate orders were transmitted to Sir Joseph Yorke, to represent to the States General, "that the States of Amsterdam, as appeared from the papers of Mr. Laurens, had entered into a clandestine correspondence with the American rebels, and that instructions and powers had been given by them for the purpose of concluding a treaty of indissoluble friendship with the said rebels. His Britannic Majesty, therefore, required not only a formal disavowal of so irregular a conduct, but also insisted on speedy satisfaction adequate to the offence, and the exemplary punishment of the pensionary Van Berkel, and his accomplices, as disturbers of the public peace and violators of the rights of nations; otherwise the King would be obliged to take such steps as became his dignity and the interests of his subjects." The States General passed resolutions of disavowal and inquiry; but they delayed to give a formal and explicit answer to this declaration; and, after some further fruitless efforts, Sir Joseph Yorke received orders to leave the Hague, and a declaration of war was published against Holland on the 20th of December. This was a measure totally unexpected on the part of the States General, and for which they were ill-prepared.

The old Parliament was dissolved on the 1st of September; and, at the meeting of the new one (October 31) Mr. Cornwall was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons in the room of Sir Fletcher Norton, by 203 voices against 134. His Majesty, in his opening speech, declared "His satisfaction in having an opportunity, by the recent election, of receiving the most certain information of the disposition and wishes of his people, to which he was always inclined to pay the utmost attention! He acknowledged the arduous situation of public affairs; but the late signal successes of his arms in Georgia and Carolina would, he trusted, have important consequences, in bringing the war to a happy conclusion." An amendment to the address, consisting in the omission of several complimentary paragraphs, was moved in the House of Commons by Mr. Thomas Grenville; but it was negatived, by a majority of 69, in favour of the original address.

On the 25th of January, 1781, two days after the Christmas recess, Lord North delivered a message from the King, in which his Majesty acquainted the House of Commons, "That, during the recess of Parliament, he had been obliged to direct letters of marque and general reprisal to be issued against the States General of the United Provinces. For the causes and motives of his conduct he referred to his public manifesto, which, with various other papers, he had ordered to be laid before the House." Lord North in consequence moved, "That an address be presented to his Majesty, assuring him that the House would, with a firm and determined resolution, support the just and necessary war against Holland, for the maintenance of the honour of his crown, and the rights and interests of his people." This motion was seconded by Lord Lewisham; but it met with considerable opposition in both Houses; and, in the Peers, it was observed, by Lord Camden, that, "As to what was called the treaty between Holland and America, it was the mere unauthorised act of Van Berkel, and betrayed neither directly nor indirectly any intention in the States General of a hostile nature. It did not even appear that they knew any thing of this man or his colleagues; and much less that they had determined to ratify this pretended treaty, or project of a treaty, by which no one was bound, and no one could be injured." The addresses, however, were carried by great majorities; but the dissentient Peers recorded their objections in a strong and vigorous protest.

The memorable Reform Bill of Mr. Burke was revived soon after the recess; but, on the motion for the second reading, it was thrown out by 233 voices against 190.*

In the month of March, Lord North brought forward the annual statement of the public account. The entire expenditure of the year his Lordship calculated "at twenty-one millions,—twelve of which it would be necessary to raise by a public loan; as to the terms of which, his Lordship had contracted with the subscribers, to grant 150*l.* capital stock at three per cent. and 25*l.* capital stock at four per cent. for every 100*l.* in money; thus creating a new capital of eighteen millions three per cent. and three millions four per cent.

* The speech which attracted most strongly the public attention, was that which was delivered by Mr. William Pitt, second son of the late Earl of Chatham, who in early youth had been elected a member of the present Parliament, and who now exhibited himself as the heir of his father's talents and virtues. "One great object," said Mr. Pitt, "of all the petitions which had been presented, was a recommendation of œconomy in the public expenditure; and the design of the present bill was, to carry into effect the wishes of the people, by introducing a substantial system of œconomy. Besides the benefits which would result from the bill in this respect, it had another object still more important, and that was the reduction of the influence of the crown—an influence which was the more to be dreaded, because more secret in its attacks, and more concealed in its operations, than the power of prerogative." The youthful orator adverted to the extraordinary objections which had been made to the bill, which proposed to bring no more than 200,000*l.* per annum into the public coffers, and that sum was insignificant, in comparison of the millions annually expended. "What then is the conclusion we are left to deduce? The calamities of the present crisis are too great to be benefited by œconomy. Our expences are so enormous, that it is useless to give ourselves any concern about them; we have spent and are spending so much, that it is foolish to think of saving any thing. Such is the language which the opponents of this bill have virtually employed. It had also been said, that the King's civil list was an irresumable Parliamentary grant, and it had been even compared to a private freehold. The weakness of such arguments was their best refutation. The civil list revenue was granted to his Majesty not for his private use, but for the support of the executive government of the state. His Majesty, in fact, was the trustee of the public, subject to Parliamentary revision. The Parliament made the grant, and undoubtedly had a right to resume it when the pressure of the times rendered such resumption necessary. Upon the whole, he considered the present bill as essential to the being and independence of this country, and he would give it his most determined support."

being nine millions more than the sum actually paid into the Exchequer. To defray the interest of this loan, new taxes would be wanting to the amount of 660,000*l.* annually, i. e. 60,000*l.* more than the legal established interest of five per cent. exclusive of which, as the subscription to the loan bore an immediate premium of ten per cent. the further sum of 1,200,000*l.* was lost to the nation." The terms of this contract were, even by several of the friends of the minister, declared to be extravagantly high; and Mr. Fox reprobated them in the most indignant expressions of severity; but, on a division, the motion was carried by 169 against 111 voices. Some weeks afterwards, however, the subject was revived by a motion of Sir George Saville's, that a select committee be appointed, to inquire into the circumstances of the last loan, to make an estimate of its terms, and report the same to the House. A vehement debate ensued, at the conclusion of which the motion was negatived by 211 against 166. Towards the end of the session Mr. Fox moved for a committee, to consider of the American war, for the purpose of devising some means of accommodation. This motion was supported by Mr. Pitt, who expressed his utter abhorrence of a war, "which," he said, "was conceived in injustice, nurtured in folly, and whose footsteps were marked with slaughter and devastation. It exhibited the height of moral depravity and human turpitude. The nation was drained of its best blood and its vital resources, for which nothing was received in return but a series of inefficient victories or disgraceful defeats,—victories obtained over men struggling in the holy cause of liberty,—or defeats which filled the land with mourning for the loss of dear and valuable relatives, slain in a detested and impious quarrel." The motion was negatived, by 172 against 99; and, on the 18th of July, the session was closed by a speech, in which the King observed, that "the great efforts made by the nation to surmount the difficulties of the present arduous and complicated war, must convince the world that the ancient spirit of the British nation was not abated or diminished, and he was resolved to accept of no other terms or conditions of peace than such as might consist with the honour and dignity of his crown, and the permanent interests and security of his people."*

In the course of this year, an attempt was made to effect

* A considerable proportion of this session had been occupied in the consideration of the affairs of India; where, since the summer of 1779, the war had become very general; a most formidable combination of the country powers, in opposition to the English, having taken place, which, assisted by the fleets and armies of France, seemed to menace the very existence of the empire of Britain in the East. Hyder Ally, the old and inveterate enemy of the Company, in the month of July, 1780, broke into the Carnatic with an immense army, and committed the most dreadful ravages. This sanguinary conqueror, "finding," to use the language of Burke, "that he had to do with men whom no treaty could bind, resolved in the gloomy recesses of a mind capacious of such things, to leave the whole Carnatic an everlasting monument of vengeance, and to put perpetual desolation as a barrier between him and those against whom the faith which holds the moral elements of the world together was no protection. Having terminated his disputes with every enemy, and every rival, burying their mutual animosities in their common detestation, and compounding all the materials of fury, havock, and desolation, into one black cloud, he hung for a while on the declivities of the mountains. Whilst the authors of all these evils were idly and stupidly gazing on this menacing meteor which blackened all their horizon, it suddenly burst and poured down the whole of its contents upon the plains of the Carnatic. Then ensued a scene of woe which no eye had seen, no heart conceived, and which no tongue can adequately tell. All the horrors of war before known or heard of were mercy to that new havock. A storm of universal fire blasted every field, consumed every house, destroyed every temple. The miserable inhabitants flying from their flaming villages in part were slaughtered: others, without regard to sex, to age, to the respect of rank, or sacredness of function, enveloped in a whirlwind of cavalry, were swept into captivity in an unknown and hostile land. One dead silence reigned over the whole region. This hurricane of war passed through every part of the central provinces of the Carnatic." On the 10th of September, (1780) Hyder Ally attacked and surrounded a considerable detached corps under Colonel Baillie, which after great, but unavailing, efforts of valour, were cut to pieces, or made prisoners; Sir Hector Monro, who commanded in the Carnatic, precipitately retreating towards Madras. Hyder next assailed and rendered himself master of Arcot; and scarcely did the government at Madras believe itself to be in safety when Sir Eyre Coote arrived, in the month of November, to take the command of the company's forces on the coast of Coromandel. Hyder Ally was, during this and the following year, in repeated engagements, foiled and defeated by this fortunate and gallant veteran. The most remarkable of these battles was fought near Porto Novo on the 1st of July, 1781. It lasted eight hours, when Hyder quitted the field, after losing four or five thousand of his best troops. Still, however, he remained extremely formidable. Several fierce encounters also took place between the French and English fleets in the Indian seas, commanded by M. Suffrein and Admiral Sir Edward Hughes. The naval force of both nations had been gradually increased, in the progress of the war, to a degree far beyond what had been known at any former period in India, amounting at the last, on the part of the British, to eighteen ships of the line of battle. The successive battles, though wholly indecisive, were obstinately, and even heroically, contested. The war on the continent of India still continued with alternate and diversified success. The valuable settlement of Negapatnam on the Coromandel coast, belonging to the Dutch, was captured by Sir Hector Monro in the month of November, 1781; and that still more important station of Trincomale, in the isle of Ceylon, by Sir Edward Hughes, a few weeks afterwards. On the other hand, Colonel Braithwaite, with a detachment of the company's troops, was totally routed on the banks of the Coleroon, in February, 1782, by Tippoo Saib, son of Hyder Ally, assisted by a body of French auxiliaries, and Cuddalore and Permaco surrendered to the victors. The operations of the war on the Malabar coast were conducted by General Goddard with great skill and spirit. Invading the province of Guzzerat, in the year 1780, he reduced the city of Amedabad, its capital; and on the 2d of April he stormed the camp of the Mahrattas commanded by Madajee Scindia, whom he totally defeated. Entering into a treaty with the Rajah of Gohud, Major Popham, by order of the General, attacked and carried, in the course of the summer, the strong fortress of Gualior, which was garrisoned by the Mahrattas, though within the territory of the Rajah. Early in 1781, General Goddard sat down before Basseen; and after reducing that important place he desisted from farther active operations, in consequence of the succours which he was obliged to send to Sir Eyre Coote. In the province of Malva, Colonel Carnac surprised, (April 30,) the camp of the enemy, and Madajee Scindia was a second time totally routed. After this the Mahratta chieftain made secret overtures for a separate peace; and a cessation of hostilities between England and the Mahratta states took place in the month of October, 1781. The definitive articles of peace were signed in May following, at Salberg, by Mr. Anderson on the part of the Company, and by Scindia, general and plenipotentiary, on the part of the Peishwa. By this treaty Basseen and the other recent acquisitions in the Guzzerat were restored to the Mahrattas, the island of Salsette only of the late conquests remaining to the English; for, at the request of Madajee Scindia, the English consented also to relinquish their claim to the city of Baroach and the contiguous districts. Ragonaut Row was for ever abandoned, and compelled to quit the territories of the Company; and their ally, the Rajah of Gohud, who appears to have opposed duplicity to duplicity, was, under the pretext of "leaving him to settle his own affairs," virtually delivered up to the mercy of his enemies.

In the session of 1780-1, as already mentioned, the affairs of India attracted the attention of Parliament, in consequence of a petition presented to the House of Commons from the governor and council at Calcutta, a second from the British settlers, and a third from the native inhabitants of Bengal, against the supreme court of judicature, established by the regulating act of 1773. The two former were drawn up in a very masterly style, and demonstrated, in a striking manner, the temerity and folly of those who could attempt to engraft the laws and juridical maxims of England upon the ancient usages and immemorial institutions of Hindostan. The petition of the natives is remarkable for its pathos and simplicity. A motion, by General Smith, for referring these petitions to a select committee, was agreed to by the House; and a bill was introduced and passed, explanatory of the powers of the supreme court of judicature, and in some points limiting and restraining its jurisdiction, which had been extended, by the arbitrary encroachments of the chief justice, far beyond the real and obvious intent of the regulating act. On the motion of Lord North, a committee of secrecy, consisting, like the select committee, of fifteen members, was also appointed to inquire into the causes of the war in the Carnatic, and of the present condition of the British possessions in those parts, and to report the same with their observations thereon." Mr. Henry Dundas, Lord Advocate of Scotland, was chosen chairman of this committee.

The pacification with the Mahrattas induced the presidency of Bengal to risk a bold attempt on the dominions of Hyder Ally on the Malabar side. The kingdoms of Canara and Mysore, both under subjection to that Prince, stretch along the western coast of Hindostan, nearly in the latitude of Arcot. The chief city of the former is Bednore, a name changed by its then possessor to Hydernagore. A considerable force, already landed in the kingdom of Mysore, had relieved the city of Tellicherri, a post or factory on that coast belonging to the English, and reduced the neighbouring town of Calicut. It was with difficulty, however, that the English kept their footing in this country, when General Matthews arrived from Bombay with large reinforcements, and immediately laid siege to the important fortress of Onore, which was carried by storm on the 5th of January 1783. The carnage on this occasion was terrible; and the indiscriminate seizure of treasure, public and private, there deposited, exhibited, in the most odious light, the rapacity and avarice of the commander. At this period, the hopes of the English were elated by the death of Hyder Ally, who was succeeded by his son Tippoo Saib, who had already given proofs of an heroic spirit. From Onore, General Matthews proceeded through the Ghauts, or the passes of the mountains, to Hydernagore, which surrendered without resistance. Here, as at Onore, the General was accused of combining the effect a general accommodation; under the mediation of the courts of Vienna and St. Petersburgh. A general suspension of arms was suggested as a preliminary; but this was rejected by the British ministry, who declared the readiness of England to meet in Congress with France and Spain, but never to permit the interference of any foreign power between her and her rebellious subjects. The Bourbon courts, on the other hand, protested that they would never make a public sacrifice of their honour and good faith by abandoning the Americans. At length, all hopes of a favourable close of the negociation vanished; and, after some time, Prince Kaunitz was ordered to inform the British court of the accession of his sovereign, the Emperor of Germany, to the northern league, known by the appellation of the Armed Neutrality.

At the commencement of the year, the French had made a spirited, though abortive attempt to capture the island of Jersey by a coup-de-main.—Early on the 16th of January, a landing was effected by the Baron de Rullecourt, at the head of about 800 men, at the Bank du Violet; and, to the astonishment of the inhabitants, when the day began to dawn, the market-place of St. Helier was found occupied by French troops. The governor's house being entirely surrounded, he was compelled to surrender himself prisoner; and he was so far intimidated as to sign articles of capitulation. However, when Elizabeth Castle was summoned, Captain Aylward, the commander, far from paying the least regard to the acts of the governor in his present state of durance, fired upon the French and obliged them to retreat; and Major Pierson, a young and gallant officer, second in command, having assembled the regular troops and militia of the island on the heights near the town, attacked the enemy with the greatest resolution and vigour. Baron Rullecourt having been, at the commencement of the action, mortally wounded, the French troops in less than half an hour laid down their arms, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Unfortunately almost the last shot which was fired previously to the surrender proved fatal to Major Pierson.

Intelligence of the rupture with Holland having been promptly transmitted to the West Indies, Admiral Rodney and General Vaughan appeared, in February, with a considerable naval and military force, before the island of St. Eustatia. Totally destitute of the means of resistance, the inhabitants were compelled to surrender at discretion; with unusual rigour, the immense property found on the island was confiscated, on pretence of the assistance afforded by the inhabitants to the Americans; and the stores and merchandize, estimated at three millions sterling, were publicly sold for about one-fourth of their real value. A vast number of trading vessels lying in the harbour, and two men of war, also became the property of the victors. Nearly at the same time, the Dutch settlements of Demerary, Berbice, and Issequibo, on the Southern Main, also submitted without resistance to the arms of his Britannic Majesty. There, the same indiscriminate confiscation of private property did not take place; but the proceedings at St. Eustatia excited universal consternation; and a memorial was presented to Admiral Rodney and General Vaughan by the hands of Mr. Glanville his Majesty's Solicitor-General for St. Christopher's, strongly representing, "that if by the fate of war the British West India islands should fall into the hands of an enraged enemy, the conduct of St. Eustatia would be a pretext for them to retaliate; that the conquerors of all civilized countries had avoided the invasion of private property; that the generosity of the enemy had been very conspicuous; and even in the case of Grenada, which had been taken by storm, the rights of individuals had been held sacred: that Eustatia was a free port, and the rich and various commodities found there were far from being the sole property of the Dutch; that a great portion of it belonged to the British subjects; and that, previously to this declaration of war, the trade to Eustatia was strictly legal, and the officers of his Majesty's customs cleared out vessels from all the ports of Great Britain and Ireland for this island. And not merely the legality, but the propriety of this trade was confirmed by the conduct of his Majesty's naval officers in those seas; for if the King's enemies were supplied by the trade of his subjects through Eustatia, they were likewise supplied, through the same channel, by the sale of the prizes captured by his Majesty's ships of war."—The Admiral replied, "that he had not as yet leisure to peruse the memorial; but that the island of Eustatia was Dutch, every thing in it was Dutch, every thing was under the protection of the Dutch flag, and as Dutch it should be treated."

About this time, the French fleet under Count de Grasse, after a partial engagement with Admiral Hood, who, in the absence of Sir George Rodney, commanded the English fleet, steered its course to the island of Tobago, on which M. de Bouille, with a considerable land force, made an immediate descent. Admiral Rodney, on receiving intelligence of an attack, detached a squadron for the relief of the island, which finding the French in great force was obliged to return. The Admiral, accompanied by General Vaughan, then sailed with the whole fleet for Tobago, off the coast of which he arrived on the 4th of June, but had the mortification to learn that the island had surrendered on the second. Towards the close of the year, St. Eustatia was unexpectedly lost. M. de Bouille, having received intelligence of the habitual negligence of the garrison, landed by night about four hundred troops, part of a much larger force which the tempestuousness of the weather had separated, in a cove at the back of the island. Confiding in his fortune, he advanced with his troops, when day-light appeared, to the citadel, which they immediately stormed, and carried; and, the surprise being complete, nearly seven hundred men, with Colonel Cockburne, their commander, were constrained to surrender themselves prisoners of war. Restitution, so far as circumstances would permit, was immediately made to those unfortunate individuals who had been the meanness of fraud with the ferocity of violence; and Colonel Macleod, second in command, and several other officers, retired in in disgust from the army. Subsequently to this, Annampore, Carwa, and Mangalore, were successively subdued. In the interim, Tippoo prepared for the relief of Mysore and Canara; and, leaving a strong force to guard his conquests in the Carnatic, he marched across the peninsula with unexampled expedition, and arrived in the vicinity of Hydernagore in April, 1783. By a series of manœuvres he made himself master of the Ghauts in the rear of General Matthews, by which all communication with the sea was entirely cut off. The force of General Matthews being centred in Hydernagore, that city was invested by Tippoo with an immense army, computed at 150,000 men, covering the hills on every side as far as the eye could reach. The English, reduced to extremity, were soon obliged to surrender on capitulation, by the terms of which the public treasure was restored to the Sultan. Not a rupee, however, being found in the fortress, General Matthews was charged by the conqueror with gross collusion, and a direct infraction of the treaty. He was, consequently, taken in chains to Seringapatam, the capital of Mysore, where he was thrown into a dungeon, in which, with a great part of his officers, he miserably perished.

No decisive advantage had been gained in the last campaign with Hyder; and the ill state of health of Sir Eyre Coote obliged him to resign the army into the hands of General Stuart, and to retire at the conclusion of the year 1783 to Bengal. Early in the ensuing spring, he returned to Madras, to resume his command; but two days only after his arrival he expired, in an advanced age, having acquired, in more than thirty years' military service in India, a reputation scarcely inferior to that of his predecessor Lord Clive. The important settlement of Trincomale had been retaken by M. Suffrein in the last summer, and a large reinforcement of French troops landed in the Carnatic under M. de Bussi. Notwithstanding all opposition, General Stuart invested Cuddalore, and made considerable progress in the siege, when an express arrived with the intelligence of a treaty of peace having been concluded between the belligerent powers, on which an immediate cestation of hostilities took place. After the conquest of Hydernagore, and the recapture of the inland country by Tippoo, he laid siege to Mangalore, the principal place on the Malabar coast yet remaining in our hands. Great resistance was made by the garrison; but, a practicable breach having been effected, a general assault was in contemplation, when the news arrived of the pacification which had taken place in Europe; and the French troops and engineers in his service informed Tippoo, that they must immediately withdraw their assistance. After much passionate expostulation, he therefore assented to an armistice, in a few days after which, Colonel Macleod arrived with powerful reinforcements from Bombay. A negociation was immediately commenced for definitive peace; the articles of which were signed at Mangalore (March 11th, 1784.) on the terms of mutual restitution, and a renunciation on the part of the Sultan of his claim to the sovereignty of the Carnatic.

stripped of their property; and a declaration was published, that the French forces defended the island only till relieved by the troops of their High Mightinesses.

The war in the central colonies of America, though conducted by the opposing commanders in chief, seemed at this time to languish. Early in the year, the whole Pennsylvania line in the continental army, at once revolted; and, collecting the artillery, stores, &c. belonging to them, moved in an entire body out of the camp. General Clinton, anxious to improve this apparent advantage, immediately passed over to Staten Island with a large body of forces, and dispatched messengers to the revolters with almost unlimited offers of pay, pardon, and protection. These offers, however, were rejected with disdain, and the messengers were actually delivered up to congress. Having obtained a promise of the redress of grievances, the revolters soon returned to their station.

An expedition, under the conduct of Generals Arnold and Philips, was soon afterwards sent into Virginia, where they laid waste the country, and did much damage to the Americans by the destruction of an immense quantity of provisions, merchandize, and stores, deposited in different parts; and a permanent station was established at Portsmouth, to co-operate with Lord Cornwallis, whose transactions to the southward were still carried on with spirit and success. A plan having been formed between the French and American commanders, Rochambeau and Washington, to invest the post occupied by General Arnold, a warm engagement took place, in March, between Admiral Arbuthnot and a French squadron under M. Destouches, at the entrance of the Chesapeak, in which the former obtained the advantage, and was left master of the navigation of the bay.

Early in January, Lord Cornwallis began his March to North Carolina, General Green, who had superseded General Gates, retiring at his approach beyond the Pedee, having previously detached Colonel Morgan, at the head of the light troops, to the westward of the Wateree, to penetrate into South Carolina, and watch the motions of the English at Wynnesborough and Camden. Lord Cornwallis, not choosing to leave so considerable a corps in his rear, ordered Colonel Tarleton, at the head of a superior force, to drive Morgan from his station. On the 17th of the month, the Americans were discovered at a place called the Cowpens, near an open wood, drawn up in two lines; the first of which consisted of militia only, the second of continental infantry and Virginia riflemen, and a chosen body of cavalry was posted as a corps de reserve, at some distance, in the rear. Colonel Tarleton led on the attack with his accustomed impetuosity; and the American militia, as Colonel Morgan had foreseen, gave way on all quarters. The English then confidently advanced to the attack of the second line; and the continental troops, after an obstinate conflict, retreated towards the cavalry. In the interim, the militia had formed again, agreeably to orders, on the right of the continentals; and the American corps de reserve, perceiving the British troops disordered in the pursuit, came forward to the attack, the militia and continentals at the same time vigorously charging with fixed bayonets. Astonished at these unexpected charges, the English advanced corps immediately fell back, and communicated a general confusion and panic, which all the efforts of Colonel Tarleton could not retrieve. The consequence was, that the cannon, colours, and baggage waggons, with upwards of 700 prisoners, fell into the hands of the victors.

In the hope of recovering the prisoners, and intercepting the victorious Americans, Lord Cornwallis immediately marched with the greater part of his army, in rapid pursuit of Colonel Morgan. That officer had crossed the Catawba a few hours only before the arrival of his Lordship, on its southern banks, where, by heavy rains, he was detained two or three days. On the 1st of February, the passage was found practicable; but Colonel Morgan had by that time crossed the Yadkin, and effected his junction with General Green, who, on the 5th, wrote confidentially to a military correspondent, General Huger, thas he was preparing to receive the enemy's attack. At length, the whole American army, after crossing the Dan into Virginia, suddenly returned into the province of North Carolina; and with powerful reinforcements took (March 14) a strong position near Guildford Court-house. At day-break, on the 15th, Lord Cornwallis, with diminished and very inferior forces, advanced to the attack of the Americans, who were ready formed in three lines to receive him. Through the misconduct, it is said, of the North Carolina militia, who were posted in front, the British troops soon forced their way to the second line, composed of Virginians, who made a much better defence, and, when at length thrown into disorder, effected a good retreat. The continental troops, who formed the third line, were last engaged: with them, the contest was long and severe: but the British ultimately carried their point, on which General Green drew off the army, and left the field of battle, with the artillery, consisting of four field-pieces, in their hands. The Americans retired in good order, and took post behind a river, three miles only from the scene of action. This victory had all the consequences of a defeat; for the royal army was too much disabled and weakened to pursue the enemy; and it has been said, that the British troops remained near two days without subsistence; that they were destitute of tents; that the night succeeding the battle was remarkable for its darkness; that the rain at the same time fell in torrents; and that many of the wounded, sinking under their aggravated miseries, expired before morning. Lord Cornwallis now found himself under the necessity of directing his march towards Wilmington, near the mouth of Cape Fear river, a post already occupied by a detachment of British troops, where he arrived on the 7th of April. General Green immediately directed his march to the southward, and unexpectedly attacked the important post of Camden, which was gallantly maintained by Lord Rawdon, (now Earl of Moira); but the surrounding stations of Fort Motte, Orangeburgh, Congarees, and Augusta, being successively forced, his Lordship was compelled to evacuate Camden, and retire to the south of the Santee. General Green then laid close siege to the settlements of Ninety-six, which was considered as commanding the whole of the back country; and on the approach of Lord Rawdon, who had recently received great reinforcements from England, attempted to storm the garrison, but was repulsed with loss by Colonel Cruger, the governor. He then retired with his army behind the Saluda; but, no sooner had the British army been divided and weakened by the several detachments necessary to occupy their former posts, than General Green recrossed the Saluda; Lord Rawdon, surprised, and unprepared for action, retired to Orangeburgh; and the important post of Ninety-six, so gallantly defended, was evacuated. The garrison joining Lord Rawdon, with other troops drawn from the advanced posts, General Green took a strong position on the high hills of Santee, whence he detached different parties to intercept the convoys, and beat up the quarters of the English between Orangeburgh and Charlestown. The English, now under the command of Colonel Stuart, having advanced to the point of junction between the Wateree and Congaree, in order to cover the country to the south and south-east of those rivers, General Green passed the Congaree with a view to inclose the British army in its present insulated situation, or compel them to retreat towards Charlestown. Colonel Stuart immediately fell back forty miles, to a place called Eutaw Springs, where he took an advantageous position, his right extending to Eutaw, and his left to a rising ground which was occupied by a corps de reserve. General Green, with the American army, advanced (September 8) to the attack with the greatest resolution. The Virginian and Maryland continentals charged the left wing of the British with trailed arms, through a heavy cannonade and shower of musketry, and bore down all before them. The American cavalry, at the same time, turned the left flank of the British, and attacked them in the rear. The whole army gave way in great confusion; but in their retreat, gaining an open field, they were rallied by Colonel Stuart, and formed again under protection of an effective and well-directed fire from a large and moated house, which served them for a redoubt; and whence the Americans, after repeated efforts, were unable to dislodge them. The right wing of the English pressing on the left flank of the Americans, General Green thought proper to order a retreat, leaving four pieces of artillery in the hands of the British, two of which had been taken by the Americans in the early part of the engagement. The English were in no condition to pursue, and General Green carried off with him all his wounded, and several hundred prisoners.

In the evening of the next day, Colonel Stuart abandoned the Eutaw, and moved towards Charlestown, after destroying a great part of his stores, leaving behind him many of his wounded, and about a thousand stand of arms. This engagement was decisive of the fate of the war in the southern colonies—the English not being able from this time to appear in the open field, and scarcely could they maintain their posts in the vicinity of Charlestown and Savannah. In the course of the following year those towns were finally evacuated.

Lord Cornwallis, on the march of General Green's army to the southward, found himself reduced to a perplexing dilemma—either to abandon the Carolinas to their fate, or sacrifice his hopes of future conquests, and entirely disappoint the high and sanguine expectations, which he knew to have been formed in England, of the result of the present campaign. At length, he determined to prosecute his march to Virginia. The Roanoke, the Meherrin, and the Nottaway rivers were successively crossed, with trifling opposition; and on the 20th of May his Lordship arrived at Petersburgh, where he was joined by the powerful detachment recently conducted thither by Generals Arnold and Philips. From Petersburgh Lord Cornwallis advanced to James River, which he crossed at West Town; and, thence marching through Hanover Country, crossed the South Anna or Pamunky river, whence by a rapid movement Colonel Tarleton had nearly surprised the assembly of Virginia now sitting at Charlotte-ville. Various expeditions were undertaken to different parts of the province, with uniform success; and Lord Cornwallis, by a well-concerted manœuvre, took a position between the American army and its grand depot of stores at Albemarle Court-house. Aware that the Marquis de la Fayette was on his march to prevent that important capture, and believing that he could not make his approach but with great disadvantage and hazard, he in an unguarded moment exclaimed, "The boy cannot escape me!" The Marquis, however, extricated himself from this difficulty, by opening in the night a nearer and long disused road to the Court-house; and the next day, to the surprise of Lord Cornwallis, he had taken a position which effectually covered it from attack. Lord Cornwallis finding his plan frustrated, proceeded to Williamsburg, the capital of the province, which he took possession of, (June 26th) without opposition. Here he received advices from Sir Henry Clinton, which informed him, that the commander-in-chief, conceiving New York to be in danger from the united forces of the French and Americans, desired the troops under General Arnold, which he had detached to Virginia, to be returned. With this requisition Lord Cornwallis was compelled, however reluctantly, to comply. Aware that his adversary had been lately reinforced by a strong body of troops under General Wayne, he did not think his present force adequate to maintain his station at Williamsburg, and he therefore determined to cross James River to Portsmouth. In consequence of false intelligence, General Wayne arrived with the van of the American army on the banks of the river, in expectation of attacking the rear of the British, before any part of the army had passed. Perceiving his mistake, he deemed it the best policy to charge boldly, though his corps did not amount to more than eight hundred men; and after sustaining a very unequal conflict for some time with great resolution, he ordered a rapid retreat. Lord Cornwallis, amazed at the circumstances of this attack, and suspecting that it must be meant to draw him into an ambuscade, fortunately for Wayne, forbade all pursuit. In the night, his Lordship passed over to Portsmouth, where he purposed to establish his head-quarters; but, on further deliberation, he removed to York Town.

General Washington had long and seriously meditated an attack upon New York, and General Clinton had good reason to believe that this was finally determined upon at an interview between the American General and Count Rochambeau, which took place in May; and in consequence of this project, great preparations were made in the vicinity of New York, indicatory of an approaching siege. The arrival, however, of considerable reinforcements from England, and the recall of so large a body of troops from Virginia, led General Washington to meditate a change in his plan of operations. At length a letter from Count de Grasse, stating that his destination was unalterably fixed to the Chesapeak, left no alternative; and a joint answer was immediately sent by the American and French Generals, that they would lose no time in removing the army to the south of the Delawar, there to meet the Admiral. All the appearances of attack upon New York were, however, still carefully kept up, till at length, on the 24th of August, the allied army suddenly decamped, passed the North River, and by rapid marches proceeded to Philadelphia, where they arrived on the 30th; the fleet of Count de Grasse, consisting of twenty-four ships of the line, entering nearly at the same time the bay of Chesapeak. So strongly impressed was the mind of the British commander-in-chief with the expectation of an attack upon New York, that he for a long time conceived the southern march of the American army to be only a feint. At length, finding that the van of the American army had actually passed the Delawar, and receiving authentic intelligence that the fleet of Count de Grasse was destined to the Chesapeak, he communicated his suspicions to Lord Cornwallis; at the same time assuring his Lordship," "that he would either reinforce him by every possible means in his power, or make the best diversion he could in his favour." It appears, that the leading ideas of the two British Generals did not coincide; and it may be remarked, that from the moment Lord Cornwallis began to act in subordination to orders sent him from New York he ceased to be successful.

On the 5th of September, the English fleet, consisting of nineteen ships of the line, under Admiral Graves, appeared off the capes of Virginia, and Count de Grasse, expecting a reinforcement from Rhode island, stood out to sea for their protection. A warm engagement ensued, and the Count de Grasse being joined by the squadron of M. Barras, was left undisputed master of the Chesapeak. Relief was from this time wholly impracticable; and Lord Cornwallis withdrew within his works, making every preparation for a vigorous defence. York Town being situated nearly at the extremity of a narrow peninsula, inclosed between York River to the north, and James River to the south, it was invested with great ease and advantage by an enemy who commanded the navigations of the two rivers. On the 14th of October the besiegers, notwithstanding the well-directed and incessant fire of the enemy, had advanced far in their second parallel. As they were greatly incommoded in their approaches by two redoubts at the distance of two hundred yards from the English lines, it was determined to attack them at the same time by different detachments of French and Americans. Both of the redoubts were carried, sword in hand, with resistless impetuosity. By this time the batteries of the besiegers were covered with one hundred pieces of heavy ordnance; and the British works, enfiladed in almost every part, and nearly demolished, could scarcely mount a single gun. In this extremity no resource remained but to endeavour to transport the garrison across York River to Gloucester Point, opposite to York Town, where works had been been also erected, and were still occupied by part of the English army. This intention however, was totally frustrated by a violent storm after the embarkation had actually commenced, and Lord Cornwallis was reduced to the distressing necessity of proposing terms of capitulation, which were granted only on condition of his Lordship's surrendering himself, and the forces under his command, to the amount of above 7000 men, prisoners of war. The honour of marching out with colours flying, which had been refused to General Lincoln on his giving up Charlestown, was now refused to Lord Cornwallis; and General Lincoln was appointed to receive the submission of the army of York Town precisely in the same way his own had been conducted eighteen months before.*

In the spring, Governor Johnstone, late one of the commissioners to America, had been invested with a naval command, and with a considerable squadron was detached on an expedition to the Cape of Good Hope. The French court, aware of the inability of the States General to protect their foreign dominions, sent a superior squadron under M. Suffrein, to counteract the designs of the English; and coming up with them at Port Praya, in the island of St. Jago, the French Admiral scrupled not to violate the neutrality of the Portuguese flag, by attacking the squadron of Commodore Johnstone while it lay dispersed and scattered, unsuspicious of danger, in the harbour. Fortunately, the French, rather by extraordinary efforts of valour on the part of the English seamen, than of skill on that of their commander, were beaten off; but, immediately proceeding to the Cape, they effectually secured that important settlement from any hostile attempt, Commodore Johnstone, on his subsequent and tardy arrival, was obliged to content himself with the capture of several Dutch East Indiamen in Saldanha Bay; and those of his ships which were destined for the East Indies prosecuting their voyage thither, the Commodore returned home with his prizes.

During the summer, a sanguinary engagement took place off the Dogger Bank, between an English squadron commanded by Admiral Hyde Parker, and a Dutch squadron of equal force under Admiral Zoutman, who had under convoy the Baltic trade bound to the Texel. On perceiving the English fleet bearing down, the Dutch Admiral, who was to leeward, lay-to, and the English were suffered to approach within half musket shot without firing a gun, when a dreadful cannonade commenced, which was kept up without interruption for three hours and forty minutes; and the action then ceased only because the ships on both sides, from the damages they had respectively sustained, were no longer found manageable. The Dutch, after some time, bore away with their convoy for the Texel, which they reached with great difficulty, one of their largest ships sinking before they could make the harbour. Admiral Parker, who had unavailingly applied to the Admiralty for a reinforcement, returned in great discontent and in a shattered condition to the Nore, where he received the honor of a visit from his Majesty on board his own ship, and was offered knighthood as the reward of his valour. Nothing, however, could alter his resolution of resigning his command. The Dutch, on their part, bestowed rewards more liberal and solid on the officers and sailors of their fleet, and Admiral Zoutman was received at Amsterdam with great applause.†

Parliament was opened on the 27th of November, by a speech from the throne, in which his Majesty observed, "That the war was still unhappily prolonged, and that, to his great concern, the events of it had been very unfortunate to his army in Virginia, having ended in the total loss of his forces in that province. But he could not consent to sacrifice, either to his own desire of peace or to the temporary ease and relief of his subjects, those essential rights and permanent interests upon which the strength and security of this country must ever principally depend." The King declared, "that he retained a firm confidence in the protection of Divine Providence, and a perfect conviction of the justice of his cause;"—and he concluded by calling "for the concurrence and support of Parliament, and a vigorous, animated, and united exertion of the faculties and resources of his people." Mr. Fox, who inveighed against the measures of government with much bitterness, moved, as an amendment to the proposed address, "That of the address proposed the whole be omitted excepting the first paragraph, and the following words inserted: 'And we will, without delay, apply ourselves with united hearts to propose and digest such counsels as may in this crisis excite the efforts, point the arms, and, by a total change of system, command the confidence of all his Majesty's subjects.'" This amendment was supported by Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Burke; but the original address was carried by a large majority. A similar amendment was moved in the Upper House by the Earl of Shelburne, and supported by the Duke of Richmond; but that also was negatived, by a large majority. A few days afterwards, a motion having been made by Sir Grey Cooper, for the House to resolve itself into a committee of supply, a vehement debate arose; but with as little success on the part of the opposition as the former.

On the 12th of December, a motion was made by Sir James Lowther, "That it be resolved by the House that the war carried on against the colonies and plantations of North America had been ineffectual to the purposes for which it was undertaken; and that it was also the opinion of this House, that all further attempts to reduce the Americans to obedience by force must be injurious to this country, by weakening her powers to resist her ancient and confederated enemies." In support of this motion, Sir James observed, "that the late speech from the throne had given a just alarm to the nation—it had shown them that the ministers were determined to persevere in the American war—that more blood and more money were to be lavished in this fatal contest—the men invested with the powers of government derived no advantage from experience—the surrender of one army only gave them spirit to risk a second, and the surrender of the second only instigated them to venture a third. There was no end of loss nor of madness. The unexampled ignorance and misconduct of the ministry were now visible to all the world. It had therefore become the indispensible duty of that House to come to some solemn resolution, in order to mark and define their idea of the American war, and to convince their constituents that they were awake to the real situation of the country." The motion was seconded by Mr. Powys, member for Northamptonshire; and, notwithstanding the utmost opposition of the minister, the numbers, on dividing the House, appeared to be 179 in favour of the motion, against 220 who opposed it.

Two days after the motion of Sir James Lowther, the army estimates were laid before the House; from which it appeared that the whole military force required for the year 1782, including the provincial corps serving in America, amounted to 195,000 men. One hundred thousand seamen and marines had been already voted by the House. It was however stated by Lord George Germaine, "That the ministry were of opinion, considering the present situation of affairs, and the misfortunes of the war, that it would not be right to continue any longer the plan on which it had hitherto been conducted; and that a fresh army would not be sent to supply the place of that captured at York Town. It was intended only to preserve such posts in America as might facilitate and co-operate with the enterprises of our fleets."

* A marble column, with appropriate inscriptions and trophies, was ordered by the Congress to be erected at York Town, in commemoration of this event; and a solemn thanksgiving to Almighty God was appointed throughout all the States of the Union, "for the signal successes with which he had vouchsafed to bless the armies of America, combating in defence of their rights and liberties."

† Notwithstanding the concessions which had been made by the English Parliament to the people of Ireland, that country remained in a state far short of satisfaction. In numerous county and provincial meetings the supremacy of the British Parliament was in formal resolutions positively denied, and the absolute independence of Ireland on the British legislature boldly asserted. The unconstitutional powers of the Irish privy council were reprobated, a Habeas Corpus Act was loudly called for, and the abolition of all superfluous places and pensions was insisted upon. The zeal and activity of the military associations evinced a spirit still more alarming.

In the debate which ensued, General Conway declared himself "anxious for a recall of our fleets and armies from America. Of the two evils he would choose the least, and submit to the independence of America, rather than persist in the prosecution of so pernicious and ruinous a war. As to the idea now suggested of a war of posts, what garrison (he asked) would be able to maintain them, when it was well known that even Sir Henry Clinton, at New York, did not consider himself as secure?" The impression made by the successive speeches of the principal leaders in opposition in this debate was too great to be concealed; but the estimates as originally moved, were at length voted by a considerable majority.

[A. D. 1782.] After the recess, Mr. Fox renewed his motion of censure against the First Lord of the Admiralty; and, in a House of near four hundred members, it was rejected by a majority of only twenty-two. The American Secretary now thought it expedient, to resign the seals of that department—and for his services he was raised to the dignity of the peerage.*

On the 20th of February, Mr. Fox again brought forward his motion of censure, somewhat varied, on Lord Sandwich; which was negatived by a majority of 19 voices only, in a House consisting of four hundred and fifty-three members; notwithstanding which, the noble Lord still kept possession of his office.

Two days afterwards, General Conway moved "for an address to the King, earnestly imploring his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to listen to the humble prayer and advice of his faithful Commons, that the war on the Continent of North America might no longer be pursued, for the impracticable purpose of reducing that country to obedience by force." This was opposed by Mr. Welbore Ellis, the new Secretary for the American department, who observed, "that it was now in contemplation to contract the scale of the war, and to prosecute hostilities by such means as were very dissimilar from the past. A striking change of circumstances had taken place, and these of course demanded a change of measures. The war now raging in America was not so properly a war against the colonies as with France. He wished to discard, as inapplicable, so vague a term as the American war. While the whole continental army was fed, clothed, and paid by France, it was not mere locality which ought to give a name to it. The war was a French war; and as in the late war America had been said to be conquered in Germany, so in this France must be said to be conquered in America. A conquest of this nature would inevitably root out the faction now prevalent in that unhappy country. That this faction, however powerful, was less numerous than the party of the royalists, appeared from the most respectable authorities. However, at the present juncture, administration were conscious of the necessity of contracting the scale of war in America, and of drawing the operations of it into a narrow compass." The division on General Conway's motion gave a majority of only "one," in favour of ministers; and Mr. Fox immediately gave notice, that in a few days the question would be revived under another form. Accordingly, on the 27th of February, General Conway moved, "That it is the opinion of this House, that a further prosecution of offensive war against America would, under present circumstances, be the means of weakening the efforts of this country against her European enemies, and tend to increase the mutual enmity so fatal to the interests both of Great Britain and America." To evade an immediate determination upon the question, the Attorney-General, Wallace, moved an adjournment, declaring his intention speedily to submit to the consideration of the House "a bill, enabling his Majesty to conclude a truce with America, and to enter into a negociation on this ground." The proposition of adjournment was negatived by a majority of 19, the numbers being 234 to 215; and the original motion of General Conway was then carried without a division. The General next moved an address to the King, founded on the precise words of the motion. This was agreed to; and it was resolved that the address should be presented to his Majesty by the whole House; which was accordingly done on the 1st of March: and his Majesty most graciously replied, "That, in pursuance of the advice of the House of Commons, he would assuredly take such measures as should appear to him most conducive to the restoration of harmony between Great Britain and her revolted colonies." This answer not being deemed sufficiently explicit, General Conway on the 4th of March moved another address to his Majesty, returning him thanks for his gracious assurances, and affirming, "That nothing could so essentially promote the great objects of his Majesty's paternal care, as the measures his faithful Commons had humbly though earnestly recommended to his Majesty." This was agreed to Nem. Con. and by a second motion it was resolved, "That the House will consider as enemies to his Majesty and the country all those who should advise a prosecution of offensive war on the Continent of North America."

On the succeeding day, the Attorney-General moved for leave to bring in a bill to enable his Majesty to conclude a truce or peace with the revolted colonies in America. No serious opposition was made to this bill, but it was treated with indifference, and Mr. Fox declared it to be only deserving of contempt.†

Ministers not having indicated an intention to resign, it was thought necessary to move a direct vote of censure upon them, at the close of a series of resolutions brought forward by Lord John Cavendish, on the 8th

*. Before the Great Seal was affixed to the patent, the Marquis of Carmarthen moved, in the House of Peers, "that it was highly derogatory to the honour of that House, that any person labouring under the sentence of a court martial, styled in the public orders issued by his late Majesty 'a censure much worse than death,' and adjudged unfit to serve his Majesty in any military capacity, should be recommended to the crown as a proper person to sit in that House." The motion was evaded by the question of adjournment; but Lord George Germaine having actually taken his seat in the House under the title of Lord Viscount Sackville, the Marquis of Carmarthen renewed his attack, and urged, "that the House of Peers being a court of honour, it behoved them to preserve that honour uncontaminated, and to mark in the most forcible manner their disapprobation of the introduction of a person into that assembly who was stigmatized in the orderly books of every regiment in the service." Lord Abingdon, who seconded the motion, styled the admission of Lord George Germaine to a Peerage "an insufferable indignity to that House, and an outrageous insult to the public.—What," said his Lordship, "has that person done to merit honours superior to his fellow-citizens? His only claim to promotion was, that he had undone his country by executing the plan of that accursed invisible though efficient cabinet, from whom as he received his orders, so he had obtained his reward." Lord Sackville denied the justice of the sentence passed upon him, and affirmed "that he considered his restoration to the council board, at a very early period of the present reign, as amounting to a virtual repeal of that iniquitous verdict." The Duke of Richmond defended the motion, and said, "that he himself was present at the battle of Minden, and was summoned on the trial of Lord George Germaine; and had his deposition been called for, he could have proved that the time lost when the noble Viscount delayed to advance, under pretence of receiving contradictory orders, was not less than one hour and a half; that the cavalry were a mile and a quarter only from the scene of action; and it was certainly in his Lordship's power to have rendered the victory, important as it was, far more brilliant and decisive; and he had little reason to complain of the severity of the sentence passed upon him." The motion was also powerfully supported by Lord Southampton, the Earl of Shelburne, the Marquis of Rockingham, &c. On a division, it was rejected, by a majority of 93 to 28 voices; but to the inexpressible chagrin of Lord Sackville, a protest was entered on the journals of the House, declaring the promotion of his Lordship to be "a measure fatal to the interest of the crown, insulting to the memory of the late sovereign, and highly derogatory, to the dignity of that House."

† "Ministers had no wish," Mr. Fox observed, "for peace, and affairs were so circumstanced, that they must lose their places or the country be undone. There were at that very time persons in Europe, fully impowered to make peace between Great Britain and America, but who would not negociate with such an administration. He, as a friend to his country, would, if properly authorized, conduct the transaction, even in the capacity of a "commis;" but he desired it to be understood that he did not mean to connect himself with any of the ministers. From the moment when he should make terms with any one of them, he would rest satisfied to be called the most infamous of mankind. He could not for an instant think of a coalition with men, who, in every public and private transaction, as ministers, had shown themselves void of every principle of honour and honesty. In the hands of such men he would not trust his honour even for a minute."

of March, importing, "that the chief cause of all the national misfortunes is want of foresight and ability in his Majesty's ministers." The motion was seconded by Mr. Powys, who remarked, "that the noble Lord at the head of affairs had declared, that whenever Parliament should withdraw its confidence from him, he would resign. That period was now come. The confidence of Parliament was now withdrawn. It was therefore necessary that he should retire from power; and, whenever the happy moment should arrive, in which the noble Lord, to the unspeakable joy of the nation, should really go to his Sovereign to resign his employments, he hoped he would not forget to lay before the King a fair representation of the flourishing state in which he found his Majesty's empire when the government of it was intrusted to his hands, and the ruinous condition in which he was about to leave all that remained of it." After a long debate, the order of the day was moved, and carried by 226 against 216. In the course of a few days, a resolution was moved by Sir John Rous, "that the House taking into consideration the debt incurred, and the losses sustained in the present war, could place no further confidence in the ministers, who had the direction of public affairs." On a division, the numbers were 227 for, and 236 against the motion. Four days after this (March 19), the Earl of Surry had proposed to move a resolution of similar import to that of Sir John Rous; but when his Lordship was about to rise, Lord North addressed himself to the Speaker, and said, "that as he understood the object of the noble Lord's motion to be the removal of ministers, he wished to prevent the necessity of giving the House further trouble, by an explicit declaration, "that his Majesty had come to a determination to make an entire change of administration:" and he and his colleagues only retained their official situations till other ministers were appointed to occupy their places. His Lordship thanked the House for the indulgence he had experienced from them in the discharge of his duty, and declared himself ready to answer to his country for his conduct whenever he should be called upon for that purpose." Lord Surry consented, upon this communication, to wave his motion, which, he declared, "was intended to prevent the further perpetration of those abuses of their trust, to which, with impunity, and to the disgrace and detriment of the state, the late ministers had for such a length of time proceeded." Thus was this memorable administration suddenly and totally dissolved.

It was feared by many that great difficulties would arise in the formation of a new and efficient cabinet, on account of the division which had so long subsisted among the Whigs in opposition to the court. Of the two parties, that of Lord Rockingham was the most numerous and powerful; but, from various causes, the other party, of which, since the death of Lord Chatham, the Earl of Shelburne was accounted the head, was in less discredit with the King;—and the highest department of government was, upon this occasion, expressly offered to that nobleman by his Majesty. His Lordship, however, resisted the temptation; and the Marquis of Rockingham was a second time placed at the head of the treasury; Lord John Cavendish acted as Chancellor of the Exchequer; the Earl of Shelburne and Mr. Fox were nominated Secretaries of State; Lord Camden was appointed President of the Council; the Duke of Grafton was reinstated as Lord Privy Seal Admiral, now Lord Keppel, was placed at the head of the Admiralty; General Conway, of the Army; the Duke of Richmond, of the Ordnance; the Duke of Portland succeeded Lord Carlisle as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Mr. Burke was constituted Paymaster of the forces; and Colonel Barre, Treasurer of the navy. Lord Thurlow alone, by the indulgence of the new ministers, continued in possession of the Great Seal.*

Amongst the first acts of the new ministry, was a letter from Mr. Fox to M. Simolin, the Russian ambassador, expressing his Britannic Majesty's willingness to accept the mediation offered by the Empress for a separate accommodation with Holland, on the basis of the treaty of 1674. This their High Mightinesses thought proper to decline; and Mr. Adams was at this period formally acknowledged and received by the States General as Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America. Negociations for a general peace were almost immediately commenced between France and Great Britain, and Mr. Grenville was sent to Paris, invested with full powers to treat with all the parties.

Previously to the change of administration, Sir Henry Clinton had resigned to Sir Guy Carleton his command in America, which he had held since the resignation of Sir William Howe, in the Spring of 1778. Instructions were now sent to the new commander and Admiral Digby, to acquaint the Congress of the pacific views of the English court, and of their readiness to treat on the basis of American Independence.

Bills which had been formerly introduced and negatived, were, at a very early period, after the appointment of the new cabinet revived by Mr. Crew and Sir Philip Jennings Clerke, for disabling revenue officers from voting at elections, and excluding contractors from the House of Commons. They were now passed with eclat, Mr. Fox declaring, that not an hour should be lost in giving the public the strongest proofs that his Majesty's ministers were sincerely determined to make such reforms as should be necessary, and to enforce that system of government which they had repeatedly called for when not in place. These bills were warmly though ineffectually, opposed in the House of Peers by the Lord-Chancellor.

In the month of November 1781, Mr. Grattan, a distinguished member of the Irish Parliament, had moved for a limitation of the perpetual mutiny bill. This was rejected by a great majority; but, at a subsequent meeting of the representatives of 143 corps of volunteers assembled at Dungannon, resolutions were passed declaratory of the rights of Ireland, and in express terms asserting, "that the claim of any body of men, other than the King, Lords, and Commons of Ireland, to make laws to bind that kingdom, was unconstitutional and illegal, and a grievance of which it was their decided and unalterable determination to seek the speedy and effectual redress. They knew," they said, "their duty to their sovereign, and were disposed to be loyal; but they knew also what they owed to themselves, and were resolved to be free." A short time after these resolutions had been passed, Mr. Grattan moved the House for an address to the King, founded upon the same principles. This motion was also rejected; but, on the 16th of April (1782) he again moved "a Declaration of Rights, under the form of an address to the throne."† The address was voted without a dissentient voice, unanimously acceded to by the Peers, and immediately transmitted to the King.‡

* The friends of Lord North have asserted, with scarcely any contradiction from his enemies, "that his honour was unblemished, his integrity unquestionable; and in a long and stormy, and at length unfortunate administration, he had many political opponents, almost without any personal enemy."

† In his speech on this occasion, Mr. Grattan pronounced an animated panegyric on the volunteers, and the late conduct of the Irish nation—"He beheld," he said, "with joy and admiration, her progress from injuries to arms, from arms to liberty. The Irish volunteers had supported the rights of the Irish Parliament against those temporizing trustees who would have relinquished them. Allied by liberty still more than by allegiance, Great Britain and Ireland formed a constitutional confederacy. The perpetual annexation of the two crowns was a powerful bond of union, but Magna Charta was more efficacious still. It would be easy any where to find a king, but to England only can we look for a constitution. Ireland was planted by Britons, and was entitled to British privileges. It was by charters, and not by conquest, as had been falsely asserted, that the mutual connexion of the two countries was originally established. Every true Irishman would say, Liberty with England, if England is so disposed; but at all events Liberty. The Irish nation were too high in pride, character, and power, to suffer any other nation to claim a right to make their laws. Was England ready to acknowledge the Independence of America, and would she refuse liberty to Ireland? If she was capable, after enabling his Majesty to repeal the Declaratory Act against America, of wishing to retain that against Ireland, the Irish nation was not capable of submitting to it."

‡ In this address the two Houses affirm, "That the crown of Ire-

Some days previously to the motion of Mr. Grattan, a royal message was delivered to the English House of Commons, "recommending to their most serious consideration the state of affairs in Ireland, in order to such a final adjustment as may give a mutual satisfaction to both kingdoms;" and, on the 18th of May, Mr. Fox, at the close of a long and able speech, moved for the repeal of the obnoxious act for securing the dependency of Ireland; which he called "a measure of necessity resulting, however unpleasant it might be to some, from the conduct of the late ministry, who had awakened the present spirit in Ireland, by refusing their most modest and reasonable requests.* This repeal, which passed both Houses without opposition, was considered as a virtual renunciation of the claim of legislating for Ireland; and so eminently gratified were the Irish Parliament and nation with the liberality of these cessions, that a vote of the House of Commons in that kingdom passed unanimously for raising twenty thousand seamen for the naval service of Britain.

On the 15th of April another message was delivered to the House from the King, stating, "That his Majesty, taking into consideration the supplies which have been given with so much liberality, and supported with such uncommon firmness and fortitude by his people in the present extensive war, recommended to his faithful Commons the consideration of an effectual plan of economy throughout all the branches of the public expenditure." An address of thanks was then moved for, and immediately agreed to by the House.

Mr. Burke's Reform Bill, which appeared to have undergone much retrenchment and reform since its first introduction to the House, was now a third time brought forward and passed with little difficulty.† In the Peers, however, the bill met with a violent opposition from the Lords Thurlow and Loughborough; but it finally passed by a great majority. A bill, from the Commons, for disfranchising certain voters of the borough of Cricklade, who had been proved guilty of bribery, was also impeded and embarrassed in all its stages by these law Lords. On the 3d of May, after a long debate, it was resolved by the House of Commons, "That all the declarations, orders, and resolutions of that House respecting the election of John Wilkes, Esq. be expunged from the journals of the House, as subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors in the kingdom." By the people, however, the case of the Middlesex election was now regarded with nearly as much indifference as that of any other elective decision.

Just afterwards, a subject of infinitely higher importance, was brought under the notice of the House, in consequence of a motion made by Mr. Pitt for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the state of the representation of the people in Parliament.‡ The motion was warmly supported by Sir George Saville, and by Mr. Fox, who allowed the House of Commons to be a virtual representation of the people, yet this he observed was very different from, and far inferior to, a real one.§ The more distinguished opponents of the motion were Mr. Dundas, Lord Advocate of Scotland, Mr. Powys, and Mr. Thomas Pitt, the proprietor of the land is an imperial crown, inseparably annexed to the crown of Great Britain, on which connexion the interest and happiness of both countries essentially depend; but that the kingdom of Ireland is a distinct kingdom, with a Parliament of her own, the sole legislature thereof. In this right they conceived the very essence of their liberty to exist. It was a right which they, in behalf of all the people of Ireland, claimed as their birth-right, and which they could not yield but with their lives." They averred "that they considered the claims of the Parliament of Great Britain, in the act passed for better securing the dependency of Ireland, to be irreconcileable to the fundamental rights of that nation." They added, "that they had a high veneration for the British character, and the people of Ireland did not desire to share the freedom of England without likewise sharing her fate;—and it was their determination to stand or fall with the British nation."

* Mr. Fox, however observed, "that his own decided opinion had always been, that Ireland, being a part of the British empire, was entitled to the full and equal participation of all the benefits and immunities enjoyed in England, and which were consonant to the principles of the British constitution. His ideas of Ireland corresponded exactly with his ideas relative to America. He thought it absurd and unjust for any country to pretend to legislate for another, without, much less against, their consent and concurrence;—nor could it at any time so legislate to any good purpose. As to Ireland, he made no scruples, in the most express and unequivocal terms, to declare, that he considered her present claims to be substantially just, and that he felt himself inclined to move the resolution which he was about to propose in favour of Ireland, as much on the ground of justice as prudence."

† By this Bill, the Board of Trade, and the Board of Works, with the great wardrobe, were abolished; together with the office of American Secretary of State, now rendered useless by the loss of the American colonies;—the offices of treasurer of the chamber, cofferer of the household, the lords of police in Scotland, the paymaster of the pensions, the master of the harriers, the master of the staghounds, and six clerks of the board of green-cloth. But the regulations relative to the Principality of Wales, to the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, the Mint, and Ordnance offices, with other provisions contained in the former bill, were wholly omitted. By a clause of the present bill his Majesty was enabled to borrow a sum for the liquidation of a new arrear of three hundred thousand pounds, by a tax on salaries and pensions; for a debt to this amount had been again contracted, notwithstanding the addition of one hundred thousand pounds per annum recently made to the civil list.

‡ So struck was the late Earl of Chatham with the mischiefs arising from the present system, that he scrupled not to hazard a peremptory prediction, that the rotten boroughs would not survive the present century—and that, if Parliament did not reform itself from within, it would reform itself with a vengeance from without." Yet there were many wise and excellent persons, true and firm friends to liberty, whose minds revolted at the idea of new-modelling the representation of the country. They conceived that the actual advantages resulting from the constitution, when rightly administered, under the present form, were too great to risk any experiment, however plausible in theory, of such magnitude as to draw after it consequences which no human sagacity could pretend to trace or fathom. Early this year it had been resolved by the city of London, assembled in common-hall, "That the unequal representation of the people, the corrupt state of Parliament, and the perversion thereof from its original institution, had been the principal causes of the unjust war with America, and of every grievance of which the nation complained." Similar resolutions were passed by the county of York, and many other counties and cities.—In support of his motion, Mr. Pitt said, "that there was, he believed, no member of that House who would not acknowledge that the representation, as it now stood, was incomplete. It was perfectly understood that there were some boroughs under the influence of the Treasury, and others totally possessed by them. It was manifest that such boroughs had no one quality of representation in them. They had no share or concern in the general interests of the country, and they had in fact no stake for which to appoint their guardians in the popular assembly. There were other boroughs which had now, in fact, no actual existence, but in the return of members to the House. They had no existence in property, in population, in trade, or in weight of any kind. The few persons who possessed the right of voting for these boroughs were the slaves of others, who claimed the property of the boroughs, and who in fact made the returns. This also was no representation, nor any thing like it. Another set of boroughs and towns claimed to themselves the right of bringing their votes to market. Such boroughs were the most dangerous of all others. So far from the interests of their country in the choice which they made, they held out their borough to the best purchaser; and, in fact, some of them belonged more to the nabob of Arcot than they did to the people of Great Britain. They were towns and boroughs more within the jurisdiction of the Carnatic than the limits of the empire of Britain. Such boroughs were manifestly sources of corruption, they gave rise to an inundation of wealth, ill acquired and ill employed, by which no interest of the people of this country could be promoted, and such boroughs ought to be abolished. Foreign influence had ever been regarded as very dangerous to a nation; and if the nabobs of India had been able to obtain it, why might not a foreign power, at enmity with Great Britain, acquire the same influence by the same means? There was no man," he said, "in that House who had more reverence for the constitution, and more respect even for its vestiges than himself. But he was afraid that the reverence and the enthusiasm which Englishmen entertained for the constitution would, if not suddenly prevented, be the means of destroying it; for such was their superstitious awe, that they would not even remove its defects for fear of touching its beauty. He admired, for his own part, the constitution so much, that he wished to efface whatever affected its radical principles. This he considered not as innovating, but restoring. That a reform of the present Parliamentary representation was indispensably necessary, was the sentiment of some of the first and greatest characters in the kingdom: and he should always take the liberty to observe, that he well knew it to be the sentiment of his much honoured father, the late Earl of Chatham, that a reform of this nature was absolutely requisite for the security of British liberty."

§ Adverting to the bill for an equal representation, introduced by the Duke of Richmond into the House of Lords, he declared that he could not subscribe to it in all its parts, though he concurred sincerely in its general object. It had been suggested that the army and navy ought to be excluded from the House, but he was of a different opinion. It was his wish, in order to make that House perfect, that it should contain the landed, the navy, the army, the monied, and in short every interest. This was so far from being the case, in any just scale of proportion, that the county of Middlesex, though it contained one-eighth part of the population, and contained one-sixth part of the land tax, and a full third of all other taxes, did not possess more than a fifty-fifth part of the representation. Some reform, therefore was indispensably necessary, and he should vote for the present motion.

borough of Old Sarum.* On a division, Mr. Pitt's motion was negatived only by 161 against 141.†

The new ministry, though composed of heterogeneous materials, had hitherto conducted public affairs with the appearance of unanimity. By the death of the Marquis of Rockingham, however, (July 1st, 1782) in the meridian of his age, and at the very height of his political reputation, the state of affairs suddenly underwent a great and important change. On the very next day, the Earl of Shelburne was declared first Lord Commissioner of the Treasury; an assumption, which, without any previous communication with his colleagues in administration, was considered by the Rockingham party as equivalent to a declaration of political hostility on the part of his Lordship. Mr. Fox immediately resigned the seals as secretary of the northern department; Lord John Cavendish his office as Chancellor of the Exchequer; the Duke of Portland his government of Ireland; Lord Althrop, Lord Duncannon, Mr. Frederic Montague, &c. their seats at the boards of Treasury and Admiralty; and Mr. Burke his post of paymaster of the army. The seals of the southern department were consequently given to the Earl of Grantham, and of the northern to Mr. Thomas Townshend, late secretary at war; Sir George Yonge succeeded Mr. Townshend; Colonel Barré was made paymaster of the forces; the Lord Advocate of Scotland, in his room, Treasurer of the navy; and the Earl of Temple, eldest son of the late George Grenville, succeeded the Duke of Portland in the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland. The promotion, however, which attracted most of the public attention was that of Mr. William Pitt, who, at the age of three-and-twenty, was constituted Chancellor of the Exchequer—an office which had been always supposed to require, less brilliancy of talents, than long previous study and experience, and confirmed habits of diligence, industry, and business.‡ On the 11th of July, Parliament was prorogued; the speech

* These gentlemen ridiculed the idea of equal representation, as extravagant, impracticable, visionary, and absurd. They maintained, also, that the origin and purpose of Parliament were to balance the power of the crown. "The members of the Lower House, however variously elected, stood individually and collectively as representatives of all the subjects of Great Britain; if they effected the great purpose of defending the people at large against the encroaching power and increasing influence of the crown; if, as faithful guardians, they held the public purse, if they preserved the laws of the country from violation, they answered every end of their institution, whatever irregularities a speculatist might fancy he discovered in their appointment; for that country truly enjoys the blessing of liberty, where the laws hold an equal course to all, not where all are equally represented. If the proposition now offered to the House were adopted, they must launch into a sea without a shore; a general enquiry without any defined or specific object; and inquisition into the state of every borough, which would alarm the feelings of every one interested in so extensive a consideration, while it held out to the public expectations which the House never meant to satisfy, nor ought to satisfy, nor could satisfy, were it ever so expedient. By instituting a committee of inquiry, Parliament would be converted into a general repository for the reception of all the projects of the wildest of projectors; the imaginations of the public would be let loose; the torrent could never be restrained, and the principle must either be carried to the utmost height, or abandoned. Representation of an inherent or natural, was an universal right; there was no medium. To countenance so vague, so undefined a measure, would be an act of madness and infatuation, tending only to tumult and disorder, and every confusion that expectation, followed by disappointment, could operate on the passions of the multitude."

† During the last session, as has been already remarked, the affairs of the East India Company had been the frequent subject of Parliamentary discussion. Early in the present year General Smith moved that the committee which had been appointed to inquire into the causes of the war in the Carnatic should also be instructed to investigate the rise, progress, and present state of the Mahratta war. This was agreed to by the House; and, on the 19th of April, the Lord Advocate of Scotland, Mr. Dundas, moved, "That the several reports which had been made from the secret committee appointed in the last and present session of Parliament, relating to the affairs of the East India Company, should be referred to the consideration of a committee of the whole House." On this occasion, the Lord Advocate, as chairman of the secret committee, entered into a long and able detail of the causes of those great calamities which had brought the company into its present critical and dangerous state; taking a retrospective view of Indian transactions from the æra of 1765, when Lord Clive went out a second time Governor; and reprobating the general system of policy recently pursued in India in terms of extreme severity. In remarking upon the state of the Company's finances, he affirmed, "That the revenue of Bombay fell short of its necessary civil and military investments 200,000*l.* annually, which was always drawn from Bengal. The revenue of the Madras presidency was, in time of peace, more than equal to defray the cost of that establishment. But the most lucrative of the British possessions in the East Indies were those of Bengal. Such, however, had been the enormous expence of the Mahratta war, that the Governor-General had been obliged to contract so large a debt, that it was doubtful whether the investments for England must be wholly or partially suspended. Mr. Hastings had no right whatever to fancy himself an Alexander, or an Aurengzebe, and to prefer frantic military exploits to the improvement of the trade and commerce of the country. Mr. Dundas's motion having been agreed to, on the following day General Smith, chairman of the select committee, moved, "that the reports of that committee should also be referred to a committee of the whole House." The General strongly corroborated the opinions and sentiments of Mr. Dundas, and joined him in affirming that, there had been a variety of great abuses in India, the particulars of which might be seen in the reports. The proposition being agreed to, the House resolved, on the 24th of April, on the motion also of General Smith, "That Warren Hastings, Esq. Governor-General of Bengal, and Sir Elijah Impey, Knight, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Fort William in Bengal, appeared to have been concerned, the one in giving, the other in receiving, an office not agreeable to the true intent of the act of the 13th year of his present Majesty, &c. which unjustifiable transaction between them was attended with circumstances of evil tendency and example." It was also resolved, "That the powers given to the Governor-General and council of Bengal, by the above-mentioned act, ought to be more distinctly ascertained; and that it would be proper to reduce into one act the several acts of Parliament made to regulate the East India Company, and further to explain and amend the same; and also to make new regulations and provisions to the same end." On the 28th of May, the House of Commons came to a variety of resolutions, grounded on the reports of the secret and select committees, and condemnatory of the whole system of Indian politics. As the result of the connected series of resolutions, it was finally resolved:—"That Warren Hastings, Esq. Governor-General in Bengal, and William Hornby, Esq. President of the Council at Bombay, having in sundry instances acted in a manner repugnant to the honour and policy of this nation, and thereby brought great calamities on India, and enormous expences on the East India Company, it is the duty of the directors of the said Company to pursue all legal and effectual means for the removal of the said Governor-General and President from their said offices, and to recall them to Great Britain." The purport of this resolution was approved and confirmed by the court of directors, who, on the 28th of October of this year, passed the following analogous resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this court, that a steady perseverance in the system of conduct so frequently enjoined by the court of directors, cannot be expected from those servants whose ideas of extension of dominion, either by negotiation or conquest, have led them to depart from orders so often enforced; and therefore that it is expedient to remove Warren Hastings, Esq. from the office of Governor-General of Bengal." The court of proprietors, however, refusing, by a great majority, to ratify this resolution, the whole proceeding passed gradually and silently into oblivion. In the course of the investigations of the secret committee, the conduct of Sir Thomas Rumbold, late Governor of Madras, at this time a member of the House of Commons, came under a severe review; and he was denounced in the reports of the committee as guilty of gross peculation, embezzlement, and oppression. A bill was in consequence introduced by the Lord Advocate, for restraining Sir Thomas Rumbold from leaving the kingdom for the period of one year, and for preventing the alienation or transportation of his property. This was preparatory to a bill afterwards brought into the House for inflicting certain pains and penalties on Sir Thomas Rumbold, for high crimes and misdemeanors. This bill, which at first excited great attention, and which was continued from session to session in a manner wholly unprecedented, was at last suffered to sink into neglect.

‡ A few days subsequently to his resignation, Mr. Fox stated in the House of Commons the grounds and reasons of his conduct. He observed, "That political differences of opinion had taken place of great importance in the cabinet, and that he had withdrawn himself from it to prevent that distraction in the public councils which he conceived to be ruinous to the public welfare. He had reason, he affirmed, to believe that the day was come when the system on which the administration of Lord Rockingham had been formed was to be abandoned, and a new system was to be substituted, or rather the old one revived, with the assistance of the old men, or indeed of any men that could be found. Nor should he wonder if, in a short time, they were joined by those very persons whom that House had precipitated from their seats. He therefore chose to resign, voluntarily relinquishing the pomps, the profits, and the patronage of office, as he could no longer continue in place with honour to himself, or benefit to the public." General Conway "lamented the defection of the distinguished characters who had recently withdrawn themselves from office, at a time when their country so much needed their support. He protested that he knew of no defalcation in the present ministers from those principles which they had originally professed; nor any diversities of opinion in the cabinet, beyond those shades of difference which must always arise amongst men of strong and independent minds." The Duke of Richmond expressed in the House of Lords similar regret at the late resignations. "So long, and so long only, as the noble Lord who now presided at the board of treasury should adhere to the principles on which the administration was originally formed, so long would he give him his cordial support. Whenever these principles were abandoned, he would be his most determined opponent." The Earl of Shelburne declared "his perfect satisfaction at being supported upon the terms stated by the noble Duke.

speech from the throne containing the welcome declaration, "That nothing could be more repugnant to his Majesty's feelings than the long continuance of so complicated a war; and that his ardent desire of peace had induced him to take every measure which promised the speediest accomplishment of his wishes."

Gibraltar still continued closely invested by the Spaniards, and the extraordinary defence of the garrison attracted the general attention of Europe. Towards the close of the preceding year, the works which had been erected by the Spaniards across the isthmus which connects the rock of Gibraltar with the continent were stormed and almost totally demolished. In less than half an hour, five batteries, with all the lines of approach, communication, and traverse, were in flames —the magazines exploding one after another, as the conflagration successively reached them—the astonished Spaniards offering no other resistance, than a distant and ill-directed fire from the forts of St. Barbara and St. Philip.

Intelligence arrived early in the spring of the present year, that General Murray, Governor of Minorca, had been compelled, after a long and vigorous resistance, to surrender that island to the arms of his Catholic Majesty. The island of Nevis, in the West Indies, about the same time surrendered to the Marquis de Bouille and the Count de Grasse; by whom very liberal terms were granted to the inhabitants. Eight thousand troops, with a formidable train of artillery, were then landed on the important island of St. Christopher. Sir Samuel Hood, who commanded the British fleet on that station, made great efforts for its relief; and, notwithstanding his inferiority of force, he, in three successive encounters with de Grasse, obtained each time the advantage, and at length, by a dexterous manœuvre, gained possession of the enemy's anchorage at Basseterre Road. Admiral Hood then landed a considerable detachment of troops from Antigua under General Prescot. General Frazer, however, the commanding officer, was obliged to surrender the island on capitulation, after a siege of five weeks, on the 12th of February. In the same month, Demerary, Isequibo, and Montserrat, were captured by the French. The Bahamas were also reduced by a considerable force under Don Manuel de Cigagal, governor of the Havannah, to the obedience of the crown of Spain. On the 19th of February Admiral Rodney arrived in the West Indies with a strong reinforcement of ships from England, and resumed the command. Great preparations were now making, both by the French and Spaniards, for the invasion of Jamaica; and, as the combined force of these nations amounted to above sixty sail of the line, had a junction been effected, the island must have been lost. Sir George Rodney's first object was to intercept a large convoy of troops, provisions, &c. expected from Europe: but in this he was disappointed; the enemy found means to escape his vigilance, by making the island of Deseada, to the northward, and keeping close in shore under the high land of Guadaloupe and Dominique, and arrived safe at Fort Royal on the 21st of March. It was the intention of de Grasse to proceed to Hispaniola, and join the Spanish Admiral, Don Solano, who was awaiting his arrival, to make, in conjunction, the pre-concerted attack on Jamaica. On the 8th of April, at day-break, the French fleet left the harbour of Fort Royal: Admiral Rodney instantly made the signal for a general chace; and, early the next morning, he came up with the enemy under Dominique, where the van of the English engaged the rear of the French: the continued calms, however, prevented a general or close action. In the morning of the 11th a fresh gale sprang up; the chace was renewed; and, towards evening, the headmost ships of the van gained so much on one or two of the enemy's ships, damaged in the late action, that de Grasse thought it necessary to bear down for the purpose of protecting them. Sir George Rodney, who had eagerly watched and waited for this opportunity, now manœuvred the fleet with such skill, as to gain the windward of the enemy during the night, and entirely to prevent their retreat. At seven in the morning of the 12th, the two fleets, ranged in lines directly opposite, engaged with the greatest fury. The French ships being crowded with men, the carnage was prodigious; but no visible impression was made, or material advantage gained, till about noon, when Sir George Rodney in the Formidable, followed by his seconds the Namur and the Duke, successfully broke through the enemy's line, about three ships short of the centre, where the Count de Grasse commanded in the Ville de Paris. Promptly supported by the remainder of his division, Sir George wore round close upon the enemy, and actually separated their line, placing the central ships of the French between two fires. This manœuvre proved decisive. The French, however, continued to fight with the utmost bravery, and the battle lasted till sun-set. The Cæsar was the first ship which struck her colours, having lost her Captain, and being reduced to a wreck by her enemy's fire. Soon afterwards, she blew up, and all her crew perished. The Glorieux, the Hector, the Ardent, followed the example of the Cæsar; and the Diadem went down by a single broadside. The Ville de Paris still held out, and, though reduced to a wreck, seemed to prefer sinking rather than strike to any thing under a flag. Admiral Hood, in the Barfleur, approached him just at sun-set, and poured in a most destructive fire, which the Count sustained for some time, till having three men only left alive and unhurt on the upper deck, he struck. Night only closed the action: the shattered remains of the French fleet crowded all the sail they could make for Cape François, and in the morning they were out of sight. Sir Samuel Hood pursued them, and came up with five sail off Porto Rico, and captured the Jason and Caton ships of the line, and two frigates; the third with difficulty clearing the Mona passage. This was justly considered as one of the most glorious and decisive victories ever obtained by the naval prowess of Britain. The number of men slain in this action, and in that of the 9th, on the part of the French, is estimated at 3000 men, and the wounded were nearly double; so that, taking the prisoners on board the captured ships also into the computation, the French must have sustained a loss of ten or twelve thousand men. Their fleet had on board the land forces intended for the Jamaica expedition; and the whole train of artillery, with thirty-six chests of money destined for the use and subsistence of the troops, were found on board the Ville de Paris and the other captured ships. The designs of the confederated powers were thus completely frustrated, whilst the loss of men, including killed and wounded, on the part of the English, did not exceed 1100. Sir George Bridges Rodney was created a Peer of Great Britain, by the title of Baron Rodney, of Rodney Stoke in the county of Somerset, and a perpetual annuity of 2000*l.* was annexed to the title. A motion, over-ruled in the preceding session of Parliament, but intended to be revived by the present ministry, for an inquiry into the conduct of the naval and military commanders at St. Eustatius, was now lost sight of; and the Admiral received the Duke. He lamented as much as any man the death of the late Marquis of Rockingham, and the loss sustained by the cabinet in the retreat of two persons so remarkably distinguished, one by the splendor of his abilities the other by the unimpeached integrity of his character. The office he now held, his Lordship affirmed, was within his grasp when the first arrangements were forming, but he had then given way to the noble Marquis, though he had now accepted the post, as that nobleman was no more; and this, he believed, was the only reason for which the late right honourable secretary had withdrawn himself. But if the monarch was divested of the power of appointing his own servants, he would be reduced to the condition of a King of the Mahrattas, who had nothing of sovereignty but the name. He had been charged, his Lordship said, with inconsistency relative to America: but his opinion still was, as it ever had been, that whenever the Parliament of Great Britain acknowledged that point, the sun of England's glory was set for ever. Other Lords, however, thought differently, and the question would soon come under the full and impartial discussion of Parliament; but he repeated, that if Parliament conceded that point, he foresaw that England was undone; for that ruin and independence were linked together—the ruin not of England only, but of America."

DEATH OF LORD ROBERT MANNERS.

unanimous thanks of both Houses for his eminent services.*

The leading object of Spain, during the whole of this war, was the recovery of the fortress of Gibraltar. After the reduction of Minorca, the Duc de Crillon, conqueror of that place, was appointed to conduct the siege; and, from the failure of former plans, it was resolved to adopt an entire new mode of operation. A project was formed by the Chevalier D'Arçon, and approved by the Spanish court, to construct a number of floating batteries on a model which, it was believed, would secure them from being either sunk or fired. Their keels and bottoms were made of an extraordinary thickness, and their sides defended by a sort of rampart, composed of wood and cork, and inclosing between them a thick layer of wet sand. The roof was constructed of strong rope-work netting, covered with wet hides, and calculated, by its inclined form, to prevent the shells and bombs from lodging, and to throw them off into the sea. The batteries, ten in number, were made of the hulls of large vessels cut down for the purpose, and mounted with heavy brass cannon; and by an ingenious mechanism, a great variety of pipes and canals perforated all the solid workmanship, so as to convey a continued succession of water to every part of the vessels. The preparations were enormous in other respects: about 1200 pieces of heavy ordnance had been brought to the spot, to be employed in the different modes of attack; above eighty gun-boats and bomb-ketches were to second the operations of the floating batteries, with a multitude of frigates, sloops, and schooners: and the combined fleets of France and Spain, amounting to fifty sail of the line, were to cover and support the attack, while they heightened the terrible grandeur of the scene. The numbers employed by land and sea against the fortress were estimated at more than one hundred thousand men. With this force, and by the fire of three hundred cannon, mortars, and howitzers, from the adjacent isthmus, it was intended to attack every part of the British works at the same instant. The Count d'Artois and the Duc de Bourbon, the brother and cousin of the French monarch, and numerous other volunteers of high rank, had repaired to the Spanish camp to witness the inevitable fall of that famous fortress, which had so long bidden defiance to the power of Spain. Early on the morning of the 13th of September, the ten battering ships, commanded by Admiral Don Moreno, came to an anchor in a line parallel to the rock, at the distance of about 1000, or 1200 yards.—"The surrounding hills were covered with people, as though all Spain were assembled to behold the spectacle. The cannonade and bombardment on all sides from the isthmus to the sea, and the various works of the fortress were tremendously magnificent. The prodigious and unintermitted showers of red-hot balls, of bombs, and carcasses which filled the air, exhibited a scene perhaps unparalleled in military history. The whole peninsula, like some vast volcano, discharging on all sides its burning lava, seemed enveloped in a sheet or torrent of fire. The battering ships for many hours remained to all appearance unaffected; but about two in the afternoon the Admiral's ship was observed to smoke, and soon after that of the Prince of Nassau was observed to be in the same condition. The whole line of attack was now visibly disordered. At length, the day having closed, the two first ships appeared to be in flames, and others were beginning to kindle; and signals of distress were universally made. Captain Curtis, who commanded the English marine force in the Bay, to complete the confusion, having advanced to the attack with his gun-boats, and raked the whole line of batteries with his fire, the Spanish launches, which had been employed in bringing off the men, no longer dared to appear; but were compelled, after several had been sunk in the attempt, to abandon their ships to the flames, or to the mercy of the English. The distress of the enemy was now wrought up to the highest pitch of calamity; and the British officers and seamen, seeing all resistance at an end, exerted themselves to the utmost to save the vanquished foe, and their humanity was, at the close of this memorable conflict, no less conspicuous than their valour. Captain Curtis, in particular, exposed himself to the most imminent personal danger; and his pinnace was almost in contact with one of the largest batteries at the moment of explosion. In the end the floating batteries were all consumed; and the loss of the Spaniards by sea and land, was computed at 2000 men, whilst that of the garrison amounted to less than one hundred." At this time, Lord Howe, who commanded the grand fleet, consisting of thirty-four sail of the line, was on his passage from Portsmouth, to throw succours into the fortress. He arrived at Cape St. Vincent the 9th of October, and on the 11th he passed the Straits, where the combined fleets had for some time been stationed in order to intercept him; but a violent tempest drove them upon the Barbary coast, and prevented all possibility of attack. The St. Michael, of 72 guns, having separated from the fleet, ran on shore on the rock of Gibraltar, and was taken possession of by the garrison. After fully executing the purpose of his destination, Lord Howe set sail for England. The enemy making their appearance off Cape St. Vincent, October 20, the British Admiral lay-to, in order to receive them; but they kept at so great a distance, that the cannonade, which lasted from about five in the afternoon till ten at night, did little damage; and his Lordship having no pressing reasons for renewing the fight against so superior a force, continued his voyage without further molestation for Portsmouth. The Governor of Gibraltar, General Elliot, for his gallant and heroic defence of that fortress, was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Heathfield, and a pension annexed to the title, equal in amount to that which had been granted to Sir George Rodney. This was the last transaction of importance during the continuance of the war in Europe; and thus the military career of Britain though occasionally clouded by misfortune, in its progress, terminated with splendor and success.

All the belligerent powers were now inclined to listen to overtures of pacification. The Independence of America having been virtually recognised by England, and a resolution against offensive operations having passed the House of Commons, the war with the colonies might be considered as at an end. The original purpose of France having been accomplished, she could have no motive to persevere in a contest, the expence of which was enormous, and the further success uncertain. Spain, after extraordinary exertions, having failed in both her grand objects, the recovery of Gibraltar, and the conquest of Jamaica, had little reason to flatter herself that her future efforts would be more effectual than the past; and Holland would have neither the inclination nor ability to continue the war, single handed.

The negotiation with France and Spain had been protracted in consequence of the demand in which Spain for some time persisted of the cession of Gibraltar; but provisional articles of pacification between England and America were signed this year, the 30th of November, by which the Thirteen Provinces were declared free and independent States; and by a boundary line, very favourable to America, the whole country southward of the lakes on both sides of the Ohio, and eastward of the Mississippi, was ceded to the colonies, with a full participation of the fisheries on the banks of Newfoundland and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In return, the Congress engaged to "recommend" to the several States to provide for the restitution of the confiscated estates of the loyalists; but this recommendation eventually proved nugatory and useless; and this unfortunate portion of his Majesty's subjects migrated in great numbers to the wilds of Nova Scotia and the Bahamas. The definitive treaty was not signed till the following year, at the close of which, New York, Charlestown, and Savannah, the only places in the possession of the English, were finally evacuated; and General Washington made his public entry into the first of these cities as soon as the royal army had withdrawn.*

* In the month of June the Ville de Paris of 120 guns, the Centaur, Glorieux, Hector, Ramilies, and Canada, of 74 guns each, having been dispatched from Jamaica, to convoy the homeward bound fleet, were exposed to one of the most tremendous storms ever remembered. The Canada alone, commanded by Captain Cornwallis, reached England. The merchant vessels sustained proportionate damage. In the month of August the Royal George of 110 guns, with a thousand men on board, Admiral Kempenfelt, an excellent veteran officer, being himself of the number, foundered in Portsmouth harbour; having been overset by a sudden gust of wind when placed in an inclined position, for the purpose of undergoing a slight careen; a sloop which lay at a small distance was swallowed in the vortex—and the greater part of the crews of both vessels miserably perished.

Parliament was opened on the 5th of December, with a speech from the throne, in which the King declared, "That he had lost no time in giving the necessary orders for prohibiting offensive operations against America, and had been directing his views to a cordial reconciliation with her. Such being his own inclination, and such the sense of his Parliament and people, he had not hesitated to conclude with them provisional articles of peace, by which they were acknowledged Free and Independent States. He deplored this dismemberment of the empire, which had become a matter both of policy and prudence; but testified a hope that religion, language, interest, and affection, would yet prove a permanent tie of union between the two countries. He spoke with pride and satisfaction of the late gallant defence of Gibraltar: he recommended an immediate attention to the great objects of public receipt and expenditure, and above all to the state of the national debt. He applauded the liberal principles which had actuated the conduct of Parliament respecting Ireland; he pressed a revision of the whole system of trade, with a view to its fullest extension: and turning his attention to Asia, pointed out our vast possessions there as a most important object of regulation and care. He declared that the true spirit of the constitution would be the invariable rule of his conduct, and called upon Parliament to exercise their temper, wisdom, and disinterestedness." Addresses were voted in both Houses without a division; but some severe remarks having been made in the House of Peers on the inconsistency of the minister, who had at a former period so strongly opposed the recognition of American Independence, his Lordship declared "That he had exerted every effort to preserve America to this country;" adding, with great animation, "that he had not voluntarily yielded up this Independency—he had merely submitted to the controlling power of necessity and fate. It was not I (said he) that made this cession—it was the evil star of Britain—it was the blunders of a former administration—it was the power of revolted subjects, and the mighty arms of the House of Bourbon."

As it was not publicly known, whether the acknowledgment of Independency was absolute or conditional, and as Lord Shelburne declined to communicate any particulars of a negotiation which was actually pending, Mr. Fox moved, in the Commons, an address to the King, to lay before the House copies of such parts of the provisional articles as related to the same. This, however, was opposed as inexpedient and improper; and the motion was negatived by 219 against 46. On the 23d of December, the Parliament, after voting 100,000 seamen and marines for the service of the ensuing year, adjourned to the 21st of January, 1783—the day preceding which, preliminary articles of peace were signed between Great Britain, France, and Spain, which almost immediately after the recess (February 17) were submitted to the consideration of the two Houses.† (a) An address of thanks and approbation having been moved in the Peers by Lord Pembroke, and seconded by the Marquis of Carmarthen, a succession of able and eloquent speeches were made by the Lords Carlisle, Walsingham, Sackville, Stormont, and Loughborough, reprobating the preliminaries of peace as derogatory from the dignity, and in the highest degree injurious to the interests of the nation. The minister, however, defended himself with great vigour and ability;‡ and, on a division, the address was carried by 72 against 59 voices. A similar address was moved in

(a) A. D. 1783.

* The rejoicings on this occasion were celebrated with much enthusiasm; after which an affecting leave was taken by the General of the friends and companions of his warfare, who accompanied him on his return to his own province, to the banks of the North River. In every town and village through which the General passed he was received with the highest demonstrations of gratitude and joy. "When he arrived at Annapolis, he signified to Congress his intention to resign the command he had the honour to hold in their service, referring to them the mode in which it should be done. They resolved it should be in a public audience. When the day fixed for that purpose arrived, the hall of the senate-house was crowded with personages of the highest merit and distinction; and General Washington, addressing the president in a speech remarkable only for its dignified simplicity, 'demanded leave to surrender into their hands the trust committed to him, and, having finished the work assigned him, to retire from the great theatre of action to the tranquil scenes of private life, earnestly recommending to the protection of Almighty God the interests of his dear country, and those who have the superintendence of them to his holy keeping." To this address the president replied in words to the following purport:—'The United States in Congress assembled receive, with emotions too affecting for utterance, the solemn resignation of the authority under which you have led our troops with success through a perilous and doubtful war. Called upon by your country to defend its invaded rights, you accepted the sacred charge before it had formed alliances, and whilst it was without friends or a government to support you—you have conducted the great military contest with wisdom and fortitude, invariably regarding the rights of the civil power through all disasters and changes—you have, by the love and confidence of your fellow-citizens, enabled them to display their martial genius, and to transmit their fame to posterity. Having defended the standard of liberty in this new world, having taught a lesson useful to those who inflict and to those who feel oppression, you retire with the blessings of your country; but the glory of your virtues will not terminate with your military command—it will continue to animate remotest ages. May the Almighty foster a life so beloved with his peculiar care, and may your future days be as happy as your past have been illustrious!' 'The grand and interesting scenes which crowded upon the imagination of the General and the President almost deprived them of the power of articulation; and the mingled emotions of joy, regret, and admiration, which agitated the minds of the spectators, were expressed more forcibly by looks and gestures than they could have been by words. Immediately on this resignation, the late commander 'hastened,' to use his own words, 'with ineffable delight, to his seat at Mount Vernon, on the banks of the Potowmac.'"

† By this treaty Great Britain guaranteed to France the island of Tobago, and restored that of St. Lucia; also the settlements of Goree and Senegal in Africa; and the city of Pondicherry, with her other conquests in the East, accompanied by some additions of territory. The claims of Britain respecting Dunkirk were expressly relinquished, and on her part, France agreed to restore, Tobago excepted, all her valuable and important conquests in the West Indies. Spain was allowed to retain Minorca and West Florida, East Florida being also ceded in exchange for the Bahamas. These islands had however already been recovered to the dominion of Great Britain, in consequence of the success of an adventurous enterprise, gallantly conducted by Colonel Deraux, without the knowledge or assistance of government. Holland having rejected the former pacific advances of the English, it was resolved that she should not escape with impunity: the British plenipotentiaries were therefore directed to offer the restitution of the Dutch settlements in the possession of England, with the important exception of Trincomalee, which their High Mightinesses declared they could not reconcile with the professions of moderation on the part of his Britannic Majesty. Holland on the other hand, demanded an indemnification for the losses and expences of the war—a pretension which the English negotiators peremptorily rejected. These opposite claims impeded the conclusion of the treaty with that power.

‡ His Lordship declared, "That peace was the object for which the nation at large had discovered the most unequivocal desire; the end he had in view was the advantage of his country, and he was certain that he had attained it. The vast uncultivated tract of land to the southward of the lakes (his Lordship said) was of infinite consequence to America, and of none to England; and the retention of it, or even the forts which commanded it, could only have laid the foundation of future hostility. If our liberality to Ireland was the subject of just applause, why act upon principles of illiberality to America? The refusal of the Newfoundland fishery would have been a direct manifestation of hostile intentions; and as it lay on their coasts, it was in reality impossible to exclude them from it by any restrictions; it is an advantage which nature has given them, and to attempt to wrest it from them would not only be unjust but impracticable. Of one objection his Lordship acknowledged that he deeply felt the force. His regret and compassion for the situation of the unhappy loyalists were as pungent as those of their warmest advocates. This objection admitted only of one answer, the answer which he had given to his own bleeding heart—'It is better that a part should suffer, rather than the whole empire perish.' He would have dashed from him the bitter cup which the adversities of his country held out to him, if peace had not been absolutely necessary—if it had not been in the House of Commons by Mr. Thomas Pitt, and seconded by Mr. Wilberforce; on which Lord John Cavendish declared, "That he also professed himself an advocate for peace; but the question was not whether a peace were necessary, but whether a better peace might not have been obtained—this was a question which called for a serious deliberation. As the whole of the evidence proper to be produced was not before the House, it was expedient to pause and hesitate. He proposed therefore to annex to the address the following words: 'His Majesty's faithful Commons will proceed to consider of the treaties with that serious and faithful attention which a subject of so much importance to the present and future interests of his Majesty's dominions deserves; assuring his Majesty, nevertheless, of their firm and unalterable determination to adhere inviolably to the several articles for which the public faith is pledged.'" This amendment was seconded by Mr. St. John, member for the county of Bedford, and supported by Lord North. "The address," said his Lordship, "called for a vote of approbation, and he had no such vote to give; for he considered the peace as dishonourable and destructive. His Lordship wished not, however, to set negotiations aside which had been concluded under the sanction of prerogative, nor to put those who advised them under peril of punishment." Mr. Fox declared "his perfect concurrence with the sentiments expressed by the noble Lord; and in still more bitter terms reprobated the peace as the most disastrous and humiliating that had ever disgraced any country. He had been accused (he said) of having formed an union with the noble Lord whose principles he had opposed for several years of his life; but the grounds of their opposition were removed, and he did not conceive it to be honourable to keep up animosities for ever. He was happy at all times to have a proper opportunity to bury his resentments, and it was the wish of his heart that his friendships should never die. The American war was the source of his disagreement with the noble Lord; and that cause of enmity being now no more, it was wise and fit to put an end to the ill-will, the animosity, the feuds, and the rancour, which it engendered. It was a satisfaction to him to apply the appellation of friend to the noble Lord; he had found him honourable as an adversary, and he had no doubt of his openness and sincerity as a friend." This declaration was most indignantly received. Mr. Powys said, "this was the age of strange confederacies. The world had seen great and arbitrary despots stand forth as the protectors of an infant republic—France and Spain had combined to establish the rising liberties of America. The House now surveyed the counterpart of this picture—a monstrous coalition had taken place between a noble Lord and an illustrious Commoner—the lofty assertor of the prerogative had joined in alliance with the worshippers of the Majesty of the people."

On a division, the amendment was carried, by 224 against 208 voices. On the 21st of the same month, Lord John Cavendish moved a series of resolutions:—

"I. That, in consideration of the public faith, his Majesty's faithful Commons will assist him in rendering the peace permanent.

"II. That, in concurrence with his Majesty, they will endeavour to improve the blessings of peace to the advantage of the nation.

"III. That his Majesty, in acknowledging the Independency of America, has acted in conformity to the sense of Parliament, and to the powers vested in him by the act of the last session.

"IV. That the concessions made to the adversaries of Great Britain by the provisional treaty, and the preliminary articles, are greater than they were entitled to, either from the actual situation of their respective possessions, or from their comparative strength."

On the last of these resolutions, the merits of the peace were anew discussed; and Lord North expressed "His amazement at the reflections which had been thrown out against him. He did not repent of his conduct while a minister; conscious of his own innocence, he bade defiance to censure or punishment. Proud as he was of the coalition to which he had been invited, it should be understood that he was not disposed to make any sacrifice of his public principles. He dreaded no accusation, and he dared his enemies, whatever might be their abilities, their influence, and their character, to be decisive, and to proceed against him." The question was carried against the ministry by 207 to 190.

It was now obvious that some change in administration must take place. More than a month, however, passed in a sort of ministerial interregnum. At length Mr. Coke, member for Norfolk, moved an address to the King, "that he would be graciously pleased to take into consideration the distracted and unsettled state of the empire, and condescend to a compliance with the wishes of this House, by forming an administration entitled to the confidence of his people." This was unanimously carried, and presented to the King, who replied, "that it was his earnest desire to do every thing in his power to comply with the wishes of his faithful Commons." This answer not proving satisfactory, Lord Surry moved another address,—"assuring his Majesty that all delays in a matter of this moment have an inevitable tendency to weaken the authority of his government; and most humbly intreating his Majesty that he will take such measures towards this object as may quiet the anxiety and apprehension of his faithful subjects." Mr. Pitt, however, declaring that he had resigned his office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that any resolution or address relative to a new arrangement of administration was unnecessary, Lord Surry consented to withdraw his motion.

In consequence of this resignation, the Duke of Portland was placed at the head of the Treasury; Lord John Cavendish was re-appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer; Lord North and Mr. Fox were nominated Joint Secretaries of State, the first for the home, the latter for the foreign department; Lord Keppel, who had recently resigned on account of his disapprobation of the peace, was again replaced at the head of the Admiralty; Lord Stormont was created President of the Council; Lord Carlisle was advanced to the post of Lord Privy-Seal; the Great Seal was put into commission—the Chief Justice Loughborough, being declared first Lord Commissioner; the Earl of Northington was appointed to the government of Ireland; Viscount Townshend was made Master-General of the Ordnance, Lord Sandwich Ranger of the Parks, and Mr. Burke reinstated in his former post of Paymaster of the forces.

The coalition ministry immediately became the theme of universal and passionate execration. The terms of the peace were generally deemed as good as there was any previous reason, from the relative situation of the belligerent powers, to expect; but the coalition of persons and principles radically hostile, and which no effort of art, or length of time, could assimilate, "was universally branded as a gross and palpable sacrifice of every sentiment of honour, consistency, and rectitude, on the altar of ambition, interest, and revenge."

Amongst the earliest measures of the new ministry was the passing of a bill, already pending, for the purpose of preventing any writs of error or appeal from the kingdom of Ireland from being received by any of his Majesty's courts in Great Britain; and of renouncing, in express terms, the legislative authority of the British been called for with an unanimity and vigour that could not be resisted. No arts of address or negotiation had been neglected, but the American commissioners had no power to concede further. The Congress itself had not the power—for, by the constitution of America, every state was supreme, including in itself the legislative and judicial powers; its jurisdiction, therefore, was not liable to controul. In the mode of interposition, by recommendation alone could the Congress act. If, after all, the loyalists should not be received into the bosom of their native country, Britain, penetrated with gratitude for their services, and warm with the feelings of humanity, would afford them an asylum; and it would doubtless be wiser to indemnify them for their losses, than to ruin the nation by a renewal or prolongation of the calamities of war."

Parliament in relation to Ireland. Soon after this, a bill was introduced by Sir Henry Fletcher, chairman of the East India Company, "for suspending the payments of the Company now due to the Royal Exchequer, and for enabling them to borrow the sum of 300,000*l.* for their further relief." This bill passed with little difficulty.

In April, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his plan for raising twelve millions by loan; the most remarkable circumstance attending which was, that the money borrowed was funded at 3 per cent, at the rate of 150*l.* stock for every 100*l.* sterling; so that an artificial capital of six millions was created above the sum actually paid into the exchequer.

Mr. Pitt's former motion for an inquiry into the state of the representation having been negatived, he brought forward, May 7th, a specific plan of reform, comprized in the three following resolutions:

"I. That it was the opinion of the House that measures were highly necessary to be taken for the farther prevention of bribery and expense at elections.

"II. That for the future when the majority of voters for any borough shall be convicted of gross and notorious corruption before a select committee of that House, such borough should be disfranchised, and the minority of voters not so convicted should be entitled to vote for the county in which such borough shall be situated.

"III. That an addition of knights of the shire, and of representatives of the metropolis, should be added to the state of the representation."

A long and animated debate ensued; and, on a division, Mr. Pitt's resolutions were lost, by 293 against 149 voices.*

Parliament was prorogued on the 16th of July,† by a speech in which the King intimated his intention of calling them together at an early period, to resume the consideration of the affairs of India.

The definitive treaties with France, Spain, and America, were about this period signed with no material alteration; also preliminaries of peace with the States General, by which all the conquests of England were restored, except the town of Negapatnam on the coast of Coromandel, which their High Mightinesses found themselves, however reluctantly, at length compelled to cede.‡ Nearly, also, at this time, an ambassador from the United States of America, Mr. Adams, arrived in London. On his first audience at St. James's, his Majesty, addressing Mr. Adams with much courtesy, said, "that he had been the last man in his kingdom who had assented to the recognition of American Independence; but, now it was actually established, he would be the last man in the kingdom to violate it."§

* A bill for regulating the trade of the African Company having been introduced towards the close of the session, with a clause prohibiting the officers of the Company from exporting negroes, the Quakers embraced the occasion to petition the House of Commons, "That the clause in question might be extended to all persons whatsoever; professing themselves deeply affected with the consideration of the rapine, oppression, and blood, attending this traffic. Under the countenance of the laws of this country," the petitioners remark, "many thousands of these our fellow-creatures, entitled to the natural rights of mankind, are held as personal property in cruel bondage. Your petitioners regret, that a nation professing the Christian faith should so far counteract the principles of humanity and justice." This petition strongly excited the attention of the public, and laid the foundation of the subsequent efforts, to effect a total abolition of this commerce, and restore to the common rights of humanity that despised and unfortunate race.

† In the summer, the King issued an order in council, limiting the commerce between the continent of America and the British West India islands to ships British built.

‡ In the course of this year died Dr. Frederic Cornwallis, Primate of England, having filled the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury nearly fifteen years. He was succeeded by Dr. Moore, Bishop of Bangor—a prelate who, in difficult times and circumstances, acquired universal esteem.

§ At the close of this period of our history, it may not be improper to glance at the relative situations of the chief powers on the continent. The Elector of Bavaria died December 30, 1777. He was the last of the Ludovican line of electors, which had been in possession of the duchy and its appendages nearly five centuries. These dominions fell to the heir general of the deceased, Charles Theodore Elector Palatine; and as he was advanced in life, and had no issue, both electorates seemed likely to fall into the possession of the Duke of Deux-ponts, his nearest relation in the male Palatine line. Scarcely however, had the new elector arrived at Munich, when he found himself opposed by a most formidable rival. This was the emperor, who, advancing his claim to the whole of the Lower Bavaria, and to all those districts of the Upper which had been formerly fiefs of the kingdom of Bohemia, caused a vast army to enter the electorate, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Regency, who in vain pleaded the laws of the empire and the rights of sovereignty. Theodore, unable and unwilling to risk the contest, signed a convention with the Emperor in January, 1778, in which all the pretended rights of the court of Vienna were allowed and conceded. The Duke of Deux-ponts, however, formally protested against this invasion and dereliction of his rights, and called upon the Princes and co-estates of the empire, as members of the Germanic body, and guarantees of the treaty of Westphalia, to interpose for the preservation of the constitution, thus openly violated. The King of Prussia assumed the lead in this concern. His several memorials, however, were extremely guarded and temperate, whilst the replies of the imperial court were haughty and supercilious in the extreme. The King of Prussia at length proposed to the Emperor to guarantee to him the cession of two considerable districts of the duchy of Bavaria, contiguous to the Austrian territories, on condition that the court of Vienna would relinquish her remaining claims. This being refused with disdain, his Prussian Majesty published a manifesto, (July 1778) stating "the unwarrantable and violent conduct of the imperial court, which, if suffered to proceed without control, would effect the total overthrow of the whole Germanic system." Saxony now joined the King of Prussia, who immediately entered Bohemia at the head of a large army on the side of Silesia, while another of nearly equal force, under his brother Prince Henry, penetrated the passes of the mountains which separate that kingdom from Saxony. The Emperor in person, assisted by Mareschal Lasci, commanding one army, and the famous Mareschal Laudohn the other; the whole plan and conduct of this campaign, which on the part of the Austrians was wholly defensive, being ascribed to the latter general. After a variety of movements and manœuvres, the King of Prussia, unable to bring the Austrians to a general action, was compelled to evacuate Bohemia with great loss; and, soon afterwards, a negotiation for peace was set on foot by the court of Vienna, whose councils the Emperor could no longer influence; the whole empire being firmly united in opposition to the imperial claims. Russia openly declared, by her ambassador at Ratisbon, that if the usurpation of Bavaria was not relinquished, she should be under the necessity of furnishing to Prussia the auxiliary troops stipulated by treaty; and even France declared to the Diet her resolution in no respect to deviate from her guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia. The motives for peace being thus urgent, the preliminary articles were signed at Teschen, May 13th, 1779, in conformity to which the whole electorate was restored to its rightful possessor, the district of Burghausen excepted. The Empress did not long survive the pacification she so anxiously sought, dying November 12th, 1780, much lamented by her subjects, whom she had governed for forty years with parental affection and indisputable ability. Joseph the Second, her son, commenced his reign with an act of beneficence, truly imperial, in the promulgation of letters-patent, granting the free exercise of their religion to the Protestants all over the Austrian dominions; and, by another edict, he declared all religious foundations in the Austrian Netherlands exempt from all foreign ecclesiastical jurisdictions. Other regulations were also adopted for the purpose of reducing the number of religious houses, and of discountenancing all monastic institutions. Pius VI. whose zeal was very great, declared to the Emperor his intention, notwithstanding his advanced age, to make a journey to Vienna, to confer with him on the subject of these innovations. On his arrival at Vienna, in the spring of 1782, he was treated by the Emperor with the highest demonstrations of respect and affection; but no alterations whatever as to public measures took place, in consequence of this visit. On his return to Rome, the holy pontiff had the mortification to find his journey the object of general ridicule.

The amicable relations between the Russian and Turkish empires had suffered great interruption, by the opposition of interests involved in the election of a Khan of the Tartars, respecting which neither power had any right to interfere. An explanatory agreement at length took place (March, 1779,) by which the Khan Sahim Guerari, elected through the influence of Russia, was acknowledged as lawful Khan of the Crimea, by the Turkish government. In 1782, however, these disturbances were revived, and the Czarina entered into an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the Emperor, in the expectation of an immediate war with the Porte. Soon after this the Khan of the Tartars, signified his resolution to resign his crown into the hands of the Czarina; and, after some pretended hesitation, her imperial Majesty declared, by a public manifesto, dated April, 1783, her acceptance of this resignation, and her determination to take the peninsula of the Crimea, with the island of Taman, and the province of Cuban Tartary, on the other side of the Streights of Caffa, extending to Circassia, under her immediate administration. The Turkish court, aroused by this unexpected event, replied to the Russian manifesto with unusual animation and energy; but without effect; and, consequently, a war appeared inevitable. Happily, however, for the interests of humanity, the courts of London and Versailles offered their mediation; and the Porte, at length, reluctantly consented to the session of the provinces in dispute, now actually in the possession of Russia. A treaty or convention to that purport was accordingly signed in January, 1784.

In February, 1777, died Don Joseph I. King of Portugal, whose reign had been marked by weakness and calamity; cruelty and blood. He was succeeded by his eldest daughter, Donna Isabella, married by virtue of a papal dispensation to Don Pedro, brother to the late King. At her accession the prison-doors were thrown open, and about 800 persons were restored to the blessings of liberty.

BOOK XXX.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE III. FROM THE GENERAL PEACE OF 1783, TO THE PEACE OF AMIENS, IN THE YEAR 1801.

32. GEORGE III.

A. D. 1783.] THE Parliament assembled on the 11th of November, when his Majesty stated, that "the utmost exertions of their wisdom would be required to maintain and improve the valuable advantages derived from our Indian possessions, and to promote and secure the happiness of the native inhabitants of those provinces." The address passed without opposition; and, on the 18th of November, Mr. Fox moved for leave to bring in a bill for vesting the affairs of the East India Company in the hands of certain commissioners, for the benefit of the proprietary and the public."* This act was to continue in force four years, that is, till the year after the next general election;—and it was accompanied by a second bill, for the future government of the British territories in Hindostan. The astonishment excited by the disclosure of this plan was very great. "India, it was true," said Mr. Pitt, "wanted reform, but not such a reform as this;—it wanted a constitutional alteration, and not a tyrannical one, that broke through every principle of equity and justice." "The bill under consideration included a confiscation of the property, and a disfranchisement of the members, of the East India Company—all the several articles of whose effects were transferred by violence to strangers. Imagination was at a loss to guess at the most insignificant trifle that had escaped the harpy jaws of a ravenous coalition."—"The influence which would accrue from this bill—a new, enormous, and unexampled influence—was indeed in the highest degree alarming. Seven commissioners, chosen ostensibly by Parliament, but really by administration, were to involve in the vortex of their authority the patronage and treasures of India. The right honourable mover had acknowledged himself to be a man of ambition; and it now appeared that he was prepared to sacrifice the King, the Parliament, and the people, at the shrine of his ambition. He desired to elevate his present connexions to a situation in which no political convulsions, and no variations of power, might be able to destroy their importance, and put an end to their ascendency." These and similar arguments were also ably enforced by the Lord-Advocate, Mr. Jenkinson, Mr. Grenville, &c. On the other hand, Mr. Fox declared, "that he would risk upon the execution of this bill whatever was most dear to him—whatever men most valued: the character of integrity, of talents, of honour, of present reputation and future fame;—these he would stake upon the constitutional safety, the enlarged policy, the equity and wisdom of this measure. Make the commissioners removable at will, and you set all the passions of human nature afloat. Invest them with power upon the same tenure as the British Judges hold their station, removable upon delinquency, punishable upon guilt, but fearless of danger if they discharge their trust, and they will be liable to no seducement, and will execute their functions with glory to themselves, and for the common good of the country and mankind. Every word in this bill breathes suspicion. It supposes that men are but men; it confides in no integrity, it trusts to no character; it annexes responsibility to every action, every exertion of the various powers which it creates and confers."

During the progress of the bill, a petition was presented from the Company, representing the measure "as subversive of their charter, and operating as a confiscation of their property, without charging against them any specific delinquency, without trial, without conviction—a proceeding contrary to the most sacred privileges of British subjects—and praying to be heard by counsel against the bill." The city of London also presented a strong petition to the same effect; but the bill was carried through all its stages in the Commons by great majorities; and, on the 9th of December, Mr. Fox, attended by a numerous train of members, presented the bill at the bar of the Lords. Earl Temple immediately declared, "that he was happy to embrace the first opportunity of entering his protest against so infamous a bill—against a stretch of power so truly alarming, and that went near to seize upon the most inestimable part of our constitution—our chartered rights." The opposition in this House was violent. The second reading of the bill took place on the 15th of December, when counsel was heard in behalf of the Company. At eleven o'clock, the counsel solicited an adjournment for the conclusion of their evidence; and a motion to that effect was carried in opposition to the ministers by 87 against 79 voices. On the 17th, it was moved, That the bill be rejected; and, after a vehement debate, the motion of rejection was carried by 95 against 76.

Earl Temple, it appears, had held a conference with the King, on the 11th of December, in the course of which his Lordship explained the nature and tendency of this famous bill. The King's indignation was consequently excited in a high degree; his Majesty considering himself as having been duped and deceived; and a card was immediately written, stating, "That his Majesty allowed Earl Temple to say, that whoever voted for the India Bill was not only not his friend, but would be considered by him as his enemy: if these words were not strong enough, Earl Temple might use whatever words he might deem stronger or more to the purpose." This affair becoming known, Mr. William Baker, member for Hertford, moved the House of Commons on the very day the bill was rejected by the Lords, "That it was now necessary to declare, that to report any opinion or pretended opinion of the King upon any bill, or other proceeding, depending in either House of Parliament, with a view to influence the votes of the members, was a high crime and misdemeanor." Mr. Pitt represented it as unworthy of the dignity of the House to found any resolutions upon rumours and hear-says; but Earl Nugent, father-in-law to Earl Temple, declared "That the resolutions before them went to the utter annihilation of sovereignty. What! were not Peers by their rank and situation hereditary counsellors of the crown?—Would that House dare to derogate from the high dignity which the constitution had annexed to their station? Every Peer, and indeed every Commoner, under certain restrictions, had a right to address the sovereign. But the tendency of these resolutions was to make the monarch a kind of prisoner of state, and to shut him up from every species of information unacceptable to the existing administration. Were any relation of his, in a crisis of difficulty and danger, to convey truths to his sovereign of high importance to be known, though at the risk of incurring the utmost punishment which the indignation of that House could inflict, he should consider his conduct not merely as justifiable, but transcendently meritorious, and such as would transmit his name with honour to the latest posterity." The resolution, however, moved by Mr. Baker was carried by a great majority. But the affair did not end here. The quarrel between the crown and the ministers having become public, an entire change of administration was determined upon; and, at midnight, on the 18th of December, a royal message was sent to the secretaries of state, demanding the seals of their several departments. Early the next morning, letters of dismission, signed Temple, were sent to the other members of the cabinet. In the course of a few days, Mr. Pitt was declared first Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer; the Marquis of Carmarthen, and Mr. Thomas Townshend, created Lord Sydney, were nominated Secretaries of State; Lord Thurlow was reinstated as Lord Chancellor; Earl Gower, afterwards created Marquis of Stafford, as President of the Council; the Duke of Rutland was constituted Lord Privy Seal; Lord Howe was placed at the head of the Admiralty; the Duke of Richmond of the Ordnance; Earl of Northington was recalled from his government of Ireland, to which Lord Temple, who had retained the seals of secretary only three days, was again destined to succeed. The Earl of Shelburne was not included in the new arrangement of administration. The intelligence of this change was, however, received by the nation with transports of joy.

* This celebrated bill proposed to take from the directors and proprietors the entire administration of their territorial and commercial affairs; and to vest the management and direction of them in the hands of seven commissioners, irremovable by the crown, except in consequence of an address of either House of Parliament. These were Earl Fitzwilliam, President of the board; Viscount Lewisham, eldest son to the Earl of Dartmouth; the Right Honourable Frederic Montague; the Honourable George Augustus North; Sir Gilbert Elliot, Sir Henry Fletcher, Baronets; and Robert Gregory, Esq. These commissioners were to be assisted by a subordinate board of nine directors, to be named, in the first instance, by Parliament, and afterwards chosen by the proprietors. The bill empowered these commissioners and directors immediately to enter into possession of all lands, tenements, books, records, vessels, goods, merchandize, and securities, in trust for the Company.

On the 22d of December, in a committee on the state of the nation, Mr. Erskine moved, "That an address be presented to the King, stating, that alarming reports had gone forth of an intended dissolution of Parliament, and humbly representing to his Majesty the inconveniences and dangers of a prorogation or dissolution in the present conjuncture; and entreating the sovereign to hearken to the advice of that House, and not to the secret advice of particular persons who might have private interests of their own, separate from the true interests of the King and people." This address was carried without a division; and the King, in answer, said, "It had been his constant object to employ the authority intrusted to him by the constitution to its true and only end—the good of the people; and he was always happy in concurring with the wishes and opinions of his faithful Commons. He trusted they would proceed in the important matters mentioned in their address with a convenient speed, assuring them that he should not interrupt their meeting after their adjournment by any exercise of his prerogative either of prorogation or dissolution."

The House now adjourned for the recess to the 10th of January, 1784, when the committee on the state of the nation was resumed; and several resolutions were brought forward by Mr. Fox, and agreed to by the House. On the 16th of the month a resolution was moved by Lord Charles Spencer, "That the continuance of the present ministers in trusts of the highest importance and respectability was contrary to the principles of the constitution, and injurious to the interests of the King and people." This was carried by 205 against 184. Soon afterwards, the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced a bill for the better government of India, on principles which left the commercial concerns of the Company in their own hands, and established a board of controul, consisting of certain commissioners appointed by the King, possessing a negative on the proceedings of the Company in all matters of government or politics. On the motion of commitment, however, this bill was negatived by 222 voices against 214. Startled at the new and dangerous circumstances of the nation, both parties seemed disposed to pause, and an idea, suggested by the independent interest in the House of Commons, of a new administration founded upon the widest and most comprehensive basis, was listened to with approbation. Lord North declared himself willing to retire if considered as the obstacle to a general union. The King, by a message to the Duke of Portland, expressed his earnest desire that an interview might take place between his Grace and Mr. Pitt, for the purpose of arranging a new plan of administration on a wide basis and on fair and equal terms. The Duke requested to be informed in what sense he was to understand the words "fair" and "equal;" but Mr. Pitt declined explanation, and the negotiation terminated. The House of Lords now stood forward; and on the motion of the Earl of Effingham their Lordships resolved:—

"I. That an attempt by any one branch of the legislature to suspend the execution of law by separately assuming to itself the direction of a discretionary power vested by act of Parliament is unconstitutional."

"II. That by the known principles of the constitution the undoubted authority of appointing to the great offices of the executive government was solely vested in the King, and that this House had every reason to place the firmest reliance on his Majesty's wisdom in the exercise of this prerogative."

These resolutions, in the form of an address, were presented to the King. The House of Commons (February 16) on their part, resolved, on the motion of Lord Beauchamp:—

"I. That the House had not assumed to itself a right to suspend the execution of law.

"II. That for them to declare their opinions respecting the exercise of any discretionary power was constitutional, and agreeable to established usage."

Several other addresses, still stronger in their terms, having been unavailingly tried, Mr. Fox on the 2d of March moved a representation to the crown, which stated "The dangerous and pernicious tendency of those measures and maxims by which a new system of executive government had been set up; which, wanting the confidence of that House, and acting in defiance of their resolutions, must prove at once inadequate by its inefficiency to the necessary objects of government, and dangerous by its example to the liberties of the people." The motion was carried by a majority of one; and here the contest may be said to have closed; for the Mutiny bill being brought forward on the following day, Mr. Fox abandoned his intention of moving its postponement, as a security against a sudden and premature dissolution. On the 24th of March, however, the Parliament was prorogued; the next day it was dissolved by proclamation; and a new Parliament convened to meet on the 18th of May.

At the general election which ensued, the Coalitionists were almost every where thrown out. Mr. Fox, notwithstanding, had a great majority on the poll for Westminster. The High Bailiff, however, refused to make the return in his favour,—for which an action was afterwards brought by Mr. Fox, in the court of King's Bench, and a verdict with large damages was given.

His Majesty, in his opening speech, expressed "great satisfaction at meeting his Parliament at this time, after having recurred in so important a moment to the sense of his people. He entertained a just and confident reliance liance that they were animated by the same sentiments of loyalty and attachment to the constitution which had been so fully manifested in every part of the kingdom. He recommended to their most serious consideration to frame suitable provisions for the good government of our possessions in the East Indies. Upon this subject Parliament would not lose sight of the effect which the measures they adopted might have on our own constitution and our dearest interests at home." The proposed address contained strong expressions of approbation respecting the late dissolution, which Lord Surry, on the ground of unanimity, moved to omit; but Mr. Pitt declared, "That much as he was convinced of the importance of unanimity, he would not purchase a hollow unanimity by passing over a great constitutional measure which the circumstances of the times had made necessary and wise, and which had given the most entire satisfaction to every part of the kingdom." On a division, the amendment was rejected by a majority of 76 voices; so that, from this period, Mr. Pitt may be regarded as the constitutional and efficient minister of the nation.

The business which next occupied the attention of the House, was the complaint respecting the High Bailiff of Westminster, who had refused to make the return in Mr. Fox's favour, although he had, upon the face of the poll, a majority of 235 votes. Mr. Fox, however, through the interest of his friend Sir Thomas Dundas, was chosen member for the borough of Kirkwall, in the Orkneys.*

A motion was made by Mr. Alderman Sawbridge, (June 16) and seconded by Mr. Alderman Newnham, representatives of the city of London, that a committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the representation of the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament. Mr. Pitt supported the principle of the motion, but contended that the time was improper; and Mr. Dundas, who had supported the proposition last year, objected, that the committee now moved for was a select committee, whereas it was his opinion that it should be referred to a committee of the whole House. The motion was lost, by 201 to 127.

Mr. Pitt brought in a bill, (July 6) founded on the general principles of that rejected by the former Parliament, and to which the India Company had now given their reluctant assent.† Mr. Fox attacked the weak and exceptionable parts of this bill; but the utmost energy of his eloquence proved inadequate to excite the general attention of the public to the merits or demerits of the measure in question—prepossessed as they now almost universally were in favour of the minister with whom it originated. On the motion of commitment, the numbers were 276 to 61; and the bill was carried in triumph to the Peers, where after an opposition very feeble in numbers, it passed on the 9th of August. In a protest, however, it was severely branded, as a measure ineffectual in its provisions, unconstitutional in its partial abolition of the trial by jury, and unjust in its inquisitorial spirit.

The arrival of Sir Elijah Impey, Chief Judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Bengal, who had been re-called by the King, in conformity to an address of that House, having taken place, Mr. Burke earnestly recommended it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to enforce the resolutions of that House respecting him; but Mr. Pitt unequivocally declined any concern in the affair. In consequence, Mr. Burke moved (July 28) that the House should resolve itself into a committee, to inquire into the facts stated in the different reports relative to India. The motion having been negatived, by the order of the day, Mr. Burke, two days afterwards, brought forward a series of resolutions, intended as a foundation for an inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Hastings. Mr. Pitt immediately rose, and asked, "How that House, as a House of Parliament, knew, as a fact, the transactions on which Mr. Burke grounded his motion? If the motion passed, from what office were the papers expected to proceed? To relieve the House from these embarrassments, he said, he should move the order of the day." Mr. Burke, indignant at this second interruption, now stood forward, and declaimed, with great warmth, against the insensibility of government to the foul enormities lately perpetrated, and still perpetrating, by our countrymen in the East. The cries of the native Indians, he said, were never out of his ears; an impression of horror had seized on his mind, which deprived him of sleep, and night and day, preyed upon his peace. The reality of the facts stated in the reports had been impeached. Why then would not the men who denied them stand forward and support their allegations? "Oh! what," said Mr. Burke, "would I not give to find the scenes of horror there described nothing more than a fiction! To me it would be a discovery more precious and grateful than the discovery of a new world." He declared, that "he wished it for the honour of humanity, from sympathy to millions of suffering and helpless individuals, from an anxious desire to retrieve the honour of the House, and of the country at large, from infamy and execration." He conjured Mr. Pitt "to reflect with seriousness on this business. The voice of India cried aloud for justice. He was at a loss," he said, "how to account for the callous insensibility of the minister, at a time of life when all the generous feelings of our nature are most lively and susceptible."—Proceeding in reflections very pointed and personal, the orator was loudly called to order; and was at length compelled to sit down, amidst the universal clamour and tumult of the House.

The attention of the House was now transferred to a bill for the more effectual prevention of the practice of smuggling, which had of late years arisen to a most alarming height. The most extraordinary part of the plan was the reduction of the duties paid by the East India Company on the importation of tea, which was affirmed to be the grand medium of the smuggling traffic; and the consequent imposition of a new duty on windows, to the amount of the deficiency, estimated

* A resolution was moved (May 24) by Mr. Lee, late Attorney-General, "That the High Bailiff of Westminster on the day upon which the writ of election expired ought to have returned two members to serve in Parliament for that city." A violent debate ensued; and the previous question having been moved by Sir Lloyd Kenyon, it was ordered that the High Bailiff should attend the House the next day. The pretext on which that officer rested his defence was, that, "having ground to suspect the validity of many votes taken in the course of a poll of six weeks' duration, he had granted a scrutiny, till the termination of which he could not, in conscience, make the return." After long pleadings by counsel at the bar of the House, on both sides, the motion was renewed, "that the High Bailiff be directed forthwith to make the return." This motion was strongly opposed, and finally negatived by 195 against 117. It was then moved and carried, "that the High Bailiff do proceed in the scrutiny with all practicable dispatch." Thus was this business laid at rest during the present session.

† By this bill a Board of Control, composed of a certain number of commissioners, of the rank of privy-counsellors, was established, the members of which were to be appointed by the King, and removable at his pleasure. This board was authorised to check, superintend, and controul, the civil and military government and revenue of the Company. The dispatches transmitted by the court of directors to the different presidencies were to be previously subjected to the inspection of the superior board, and counter-signed by them; and the directors were enjoined to pay due obedience to the orders of the board, touching civil and military government and revenues; "And in case such orders do, at any time, in the opinion of the directors, relate to points not connected therewith, they are empowered to appeal to his Majesty in council, whose decision is declared final." The bill further enacted, "that the appointment of the court of directors to the office of governor-general, president, or counsellor in the different presidencies, shall be subject to the approbation and recall of his Majesty." As to the zemindars, or great hereditary landholders of India, the present bill provided that an inquiry should be instituted, in order to restore such as should appear to have been irregularly and unjustly deprived. Further, a high tribunal was created for the trial of Indian delinquents, consisting of three judges, one from each court, of four Peers, and six members of the House of Commons, who were authorised to judge without appeal—to award, in case of conviction, the punishments of fine and imprisonment—and to declare the party convicted incapable of serving the East India Company. The management of their commercial concerns was left in the hands of the Company, who were divested only of that political power which they had abused, and of that civil authority to the due exercise of which they were incompetent. This authority was not transferred to persons who, like the commissioners of Mr. Fox, might attempt to establish an unconstitutional influence in Parliament, not merely independent of, but in direct opposition to, the regular and constitutional authority of the crown.

at six hundred thousand pounds per annum. This was stiled by the minister a commutation tax; and its equity was defended on the idea, that, teas being an article of universal consumption, the weight of the tax would be compensated by a proportional abatement in the purchase of the commodity. Mr. Fox asked, what connection there was between an impost upon tea and an impost upon windows, to entitle the latter to be denominated a commutation for the former? He affirmed it to be the essence of financial injustice and oppression to take off a tax upon luxury, and to substitute in its stead a tax upon that which was of indispensible necessity. The bill, however, passed by a great majority; and, in a commercial and financial view, it more than answered its intended purpose. The providing for the arrears of the unfunded debt left at the conclusion of the war, amounting to more than twenty millions, was disposed of partly in the four per cents, and partly in a new created five per cent. stock, made irredeemable for thirty years, or until twenty-five millions of the existing funds should be extinguished. In the course of the session, the sum of sixty thousand pounds was voted to his Majesty, to enable him to discharge the debt contracted in the civil list. This was the fourth grant for the same purpose since the accession of the present King. The last measure of the present session was a bill introduced by Mr. Dundas, for the restoration of the estates forfeited in Scotland in consequence of the rebellions of 1715 and 1745.* Parliament was prorogued on the 20th of August; the King returning his warmest thanks to both Houses for their zealous and diligent attention to the public service.†

On

* Mr. Dundas declared the measure to be worthy of the justice and generosity of Parliament. There was not one of the families comprehended in the scope of it, in which some person had not atoned for the crimes and errors of his ancestors, by sacrificing his blood in the cause of his country; and the sovereign had not, for a long series of past years, a more loyal set of subjects than the Highlanders of Scotland and their chieftains.

† Ireland, at this period, was in a very disturbed state. So long since as the 1st of July, 1783, the delegates of forty-five volunteer corps had assembled at Lisburne, in the county of Antrim, to consider of the measures proper to be adopted, to effect a Reform in Parliament. A committee was then appointed to meet at Belfast; by which letters were addressed to many persons of consequence in the sister kingdom, requesting their advice and opinion on this important subject.

The meeting at Lisburne was followed by an assembly of delegates at Dungannon, for the province of Ulster; at which the Earl of Charlemont, Generalissimo of the volunteer corps throughout the kingdom; Mr. Conally, considered as the first Commoner in point of property; and the Bishop of Derry, brother to the Earl of Bristol, nominated in the year 1766 to the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, were present. The provinces of Lienster and Munster followed the example of Ulster, and a national convention was appointed to be held at Dublin on the 10th of November, 1783. This was the posture of affairs when the Parliament of Ireland, recently elected, met on the 14th of October. On the first day of the session the thanks of both Houses were voted to the different volunteer corps of Ireland for their public services; and a resolution, proposed by Lord Mountmorres, "That, in the present state of the kingdom, it was expedient that there should be a session of Parliament held every year," received the sanction of both Houses. On the 10th of November the national convention assembled, and the Earl of Charlemont was elected president. On the motion of the Bishop of Derry, a committee was forthwith appointed to digest a plan of reform, who in a short time reported their opinion. "That every Protestant freeholder, or leaseholder, possessing a freehold or leasehold for a certain term of years of forty shillings value, resident in any city or borough, should be entitled to vote in the election of member for the same: That decayed boroughs should be enabled to return representatives by an extension of franchise to the neighbouring parishes: That the suffrages of the electors should be taken by the sheriff or his deputies on the same day at the respective places of election: That pensioners of the crown, receiving their pensions during pleasure, should be incapacitated from sitting in Parliament: That every member of Parliament accepting a pension for life, or any place under the crown, should vacate his seat: That each member should subscribe an oath, that he had neither directly nor indirectly given any pecuniary or other consideration, with a view of obtaining the suffrage of any elector: Finally, that the duration of Parliament should not exceed the term of three years." This report was received with great applause, and resolutions to the same purport unanimously passed. The next day Mr. Flood moved the House of Commons, for leave to bring in a bill for the more equal representation of the people in Parliament. Mr. Yelverton, Attorney-General, declared that "the question thus introduced did not deserve to be discussed, but that it ought to be regarded as an insult upon the House. If the bill originated, as it was notorious it did, with a body of armed men, they should decidedly set their faces against receiving it, They did not sit there to receive propositions at the point of the bayonet. He entertained an extreme reverence for the volunteers, for the essential services they had conferred on their country; but when they formed themselves into a political body, to discuss the modes of reforming Parliament, and to regulate the affairs of the nation—when they would probe the wounds of the constitution with the sword—he would be their most determined opponent. The question was now, Whether the national convention or the Parliament of Ireland were to legislate for the country? What phenomenon was it they had lately seen? Armed men drawn up in files, preparing the way for other armed men, resorting in fastidious pomp to a general assembly, and displaying all the ostentation of a real Parliament! Would they submit to this? Was it decent for Parliament to enter into any sort of compromise with this congress? Were the members of that House free in their deliberations while this military congress was sitting? No: it was necessary they should say to the volunteers—'You have obtained a constitution and commerce; and now, instead of dictating to the legislature of the kingdom, go to your own homes, change your attire, and turn your swords, no longer needed for the defence of your country, into ploughshares and pruning-hooks.' This speech, seconded by the efforts of Mr. Pelham, Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant, and other zealous friends of government, was decisive; and notwithstanding the exertions of Mr. Flood and Mr. Grattan, the motion was negatived, by 157 against 77. It was then moved by Mr. Yelverton, "that it was now necessary to declare that this House would support the rights and privileges of Parliament against all encroachments." This resolution was carried by a large majority; as was an address to the King, expressive of the sense felt by the House of the blessings they enjoyed under his auspices, and assuring him that they were determined to support inviolate the present constitution with their lives and fortunes. In this address the Lords concurred; but a protest, signed by the Earl of Charlemont and four other Peers, was entered against it in the journals of the House. Mr. Flood reported to the national convention, at their sitting of the 1st of December, the conduct of the House of Commons; when they merely passed a resolution, "that they would carry on individually such investigations as might be necessary to complete the plan of Parliamentary Reform." Their humiliation was still more apparent in the address voted on the following day to the King, on the motion of Mr. Flood, in the name of the delegates of all the volunteers of Ireland, "expressive of their duty and loyalty, claiming the merits of their past exertions, and imploring the King that their humble wish to have certain manifest perversions of the Parliamentary representation of that kingdom remedied by the legislature in some reasonable degree might not be attributed to any spirit of innovation, but to a sober and laudable desire to uphold the constitution, to confirm the satisfaction of their fellow subjects, and to perpetuate the cordial union of both kingdoms." The convention then adjourned sine die. The Parliament of Ireland adjourned for the Christmas recess, on the 22d of December, 1783. Previously to their re-assembling, Mr. Pitt had taken the helm of government; and the Duke of Rutland had superseded the Earl of Nottingham in the viceroyalty of Ireland. On the 13th of March following, Mr. Flood, renewed his motion, for Parliamentary Reform. The new Attorney-General, Mr. Fitzgibbon opposed the motion with great zeal; but he allowed that, as it now came before the House in a regular and constitutional form, supported by numerous petitions from different parts of the kingdom, it was entitled to respect and attention. The motion was rejected by 159 against 85 voices. This decision gave secret satisfaction to those friends of reform who dreaded the emancipation of the Catholics still more than the present system. The Ulster volunteers presented on a subsequent occasion an address to their general, the Earl of Charlemont, expressing "their satisfaction at the decay of those prejudices which had so long involved the nation in feud and disunion, which, by limiting the rights of suffrage, and circumscribing the number of their citizens, had, in a great degree, created and fostered aristocratic tyranny, the source of every grievance, and against which the public voice now unanimously exclaimed." The Earl of Charlemont, in answer, profesed himself "free from every illiberal prejudice against the Catholics, but he could not refrain from the most ardent entreaties to the volunteers to desist from a pursuit that would fatally clog and impede the prosecution of their favourite purpose; and besought them not to indulge any opinion which must and would create disunion." This answer being circulated throughout the kingdom, heightened that disunion which it professed to deprecate; and the object itself seemed relinquished in despair.

The people of Ireland now loudly called for protecting duties, to foster the infant manufactures of that country, and to compel the inhabitants to consume the produce of native ingenuity and industry. On the 31st of March (1784) Mr. Gardiner, member for the county of Dublin, in an able speech, depicted the distresses of the kingdom; traced the cause; called upon the House to copy the conduct of England, of France, and other commercial countries, by protecting their manufactures at home; and moved for a high duty on woollens imported into the kingdom. This motion was negatived by a large majority; the whole system of protecting duties being ridiculed as visionary, and pernicious. The disappointment of the people now kindled into rage, and the short-lived popularity of the new viceroy, was, in the course of a month, entirely at an end.

So critical was the state of the Irish metropolis at this period, that it was thought necessary to countermand the embarkation of several regiments destined to the East Indies, and to furnish the garrison of Dublin, consisting of about 4000 regular troops, with thirty rounds of powder and ball per man. Before the end of the session an address was unanimously voted by the House of Commons to the Sovereign, representing the distressed state of the kingdom, and praying for the establishment of a more advantageous system of commerce between Ireland and great Britain; and on the 14th of May, the Parliament was prorogued. The last measure of the Parliament seemed, in some measure

On the 24th of January, 1785, the next session was opened by a speech, in which the King recommended to the two Houses of Parliament, "To apply their earnest attention to the adjustment of such points in the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and Ireland as were not yet finally arranged." The Westminster scrutiny,* and Mr. Pitt's final plan of Parliamentary Reform, were the first subjects of importance which attracted the attention of the House of Commons.† Those points having been disposed of, Mr. Pitt brought in three several bills, for the better auditing and examining the public accounts, and for the regulation and reform of the public offices, which passed with great applause, and no material opposition. The remaining part of the floating arrear of debt, consisting of navy bills and ordnance debentures, was now funded on five per cent. stock; and the interest amounting to above 400,000*l.* per annum, was provided by fresh taxes; one of which, a tax on retail shops, calculated at 120,000*l.* per annum, proved particularly obnoxious. By way of compensation to the shop keeper, Mr. Pitt proposed to revoke and take away the licence from all hawkers and pedlars, whom he styled "a pest to the community, and a nursery and medium for the preservation of illicit trade." Mr. Fox, and others, powerfully pleaded in behalf of this friendless and unprotected description of men; and, in the sequel, the prohibition was changed to a heavy duty.

The next subject which engaged the attention of Parliament was the projected plan of commercial intercourse with Ireland. In the opening of this business, Mr. Pitt submitted some excellent observations on "the species of policy which had been long exercised by the English government in regard to Ireland, the object of which was, to debar her from the enjoyment and use of her own resources, and to make her completely subservient to the interest and opulence of this country. Some relaxation of this system had taken place indeed at an measure, to calm the violence of the people. On the 7th of June an extraordinary meeting of the aggregate body of the citizens of Dublin was convened by the sheriffs, in which they came to resolutions declaratory of "The clear, original, and imprescriptible right of the people of Ireland to a frequent election, and an equal representation. They called upon the nation to unite with them in the measures necessary to its introduction, and in presenting petitions to the King for a dissolution of the existing Parliament. They asserted, that the force of the state consisted in the union of the inhabitants—that an equal participation in all the rights of a man and a citizen was proper henceforth, to engage all the members of the state to co-operate efficaciously for the greatest general good. Finally, that it would be of the happiest consequence to the prosperity of the state, and the maintaining of civil liberty, to extend to their brethren, the Roman Catholics, the right of suffrage, as fully as was compatible with the maintenance of the Protestant government." In an address to the people of Ireland, they proposed the election of five delegates from each county, city, and considerable town, to meet in Dublin, October 25th next ensuing, in National Congress. On the 9th of August, resolutions nearly similar were agreed to at the general meeting of the freeholders of the county of Dublin; and a petition was also voted by them to the King for a dissolution of the present Parliament. When application was made to the Lord-Lieutenant to transmit these petitions to England, his Grace immediately "declared it to be his duty so to do; but, at the same time he informed them that he should not fail to accompany them with his entire disapprobation, as they included unjust and indecent reflections upon the laws and the Parliament of Ireland, and as they tended to foment fatal dissensions among the people." Conscious of its strength, the government of Ireland did not long content itself with a cold expression of disapprobation. The 20th of September having been fixed upon as the day for electing five delegates to represent the city of Dublin in National Congress, a short time previously to the intended meeting, Mr. Fitzgibbon, the Attorney-General, wrote a letter to the sheriffs, expressing his astonishment at having read a public summons signed by them for this purpose—and declaring them responsible for such outrageous breach of their duty to the laws of their country, and signifying his resolution to proceed officially against them." The sheriffs, alarmed at this menace, refused to take any part in the business. Five delegates were, however, chosen, and a resolution passed, declaring the conduct of the Attorney-General to be a violation of Magna Charta. The Attorney-General, holding this resolution in contempt, filed informations against the high-sheriffs of various counties for convening and presiding at similar meetings. The National Congress, however, met on the 25th of October. After a session of three days only, finding their numbers on the return very incomplete, they adjourned to the 20th of January, 1785; having previously passed several resolutions, importing, that the appointment of that assembly, and the steps that had been taken, were in entire conformity with the constitution of Ireland. On the same day commenced the second session of the Parliament of Ireland; and in a short time Mr. Orde, secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant, laid before the House, a series of commercial regulations, digested, during the recess, into a regular system. There were two plans, on which a permanent arrangement might be formed on the basis of equality:

I. A system of mutual prohibition.

II. A system of mutual admission.

The propositions, eleven in number, moved by Mr. Orde, were framed in conformity to the latter, and, unquestionably, the wiser, of these opposite systems. Much violent discussion ensued; but, ultimately, the propositions were joyfully received, and ratified by a decisive majority of the House.

Mr. Flood, (May 12,) presented, once more, his bill for effecting a reform in the representation, somewhat varied from that of the last year; but it was negatived, by 112 against 60.

* During a period of eight months, two parishes only had been scrutinized—the result was, that 105 votes had been struck off the poll of Mr. Fox, and 87 from that of Sir Cecil Wray, the examination of which was not yet closed. Fifteen parishes remained for investigation; and the High Bailiff had no power to summon witnesses, to impose an oath, or to commit for contumacy. Mr. Pitt maintained, however, "that the expediency of the scrutiny was amply justified by the experiment." Mr. Fox replied, "that he well remembered the day when he congratulated the House on the acquisition of Mr. Pitt's splendid abilities; it had been his pride to fight, in conjunction with him, the battles of the constitution; he had been ever ready to recognize in the right honourable gentleman a formidable rival, who would leave him far behind in the pursuit of glory—but he had never expected that this rival would become his persecutor. He thought he had possessed an elevation of mind wholly incompatiable with so low and grovelling a passion. He considered the present measure, with regard to Westminster, as a succedaneum to expulsion. The case of the Middlesex election, so much reprobated, had, at least, the merit of being more manly; for the procedure now adopted accomplished the same end of expulsion, without daring to exhibit any charge against the person expelled." The motion of Mr. Welbore Ellis, "that the High Bailiff do attend at the bar of this House," was at length negatived, (February 9,) by 174 against 185 voices; a similar motion, soon after made by Colonel Fitzpatrick, was negatived by a majority of nine voices only; and on the 3d of March, being a third time repeated by Mr. Alderman Sawbridge, it was carried in the affirmative, by 163 against 124; leaving the minister in a minority. Mr. Fox then took his seat as member for Westminster.

† This was on the 18th of April. Mr. Pitt rose, he said, "With hopes infinitely more sanguine than he had ventured to entertain at any former period. There never was a moment when the minds of men were more enlightened on this interesting topic, or more prepared for its discussion. He declared his present plan of Reform to be perfectly coincident with the spirit of those changes which had taken place in the exercise of the elective franchise from the earliest ages, and not in the least allied to the spirit of innovation. So far back as the reign of Edward I. before which the component orders of the representative body could not be distinctly traced, the franchise of election had been constantly fluctuating. As one borough decayed and another flourished, the first was abolished and the second invested with the right. Even the representation of the counties had not been uniform. King James I. in his first proclamation for calling a Parliament, directed that the sheriffs should not call upon such decayed and ruined boroughs to send members to that Parliament. For this discretion, as vested in the crown, he was certainly no advocate; but he wished to establish a permanent rule to operate like the discretion out of which the constitution had sprung—that the principle on which it was founded should be rescued from the accident and caprice in which it was unhappily involved. He wished to bring forward a plan that should be complete, gradual, and permanent—a plan that not only corrected the inequalities of the present system, but which would be competent to preserve the purity it restored, and give to the constitution not only consistency, but, if possible, immortality. Without a Parliamentary Reform the nation will be plunged into new wars; without a Parliamentary Reform you cannot be safe against bad ministers, nor can even good ministers be of use to you." Mr. Pitt intended, that the actual number of the House of Commons should be preserved inviolate; that a certain number of the decayed and rotten boroughs should be selected, the right of representation attached to thirty-six of which should be transferred to the counties, in such proportions as the wisdom of Parliament might prescribe; that all unnecessary harshness might be avoided, a fund of one million should be applied to the purchasing the franchise of such boroughs, on their voluntary application to Parliament; after which, he proposed to extend the bill to the purchasing the franchise of other boroughs, besides the original thirty-six; and to transfer the right of returning members to large towns, hitherto unrepresented, upon their petitioning Parliament to be indulged with this privilege. It was also his wish to admit copyholders to an equality with freeholders, and to extend the franchise in populous towns, where the electors were few, to the inhabitants in general. This plan would give one hundred members to the popular interest in the kingdom, and extend the right of election to one hundred thousand persons, who, by the existing provisions of the law, were excluded from it. Mr. Fox remarked, "that government was not a property, but a trust," and he strongly objected to the idea of purchasing franchises of boroughs which from their insignificance were no longer entitled to send members to Parliament. He, however, bestowed upon the plan of the minister a just and liberal tribute of praise. On the other hand, it was ridiculed by Mr. Powys, as "the mere knight-errantry of a political Quixote; as an example, a precedent, an incitement, to the wildest and most paradoxical nostrums that speculative theorists could devise." At length, after a long debate, Mr. Pitt's motion was rejected by 248 against 174.

early period of the present century; more had been done in the reign of King George II. but it was not till within a very few years that the system had been completely revised. Still, however, the future intercourse between the two kingdoms remained for legislative wisdom to arrange; and the propositions moved by Mr. Orde in the Irish Parliament, and ratified by that assembly, held out (he said) a system liberal, beneficial, and permanent. If the question should be asked, whether, under the accumulation of our heavy taxes, it would be wise to equalize the duties, and to enable a country free from those taxes to meet us in their own market and in ours, he would answer, that Ireland, with an independent legislature, would no longer submit to be treated with as an inferior. A great and generous effort was to be made by this country, and we were to choose between inevitable alternatives. Our manufactures, however, were so decidedly superior to theirs, that the immunities proposed would be in fact, and for many years to come, productive of little alteration. It would require time for the acquisition of both capital and skill; and as these increased, the difference between the price of labour there and in this country would be incessantly diminishing. After all, there might, he admitted, be some branches of manufacture in which Ireland might rival and perhaps excel England. But this ought not to give us pain. We must calculate from general and not from partial views. Above all, we should learn not to regard Ireland with an eye of jealousy. It required little philosophy to reconcile us to a competition which would give us a rich customer instead of a poor one. The prosperity of the sister kingdom would be a fresh and inexhaustible source of opulence to us." For a considerable time, the vastness of the plan, and of the objects which it embraced, seemed to keep the public mind in a kind of suspence; and for nearly a month after its first introduction there were no indications discernible of serious or determined opposition. Mr. Fox, however, censured the precipitancy with which this business was urged, and contended for the necessity of calling the merchants and manufacturers to the bar of the House, in order that the House might be fully informed in a case of this momentous nature, before they should proceed to vote a definitive resolution. Accordingly, on the 14th of March, Mr. Eden moved, that the commissioners of customs and excise should be examined at the bar of the House; which was carried in the affirmative. On the same day, a petition was presented by Mr. Stanley, member for Lancashire, from the manufacturers of that county, praying to be heard by counsel against the bill. Petitions were also presented from Liverpool, Glasgow, Manchester, and every quarter of the kingdom; and, at the end of a long and tedious investigation, Mr. Pitt was compelled to acknowledge the necessity of making some material alterations and amendments in his original plan. On the 12th of May, he brought forward a series of propositions, so altered, as to exhibit what might well be considered a new system. Mr. Fox affected to hold the language of triumph on the occasion. The respective resolutions were carried, after a warm contest; and on the 30th of May they were sent up to the Lords, where they again underwent a long and laborious investigation; in the course of which various amendments were made. The resolutions were sent back to the Commons on the 19th of July; after much debate, the amendments were agreed to; and on the 28th of July an address was presented to the King, acquainting his Majesty with the steps which had been taken in this affair. The two Houses now adjourned to a distant day; and on the 30th of September, the Parliament was prorogued by proclamation.

The propositions having been transmitted to Ireland, Mr. Orde, (August 12) moved for leave to bring in a bill for establishing the system of commercial intercourse therein contained. He defended the variations which now appeared, by alledging the natural progress of a measure of this nature. On a comparison of the two sets of propositions, however, the magnitude and importance of the alterations strikingly appeared; and the fourth resolution in particular, by which England assumed a power of legislative regulation and commercial control with respect to Ireland, was rejected with a kind of horror. After much violent debate, the Secretary, to preclude a motion of censure framed by Mr. Flood, moved an adjournment; and Mr. Flood consenting to wave his motion, the adjournment was carried without a division; and public illuminations testified the joy excited by the sudden termination of this affair.

The English Parliament met on the 24th of January, 1786. The King declared to the House of Commons his "earnest wish to enforce economy in every department; recommended to them the maintenance of our naval strength on the most respectable footing; and above all the establishment of a fixed plan for the reduction of the national debt." Nothing important passed until the middle of February, when the estimate of the ordnance was brought up in the Committee of Supply. Mr. Pitt then called the attention of the House to the plan laid before them in the course of the last session, under the sanction of the Duke of Richmond, Master-General of the Ordnance, for fortifying the Dock-yards of the kingdom; the propriety of which it was then agreed to refer to a board of land and sea officers, whose report Mr. Pitt stated to be in the highest degree favourable to the plan of fortification submitted to their decision; but the report itself he declined, as a matter of too serious and delicate a nature, to lay before the House. After a considerable opposition, and delay, he moved a resolution, "That it appeared to the House, that to provide effectually for securing the dock-yards of Portsmouth and Plymouth by a permanent system of fortification was an essential object for the safety of the state, &c. &c." A very warm debate arose, in the course of which Mr. Sheridan, a gentleman who had been some time gradually rising in Parliamentary reputation, particularly distinguished himself. The division was rendered memorable by an exact equality of numbers, both the ayes and the noes amounting to 169. The Speaker, being obliged to give his casting vote, added his negative to those who had voted for the rejection of this system. Mr. Pitt, notwithstanding this defeat, after an interval of a few weeks, brought forward the question again, in a new form, by moving, "That an estimate of the expense of such part of the plan of fortification recommended in the late report, as might appear most necessary to be carried into immediate execution, be referred to a Committee of Supply"—the probable expense of which was estimated at only 400,000*l.*! This was received with extreme disapprobation; and Mr. Pitt at length withdrew the motion.

In the month of March, Mr. Pitt moved for the appointment of a select committee, by ballot, to report to the House the state of the public revenue and expenditure. The result of their inquiry was eminently satisfactory. "The amount of the revenue for the current year was estimated at 15,397,000*l.*—the permanent expenditure, including the civil list and the interests payable on the different funds amounted to 10,554,000*l.*—the peace establishment, allowing 18,000 men for the navy, and the usual complement of 70 regiments for the army, exclusive of life-guards and cavalry, was estimated at 3,924,000*l.*—in all, 14,478,000*l.*; in consequence there remained a surplus of more than 900,000*l.* Mr. Pitt observed, though this was stated to be the annual expenditure, a considerable interval must elapse before this reduction could take place; this term he fixed at four years. The exceedings of the army, navy, and ordnance, together with the sums necessary for the indemnification of the American loyalists, he calculated would not, during this period, fall short of three millions. The war from which we were just delivered had been most expensive and ruinous; these unavoidable exceedings were amongst the bitter fruits of it; but if during the first years of peace extraordinary expense were incurred, they afforded also extraordinary savings. There were sums appropriated during the war to different services, vices, which had been expended; 450,000*l.* had already been paid into the Exchequer upon this account. There were, moreover, immense sums in the hands of former paymasters, which, it was expected, would soon be brought to account; these he conjecturally stated at the sum of one million. There was a balance of 600,000*l.* due to the government from the East India Company. When to these were added the improvements that might yet be made by judicious regulations in the different branches of the revenue, he was not, he hoped, too sanguine in affirming that we possessed resources equal to all our ordinary and extraordinary demands. The proposition which he now submitted to the House was, the appropriation of the annual sum of one million to be invariably applied to the liquidation of the public debt." The surplus of the revenue amounting to the sum of 900,000*l.* only, Mr. Pitt moved for an additional duty on spirits, on certain kinds of timber imported, and on perfumery, which would together be more than sufficient to make up the deficiency. "This annual million Mr. Pitt proposed to vest in the hands of certain commissioners, to be by them applied regularly to the purchase of stock; so that no sum should ever be within the grasp of any future minister large enough to tempt him to violate this sacred deposit. The interests annually discharged were, conformably to this plan, to be added to and incorporated with the original fund, so that it would operate with a determinate and accelerated velocity; being, in this respect, framed upon the model of the sinking fund formerly projected by Sir Robert Walpole. This fund was also to be assisted by the annuities granted for different terms, which would from time to time fall in within the limited period of twenty-eight years, at the expiration of which Mr. Pitt calculated that the fund would produce an income of four millions per annum. When a progress so considerable was made in the reduction of the debt, Parliament might with propriety pause, and adopt such new measures for the relief of the nation, and the extinction of the most oppressive and burdensome taxes, as to the legislative wisdom should seem meet. The commissioners to be nominated under the act were, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Master of the Rolls, the Governor and Deputy-governor of the Bank of England, and the Accomptant-general of the high court of Chancery. Such were the persons, Mr. Pitt said, whom he should propose to be appointed to this trust. This plan had long been the wish and the hope of all good men, and he felt inexpressible pleasure in being able to flatter himself that his name might be inscribed on that firm column, which was now about to be raised to national faith and national prosperity." In the progress of the bill, Mr. Fox suggested, "that whenever a new loan should hereafter be made, the commissioners should be empowered to accept the loan, or such proportion of it, as should be equal to the cash then in their hands; the interest and douceur annexed to which should be applied to the purposes of the sinking fund." This amendment, the only one of consequence offered, was well received by Mr. Pitt, who declared it to be "an auspicious omen of the ultimate success of the plan, that its propriety and necessity had been so obvious, as to overcome the spirit and prejudice of party, and create an unanimity of sentiment in persons who more, he was sure, from accident than inclination, were so frequently of different opinions." The bill finally passed with great and deserved approbation. Previously to that event, however, a message from the King to the House of Commons was delivered, stating, "that it gave him great concern to inform them, that it had not been found possible to confine the expences of the civil list within the annual sum, eight hundred and fifty thousand pounds, now applicable to that purpose. A farther debt had been necessarily incurred, and the King relied on the zeal and affection of his Parliament to make provision for its discharge." The money was ultimately voted; but not without considerable opposition.

Various petitions were presented in the course of the session for the repeal of the tax upon retail shops; and a motion was made by Sir Watkin Lewes, for that purpose, without effect, though the impost was somewhat mitigated by a reduction of the rates. An attempt was also made by Mr. Pulteney, to explain and amend the act of the last session, relative to hawkers and pedlars; particularly to repeal an oppressive clause, by which justices of the peace were empowered to imprison any person of this profession at their discretion. This was rejected, however, by a considerable majority. A bill for transferring part of the duties on foreign wines from the customs to the excise, (the duty having fallen off, Mr. Pitt stated, by the sum of two hundred and eighty thousand pounds, from what it had been in the middle of the century) was passed with general approbation; the terrible alarm, excited by Sir Robert Walpole's memorable attempt to extend the laws of excise, fifty years ago, having been, apparently forgotten.

The affairs of India next occupied the chief attention of Parliament. A bill was brought in by Mr. Dundas, which with some opposition passed into a law, to explain and amend the act of 1784.* Soon after this Mr. Pitt, stating certain exigencies arising from the peculiar situation of the East India Company, moved that they be empowered to raise the sum of two millions for the necessary increase of their capital. This also passed with little difficulty.

In the month of June, 1785, Mr. Hastings, late governor of Bengal, had arrived in England. The session being then far advanced, Mr. Burke gave notice of his intention to move, early in the next session, for a Parliamentary investigation into his conduct. When Parliament met after the summer recess, Major Scott, who had constantly distinguished himself as the friend and advocate of Mr. Hastings, challenged Mr. Burke, in pressing terms, to come to an immediate decision. Mr. Burke replied, "that he should imitate the conduct of the Duke of Parma, who came from the Low Countries to relieve the city of Paris, then besieged by King Henry IV. The King, impatient and full of ardour, urged the Duke to instant battle; but that experienced and celebrated commander replied, that he had not travelled so far to learn from his enemy the time when it was most proper to engage." On the 17th of February, however, (1786) Mr. Burke, desiring that the resolutions of May 28, 1782, might be read (resolutions moved by Mr. Dundas, as chairman of the Select Committee, declaratory of the culpability of Mr. Hastings, and the consequent necessity of his recall) expressed his "deep regret, that the solemn and important business of that day had not been brought forward in the plenitude of weight and efficiency, by the original mover of the resolutions now recited. There were various modes of proceeding which might be adopted. The first was a direction to the Attorney-General to prosecute; but independently of the apparent disinclination of Mr. Arden, the present Attorney-General, to exert his powers in this cause, he did not conceive that a trial by jury was well calculated for the purpose of obtaining justice against so elevated an offender. The second mode of prosecution was that by bill of pains and penalties. To this he had insuperable objections, as radically unjust, and as tarnishing, in no slight degree, the character of that House, the members of which would thus preposterously appear in the two-fold capacity of accusers and judges. The only alternative which remained was the ancient constitutional mode of proceeding by impeachment: as a necessary preparative to which, he concluded with moving for the papers necessary to substantiate the charge which he had now in immediate contemplation to bring forward against the late Governor-General Hastings." Mr. Dundas affirmed, "that though he had thought it expedient in the year 1782 to recall Mr. Hastings from India, he now rejoiced that the resolutions moved by him had not taken effect. Since that period Mr. Hastings had rendered most essential services to the Company, and he should have extremely regretted to have been the means of depriving the Company of a servant so distinguished by his zeal and capacity. He had certainly moved a vote of censure on Mr. Hastings; but Mr. Hastings had since received the thanks of the Court of Directors, in which had he been a director, he would most willingly have concurred, from a thorough conviction that the thanks were merited." Some difficulties were suggested by Mr. Pitt, respecting the production of the papers called for; but, ultimately, they were granted, with only a few exceptions; and on the 4th of April, Mr. Burke solemnly charged Warren Hastings, Esq. late Governor-General of Bengal, with high crimes and misdemeanors in the execution of his office, exhibiting at the same time nine distinct articles of accusation, which in a few weeks were increased to the number of twenty-two. On the 1st of May, Mr. Hastings, at his own desire, and by the indulgence of the House, was heard in his own defence; and the minutes of his defence were ordered to lie on the table. The House then proceeded in the examination of evidence. The first article of the impeachment respecting the Rohilla war was brought before the House on the 1st of June; and after a very long debate, the question was decided in favour of Mr. Hastings, by 119 against 67. On the 13th of June, the second charge, relative to the Rajah of Benares, being brought forward, it was resolved by the House, on a division of 119 to 79 voices, "that this charge contained matter of impeachment against the late Governor-General of Bengal." On the 11th of July, an end was put to these proceedings for the present by a prorogation of the Parliament.*

* This bill bestowed upon the Governor-General of India the high prerogative of deciding in opposition to the sense of the majority of the council. The offices of Commander in-Chief and Governor-General were in future united in the same person; and Earl Cornwallis, who had borne so conspicuous a part in the American war, and whose character stood high in the public estimation, was nominated to fill this important commission.

In September, his Majesty appointed a new committee of Council, for the consideration of all matters relating to trade and foreign plantations. Of this board Mr. Charles Jenkinson, now created Lord Hawkesbury, and constituted Chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, was declared President. Under the auspices of this Board, a treaty of commerce was signed between England and France (September 26) on the basis of equality and reciprocity. The general principle was to admit the mutual importation and exportation of the commodities of each country at a very low ad valorem duty. The negociator of this treaty was Mr. Eden, who was afterwards raised to the Peerage, under the title of Baron Auckland, subsequently appointed ambassador to Holland.† About the same time a convention was signed with Spain, which finally terminated the long subsisting disputes respecting the settlements of the English nation on the Mosquito shore and the coast of Honduras.

The first object of debate which presented itself, on the meeting of Parliament (January 23, 1787) was the commercial treaty with France; on which, though it met with some opposition, an address of approbation to his Majesty was voted. Another very beneficial measure, though of inferior importance, was brought forward by Mr. Pitt for the consolidation of the customs, by the total abolition of all the existing confused and complex duties, and substituting in their stead a single duty on each article, amounting as nearly as possible to the aggregate of the various subsidies now paid; taking universally, instead of a fraction, the nearest integral number above it. By this means the revenue was considerably benefited, and the merchant relieved from a serious inconvenience. A regulation of finance, less generally approved, was also proposed, relative to the tax on post-horses, which Mr. Pitt affirmed to have been most grossly and scandalously evaded. Agreeably to his proposition, the tax has ever since been farmed by auction to the highest bidder, on the usual plan of the turnpike duty.

Mr. Fox some time afterwards moved for the repeal of the Shop Tax;‡ but the motion was negatived, by 183 against 147. Another unsuccessful motion, was that of Mr. Beaufoy, for amending, and in part repealing, the Corporation and Test Act; which, after a long discussion, was negatived by 178 against 100.

When the Prince of Wales came of age (1783) the sum of 50,000*l.* per annum, only, was allotted to him out of the civil-list revenue to defray the entire expense of his establishment. Considering the numerous salaries payable to the officers of his household, this sum was inadequate to the support of his rank and situation in life; and the then ministers (Mr. Fox and Lord North) strongly insisted upon the necessity of fixing his Royal Highness's revenue at 100,000*l.* per annum, which the late King had enjoyed as Prince of Wales, when the civil list produced 200,000*l.* per annum less than at present. To this the King positively objected; and the Prince, to prevent disagreeable consequences, declared, that he chose to depend upon the spontaneous bounty of the King. The result of this economy was, that the Prince, in the four years which had since elapsed, had contracted debts to a large amount. A report of a very serious nature had also gained general credit; viz. that the Prince had contracted a secret marriage with a lady (Mrs. Fitzherbert) of the Roman Catholic religion. Such a marriage, it is true, in whatever mode it was solemnized, could not, by the Royal Marriage Act, be regarded as legal; in addition to which, by a clause in the Act of Settlement, should the legality of the marriage be affirmed, the Prince, by marrying a papist, would, ipse facto, forfeit his right of succession to the crown. His situation, therefore, was, in the highest degree, critical. Finding his embarrassments continually increasing, the Prince, in the summer of the last year, applied to the King for assistance: but meeting with a refusal, he adopted the resolution of suppressing the establishment of his household, and he formally vested 40,000*l.* per annum of his revenue in the hands of trustees for the liquidation of his debts. His race horses, his hunters, and even his coach horses, were sold by public auction; and the elegant improvements and additions making to Carlton House, were suddenly stopped, and the most splendid apartments shut up. Things had remained in this state nearly a twelvemonth, when the Prince was persuaded to give his assent to a proposal for laying the state of his affairs before Parliament; and on the 20th of April, in the present year, Mr. Alderman Newnham, member for the city of London, gave notice that he would bring forward a motion for an address to the King, praying him to take the situation of the Prince into consideration, and to grant him such relief as he in his wisdom should think fit, and pledging the House to make good the same. This occasioned an interesting conversation; and Mr. Newnham was earnestly entreated to withdraw his motion, as

* Shortly after the rising of Parliament, as the King was alighting from his post-chariot at the garden entrance of St. James's Palace, (August the 2d) a woman decently dressed presented a paper to his Majesty; and while he was in the act of receiving it, she struck with a concealed knife at his breast. The King fortunately avoided the blow by drawing back; and as she was preparing to make a second thrust, one of the yeomen caught her arm, and the weapon was wrenched out of her hand. On examination before the privy council, it immediately appeared that the woman was insane. When asked, where she had lately resided, she answered "that she had been all abroad since the matter of the crown broke out." On being further questioned, as to what matter? she said, "that the crown was hers; and that if she had not her right, England would be deluged in blood for a thousand generations." When interrogated as to the nature of her right, she refused to answer, saying, "that her rights were a mystery." It appeared that this poor woman, whose name was Margaret Nicholson, had presented a petition ten days before, full of wild and incoherent nonsense. It had probably never been read, or the person of the petitioner would have been secured. The idea of prosecution was of course abandoned, and the maniac was sent to Bethlem Hospital. The Lord Mayor, Alderman, Sheriffs, and Common-Council of the city of London, went some days after in procession to St. James's to present an address to his Majesty on his happy escape; an example which was followed by nearly all the corporate bodies throughout the kingdom.

† On the 31st of October, died the Princess Amelia, last survivor of the issue of King George II. at the advanced age of 75 years. Her immense riches she devised to the Landgrave of Hesse, the nearest in blood of her German relations.

‡ It appeared, that the city of London and its environs paid forty-three shares in fifty-nine of this duty, the whole produce being estimated at only fifty-nine thousand pounds.

fertile of inconvenience and mischief. Mr. Pitt observed, "that by the perseverance of Mr. Newnham he should be driven to the disclosures of circumstances which he should otherwise have thought it his duty to conceal." Mr. Rolle averred, "that the investigation of this question involved in it circumstances which tended immediately to affect the constitution in church and state." Mr. Fox, and Mr. Sheridan, and other gentlemen in the confidence of the Prince, declared that "there was nothing which the Prince of Wales less feared than a full and impartial investigation of his conduct; and nothing that his Royal Highness would more deprecate than a studied ambiguity, or affected tenderness, on the pretence of respect or indulgence." Mr. Rolle was called upon, though in vain, to explain the extraordinary language he had used. A few days afterwards Mr. Fox again called the attention of the House to the declaration of Mr. Rolle. "To what that declaration alluded," Mr. Fox said, "it was impossible to ascertain, till the person who made it thought proper to explain his meaning: but he supposed it must refer to that base and malicious calumny which had been propagated without doors by the enemies of the Prince, with a view to depreciate his character, and injure him in the esteem of his country." Mr. Fox further declared, "that the Prince had authorised him to assert, that, as a Peer of Parliament, he was ready in the other House to submit to any of the most pointed questions that could be put to him upon the subject, or to afford the King or his ministers the fullest assurance of the utter falsehood of the fact in question." Mr. Rolle now thought proper to acknowledge that the subject upon which Mr. Fox had spoken was the matter to which he had alluded, as affecting both church and state. "The reports," he said, "relative to this transaction had made a deep impression upon the minds of all men who loved and venerated the constitution. He knew that this thing could not have been accomplished under the formal sanction of law; but if it existed as a fact, it might be productive of the most alarming consequences, and ought to be satisfactorily cleared up." Mr. Fox replied, "that he did not deny the calumny in question merely with regard to the effect of certain existing laws, but he denied it in toto, in fact as well as in law. The fact not only could never happen legally, but never did happen any way, and had from the beginning been a vile and malignant falsehood." Mr. Rolle asked, "whether, in what he now asserted, Mr. Fox spoke from direct authority?" Mr. Fox said, he had "spoken from direct authority." In consequence of these asseverations, Mr. Rolle was loudly called upon to express his satisfaction; but this he obstinately refused, saying only, "that the House would judge for themselves of what had passed." Mr. Sheridan warmly declared, "that if Mr. Rolle persisted in his refusal, or otherwise to put the matter into such a state of inquiry as should satisfy him, the House ought to come to a resolution, 'that it was seditious and disloyal to propagate reports injurious to the character of the Prince.'" Mr. Pitt here interposed, and protested against so flagrant an attack on the freedom of speech and deliberation in that House.

Subsequently to this discussion, at the desire of the King, an interview took place between the Prince of Wales and Mr. Pitt, at Carlton House; and the Prince was informed, "that if the intended motion were withdrawn, every thing might be settled to his Royal Highness's satisfaction." This being acceded to, a message was delivered from the King to the House, stating his Majesty's great concern, "that from the accounts of the Prince of Wales it had appeared that he had incurred a debt to a very large amount, which, painful as it was to him to propose any addition to the burdens of his people, he was induced, by his paternal affection to the Prince, to desire the assistance of Parliament to discharge—on the well-grounded expectation, nevertheless, of the Prince's avoiding to contract any similar debt in future; with a view to which, the King had directed a sum of 10,000*l.* to be paid out of the civil list, in addition to his former allowance." The next day after the accounts referred to in the royal message were laid before the House, "and of which the dignified generosity of the House suffered not the inspection," an address was voted to the King, to request him to direct the sum of 161,000*l.* to be paid out of the civil list for the full discharge of the debts of the Prince of Wales, and the farther sum of 20,000*l.* to complete the repairs of Carlton House.

Mr. Hastings's impeachment having been resumed, Mr. Sheridan, on the 7th of February, opened the third charge respecting the Begum Princesses of Oude, with an eloquence and energy, which were perhaps never surpassed, and which in their consequences proved entirely decisive;* as, on a division, the numbers were, in favour of the motion 175, against it 68. On the 2d of March Mr. Pelham opened the charge relative to the nabob of Ferruckabad; which was carried, by 112 against 50. On the 10th of March the charge upon the subject of contracts was brought forward by Sir James Erskine; which was carried by 60 against 26. On the 23d of March the charge relative to Fyzoola Khan was brought forward by Mr. Windham; which was carried by 96 against 37. On the 2d of April Mr. Sheridan opened the charge upon the subject of presents; observing, "that the late Governor-General had, in every part of his conduct, exhibited proofs of a wild, eccentric, and irregular mind. He had been every thing by starts, and nothing long—now high and lofty, now mean and insidious—now artful and temporising, now rigid and inflexible—in pride, in passion, in all things changeable, except in corruption. His revenge was a tempest, a tornado blackening the horizon, and involving all within the sphere of its influence in one common destruction. But his corruption was regular and systematic, a monsoon blowing uniformly from one point of the compass, and wafting the wealth of India to the same port in one certain direction." This charge was confirmed by 185 against 54.

On the 19th of the month, the charge respecting the revenues was opened by Mr. Francis, who had formerly occupied the office of member of the supreme council in India, and who had recently taken his seat as a member of the House of Commons.† This charge was also confirmed

* Mr. Sheridan said, "that the conduct of Mr. Hastings respecting the Nabob and Begums of Oude comprehended in it every species of human offence. He had been guilty of rapacity at once violent and insatiable, of treachery cool and premeditated, of oppression unprovoked, of barbarity wanton and unmanly. So long since as 1775, the Begum Princess, widow of Sujah ul Dowla, had written to Mr. Hastings in the following moving terms:—'If it is your pleasure that the mother of the late nabob, that myself, his other women, and his infant children, should be reduced to a state of dishonour and distress, we must submit. But if, on the contrary, you call to mind the friendship of the late blessed nabob, you will exert yourself effectually in favour of us who are helpless.' Inflamed by disappointment at Benares, he hastened to the fortress of Chunar, to put in execution the atrocious design of instigating the nabob, son of this princess, to parricide and plunder. No sooner had Mr. Hastings determined to invade the substance of justice, than he resolved to avail himself of her judicial forms, and dispatched a messenger for the chief justice of India to assist him in perpetrating the violence he had meditated. Without a moment's pause, or the shadow of process instituted, sentence was pronounced. And thus, at the same time that the sword of government was converted to an assassin's dagger, the pure ermine of justice was stained and soiled with the basest contamination. It was clear to demonstration, that the Begums were not concerned in the insurrection of Benares. No, their treasures were their treason. If the mind of Mr. Hastings were susceptible of superstition, he might image the proud spirit of Sujah ul Dowla looking down upon the ruin and devastation of his family; beholding the palace which he had adorned with the spoils of the devoted Rohillas, plundered by his base and perfidious ally; and viewing the man whom on his death bed he had constituted the guardian of his wife, his mother, and his family, forcibly exposing those dear relations, the object of his solemn trust, to the rigour of the merciless seasons, or the violence of the more merciless soldiery.—Such were the awful dispensations of the retributive justice!—It was not given to that House to witness the tremulous joys of the millions whom the vote of that night would save from the cruelty of corrupted power. But the blessings of the people thus delivered would not be dissipated in empty air. No; they would lift up their prayers to Heaven, in gratitude to the power, which, by stretching its mighty arm across the deep, had saved them from ruin and destruction."

† Mr. Francis enumerated the different modes of managing the revenues of Bengal, adopted by Mr. Hastings in the course of thirteen confirmed, by 71 against 55. On the 9th of May the report made by Mr. Burke from the committee, to whom it had been referred to prepare the articles of impeachment, was confirmed by the House; and, on the following day, it was voted that Mr. Hastings be impeached. Mr. Burke accordingly, "in the name of the House of Commons, and of all the Commons of Great Britain," repaired to the bar of the House of Lords, and impeached Mr. Hastings of high crimes and misdemeanors—at the same time acquainting their Lordships, that the Commons would, with all convenient speed, exhibit articles against him, and make good the same. On the 14th of May, another charge respecting misdemeanors in Oude was added to the former by Mr. Burke, and voted without a division. On the same day the articles actually prepared were sent to the Lords; and on the 21st, Mr. Hastings, being conducted to the bar of that House by the serjeant at arms, was taken into the custody of the black rod, but, on the motion of the Lord Chancellor was admitted to bail—himself in 20,000*l.* and two sureties, Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Sumner in 10,000*l.* each: and he was ordered to deliver in an answer to the articles of impeachment in one month from that time, or upon the second day of the next session of Parliament.

The session was closed on the 30th of May, when the King delivered a speech, commending "the measures taken by Parliament respecting the reduction of the national debt, and the treaty of navigation and commerce with the most Christian King. He spoke of the general tranquillity of Europe, and lamented the dissensions which unhappily prevailed amongst the States of the United Provinces."*

Parliament assembled on the 27th of November; when years. At the time of his accession to the government, the provinces had not perfectly recovered the effects of the dreadful famine which had taken place in Bengal at a very recent period; yet then did the committee of circuit, under the sanction of Mr. Hastings, raise the rents of the zemindaries to an unheard-of standard; and by the ensuing project of 1781, the whole landed property of the country was put up to a pretended auction; the proprietors were universally deprived of their estates; and banyans, cheats, and adventurers of all sorts, put into possession of their lands. Under this settlement, Cantoo Baboo, Mr. Hastings's banyan, held farms to the amount of 135,000*l.* per annum. The directors had ordered the persons composing the committee of circuit to be prosecuted, but Mr. Hastings had ordered the prosecution to be withdrawn. A committee of revenue was subsequently introduced, under the influence of Gunga Govid Sing, a notorious and adroit villain, which completed the ruin of the country. When Mr. Hastings came into possession of the Bengal government, he found it a fertile, populous, and prosperous country; it contained a regular gradation of ranks, like a pyramid, from a well ordered yeomanry to sovereign Princes: but these distinctions have been broken down—the whole nation has been pounded as it were by the oppression of the government into one mass—and the Prince was no otherwise discoverable from the peasant than by the superiority of his sufferings, and the more pungent bitterness of his humiliations." Mr. Francis concluded in these words:—"My particular labour is now at an end. An unremitting perseverance of thirteen years has at last conducted me to that issue which has been the object of all my efforts. Mr. Hastings must now be impeached—let him have a fair trial—I desire no more. In arriving at that object, I have secured every possible personal purpose that I ever had in view; the reputation of Sir John Clavering, Colonel Monson, and myself, is secure; your votes are my authority; the House of Commons are my compurgators. The only victory I ever aimed at was to clear my character from foul aspersion, and to establish, as I trust I have done, the integrity of my conduct in the estimation of my country."

* During the late war, the finances of France had been entrusted to the management of M. Neckar, a Genevan Protestant, a man of strict probity, but apparently destitute of those comprehensive views which distinguish the enlightened statesman. He conceived the romantic plan of raising the loans necessary for the service of the war upon the credit of funds to be created by economical savings in the public expenditure. The revenue of France was immense, equal, perhaps, to twenty-five millions sterling; but the civil, military, and naval establishments of that vast kingdom were also upon a vast scale. At the era of peace, however, M. Neckar was compelled to resign, and was succeeded by M. de Calonne, a man of great talents, but, who, immersed in dissipation, and intrigue, and neither able nor solicitous to reform the abuses of the government, proposed to supply the deficiency in the revenue in the usual way, by new and heavy imposts. The known derangement of the French finances, and the consequent indisposition of the court to involve itself in hostilities, probably emboldened the Emperor to venture upon measures which the most powerful of his predecessors would have regarded as presumptuous. Availing himself of the animosity subsisting between the maritime powers, he had during the late war formally cancelled the barrier treaty originally concluded with the guarantee of England, and had dismissed the Dutch garrisons from the frontier towns of the Low Countries. In the expectation of permanent amity with France, he had even dismantled the greater part of those important fortresses, thus leaving the country wholly exposed, in case of a future rupture, to the inroads of that formidable power. In the autumn of 1783, he suddenly demanded of the States General the appointment of a commission to meet at Brussels, for the accurate ascertainment of the boundaries of the Dutch and Austrian Netherlands. During the discussion of this demand, a detachment of the Austrian troops entered the Dutch territory, and seized upon two small forts in the neighbourhood of Sluys; and a new demand was made of the free navigation of the Scheld beyond Fort Lillo, as far as the land of Saftingen. Conferences were at length agreed upon to be held at Brussels, in order to the final settlement of these claims, and the plenipotentiaries of the Emperor delivered in to those of the States General, (May, 1784,) the entire demand of his imperial Majesty, "Purporting the enlargement of his boundaries on the side of Breda and Bois-le-Duc; the demolition of the forts Kruickshank and Frederic Henry; the inland navigation of the Scheld as far as Saftingen; the requisition of various sums of money pretended to have been due to the Emperor since the beginning of the present century; and the cession of the city of Maestricht, and the contiguous district of Outre Meuse, disjoined from the general mass of the Dutch possessions." Astonished and alarmed at these novel claims, the States were urgent to obtain the mediation of the court of Versailles. Since the termination of the war with England, Holland had been distracted with internal commotions. A great majority of the Dutch nation accused the Prince of Orange of gross and flagrant partiality to England during the war. Prince Louis of Brunswick, guardian to the stadtholder during his minority, and generalissimo of the Dutch forces, was even said to be a pensioner of England; and so high did the public clamour arise against him, that he found it necessary to resign his offices civil and military, and retire from the country. This was far, however, from satisfying the disaffected party, which seemed to increase. The authority of the Prince, as established by the constitution of 1747, was assailed in almost every province, by every possible mode of attack; and the very existence of the stadtholderate seemed to have become precarious. Under these circumstances, the Emperor again rose in his demands. In his ultimatum, (delivered August 23, 1784) his imperial Majesty observing "that divers difficulties had occurred in the discussion of his claims, and that a speedy termination of those differences was ardently desired by him, offered to depart from his just demand upon the city of Maestricht, and to moderate his other requisitions, in consideration of the free and unlimited navigation of the Scheld in both branches to the sea. His imperial Majesty, not doubting but the States would accept with eagerness so unquestionable a mark of his good will, had thought proper to regard the Scheld as open, and to declare its navigation free from the date of this paper; and he concluded, that on the supposition of any insult being offered to the imperial flag in the execution of these ideas, he should be obliged to consider it as a formal declaration of war on the part of the republic." This memorial was as a stroke of thunder to the States, who, in their answer, protested against this new claim, as the flagrant invasion of a right which they considered as the most valuable of their possessions. However, early in the month of October, (1784,) a small vessel sailed from Antwerp, with the intention of ascertaining this important point. On her arrival before the fort of Lillo, an account of her destination was demanded; on the refusal of the officer to answer, a single ball was fired; and no regard being paid to this intimation, a whole broadside was discharged, and the vessel immediately struck her colours. This proceeding on the part of the Dutch excited the utmost astonishment of the Emperor, who had treated the remonstrances of his minister, Prince Kaunitz, with contempt—repeatedly and peremptorily affirming, "that the Dutch would never dare to fire." The Emperor being in Hungary when this intelligence arrived, the Prince wrote to his imperial Majesty the following laconic letter of information—"But they have fired." The conferences at Brussels were immediately broken up, the imperial ambassador at the Hague was recalled, and hostile preparations were made on both sides. At this critical moment the court of Versailles interposed, so as to preserve the Dutch nation from the threatened ruin. A letter written with his most Christian Majesty's own hand to the Emperor, dated November 20, 1784, pointed out the essential distinction between the primary and ultimate demands of the Emperor. Respecting the former, the King of France declared himself neutral; but he protested against any violation of the rights of the States General respecting the navigation of the Scheld—a right exercised by them for nearly one hundred and fifty years under the sanction of a sacred treaty. His most Christian Majesty exhorted the Emperor, therefore, to listen to the voice of moderation and humanity, and to assent to a renewal of the conferences under his mediation. To enforce this amicable overture, "a great army was assembled in the vicinity of Luxemburg; the Marquis de Verac, who possessed the entire confidence of M. de Vergennes the French minister, was dispatched as ambassador extraordinary to the Hague; and the Mareschal de Maillebois, an officer of high reputation in the French service, was permitted to take the command in chief of the Dutch forces." At length, the Emperor thought proper to accept of the proffered mediation, provided the freedom of the Scheld, or the cession of Maestricht, were made the preliminaries of the negotiation. The Dutch now peremptorily refused to accede to either of these alternatives; and, after some delay, the Emperor submitted to the humiliating relinquishment of both these objects. He insisted, however, that the Dutch States should make a public submission, and apologize by a formal embassy for the insult offered to his flag at Lillo. In a short time a treaty of pacification was signed, importing "that the States should pay the sum of ten millions of florins as an indemnification for the

when his Majesty, in opening the sittings, observed, "That at the close of the last session he had informed them of the concern with which he observed the disputes unhappily subsisting in the republic of the United Provinces. Their situation soon afterwards became more critical and alarming. The King of Prussia having demanded satisfaction for the insult offered to the Princess of Orange his sister, the party which had usurped the government applied to the most Christian King for assistance; and that Prince having notified to the claim of the Emperor upon Maestricht and its territory, and as a compensation for the damage done by the late inundations; the inland navigation of the Scheld was extended to the town of Saftingen, and the forts of Lietkinshoek and Lillo ceded to the Emperor." This treaty was immediately followed by a treaty of alliance and friendship between Holland and France; an event neither pleasant nor honourable to England.

While the issue of the negotiation respecting the Scheld was yet unknown, a negotiation of still greater importance was carried on by the Emperor with the Elector of Bavaria, for the exchange of that extensive and commodious territory for the whole of the Austrian Netherlands, which were for this purpose to be converted into a kingdom under the ancient and obsolete appellation of Austrasia. This design could not escape the notice of the King of Prussia; and, in order to counteract it, a treaty was signed at Berlin (July 1785,) by his Prussian Majesty, the King of Great Britain as Elector of Hanover, and the Elector of Saxony, to which the Duke of Deux-Ponts, the Margrave of Anspach, and other Princes afterwards acceded. This confederation was expressly affirmed to be intended for maintaining the indivisibility of the empire, the rights of the Germanic body in general, and of the respective states in particular. The court of Versailles, though at variance with England and Prussia respecting the internal affairs of Holland, was no less solicitous to oppose the aggrandizement of the Austrian power in the empire. The court of St. Petersburgh, indeed, no longer shewed itself, decidedly hostile to the annexation of Bavaria to the Austrian dominions. She had even formed recent and strict engagements with that of Vienna, which induced her to make a public declaration, professing at least to approve of this exchange; though in the progress of the business, and on the refusal of the Duke of Deux-Ponts, the Empress Catharine formally notified to the King of Prussia that she had no intention to enforce the execution of the project. The courts of Vienna and Munich were at length compelled, in the spring of 1785, publicly to contradict the report, and to assert that the convention between them had no farther object than the adjustment of the limits of their respective countries.

The dangerous contest in which Holland found herself involved with the court of Vienna, did not abate the domestic contentions of the republic. The Louvestein party, anciently in opposition to the house of Orange, and which consisted chiefly of the provincial aristocracies, or rather oligarchies, of the union, had been recently reinforced by an unnatural coalition with the zealous partisans of democracy, who equally wished for the total annihilation of the stadtholderian influence and authority. At this period a letter was addressed to the States General by the King of Prussia, signed at Berlin, September 17, 1785, strongly urging the interposition of their high mightinesses, that the Prince Stadtholder might peaceably enjoy the rights and incontestable prerogatives appertaining to his dignity of hereditary Stadtholder. This application produced not the least effect. The states of Holland, who assumed the lead in the opposition, ordered, as in contempt of this interference, the arms of the house of Orange to be taken out of the colours of the troops belonging to that province, and that the Swiss guards attendant on the person of the Prince should be disbanded. Rebellion, and mutual hostilities ensued; and the states of Holland proceeded (September 22, 1786,) to the violent resolution of suspending the Prince from his office of Captain General of the province, by a majority of sixteen out of nineteen voices, of which that assembly is composed. The Prince now declared "his office of hereditary Captain General of Holland and West Friesland to have been secured to him by the unanimous vote of all the members of the State, he affirmed, that as the resolution by which the office had been conferred, passed nemine contradicente, it could not, supposing it to be revocable, be cancelled or even suspended without the like unanimity." This change of tone may be attributed to an event which had recently taken place; that of the death of Frederic the Great, King of Prussia (August 17, 1786,) who was succeeded by his nephew Frederic William II. to whom the Prince of Orange was nearly allied by marriage to his sister, the Princess Wilhelmina of Prussia. This monarch entered with great zeal into the interests of the Prince. In a memorial presented by his Prussian Majesty's ambassador extraordinary to the States General (September 18, 1786,) he expresses without reserve "the warm part which he takes in the unhappy dissensions subsisting between some of the provinces and the Stadtholder, and the very extraordinary oppressions which that Prince is innocently obliged to suffer—and urging that a durable termination may be put to these differences, in order that his serene highness the Prince Stadtholder may return, with honour and propriety, to the Hague, and resume his high employments—insisting also upon the great interest he had, as the nearest neighbour of the United Provinces, that the government of the republic, conformably to the ancient constitution, should not be changed in any essential point." Just before the delivery of this paper, a memorial had been presented to the States on the part of the King of England, containing, in language somewhat more guarded, the same sentiments. Notwithstanding this powerful interference in behalf of the Prince of Orange, the States of Holland shewed themselves in the highest degree averse from every idea of accommodation. The States General at length came to a resolution, notwithstanding the opposition of that great and leading province, to invite the mediation of Great Britain and Prussia; but the States of Holland declared themselves determined rather to strike out their names from the union of Utrecht, than to suffer such a measure to receive the sanction of the republic. The Prince having now removed his court to Nimeguen, an ineffectual negotiation was carried on during the winter of 1786-7. The Stadtholder became inflexible in his pretensions. Every thing, on the breaking up of these conferences wore the face of war. The Prince encamped near the city of Utrecht, opposite to the cordon formed by the troops of Holland. In the month of June (1787,) with a view, as was universally believed by the patriots, of exciting an insurrectionary movement, her royal highness the Princess of Orange, then resident at Nimeguen, adopted the bold and hazardous resolution of proceeding in person to the Hague, where the States General were assembled, accompanied only by the Baroness de Wassanaer and a few domestics. She was arrested in her progress at about a league beyond Schoonhoven, and forced back to Nimeguen. This incident brought matters to a crisis. On the 10th of July a memorial was addressed by the Prussian monarch to the States of Holland, in which he affected to consider the indignity offered to his sister as a personal insult to himself; and, to avenge this insult, the Duke of Brunswick, who commanded the Prussian forces in the contiguous duchy of Cleves, entered Holland at the head of twenty thousand men on the 13th of September. The consternation of the Dutch nation was extreme, and the country seemed every where unprepared for resistance. Utrecht, distinguished for the violence of her democratic zeal, surrendered almost as soon as summoned. The troops of the garrison retired precipitately towards Amsterdam, and the commander suddenly disappeared. The march of the Prussian General now bore the appearance of a triumphal procession. Gorcum, Dort, Schoonhoven, and other towns in his route, tamely submitted. On the seventh day from the commencement of the invasion, the Prince of Orange made his public entry into the Hague. Amsterdam made only a shew of resistance; and, on the 10th of October, it opened its gates to the victor. Thus, that republic which maintained a contest of eighty years against the power of Spain, which contended for the empire of the ocean with England, and which repelled the attacks of Louis XIV. in the zenith of his glory, was over-run by the arms of Prussia in a single month.

The court of Versailles could not contemplate the termination of this great contest with indifference; but the distracted state of her own affairs, and the increasing discontents and disorders of the kingdom, in a manner compelled her reluctant acquiescence. The projects of the new minister of finance, M. de Calonne, proved unsuccessful and abortive. In the latter end of the year 1785, a loan of 3,330,000*l.* the acknowledged deficit of the current year, was negotiated; which the Parliament of Paris, after repeated remonstrances, at last registered only in pursuance of the King's positive commands. The hostile disposition of the Parliament, and the evident impossibility of obtaining their cordial concurrence, determined the minister to adopt a plan more suited to the boldness and extent of his views. In August, (1786,) he presented a memorial to the King, representing "The melioration of the finances to be essentially connected with public order; and averring that what the national benefit required could not be effected by partial operations, and that the reparation of the whole was necessary to prevent the ruin of the whole. Consequently, the project he had formed embraced all the parts of the monarchy, and was intended to bring them to a closer union. It would be an inexhaustible source of happiness for the people of France; it would set the monarch for ever at rest respecting the situation of his finances; it would raise his power higher than that of the most prosperous of his ancestors, and enrol his name with those of the most virtuous and enlightened legislators. In fine, what induced him to conjure his Majesty to adopt it was, that out of the circle of this reformation he could foresee nothing but calamity and ruin." This plan was no other than to convene, by royal authority and appointment, after the example of ancient times, an assembly of the most considerable and enlightened persons in the kingdom, under the denomination of notables, by whose influence and under whose sanction "A reformation might (to use the words of M. de Calonne) be effected of whatever was vicious in the constitution of the state." This memorial was received with approbation; and before the termination of the year summonses were issued for the meeting of the assembly of Notables at Versailles, on the 22d of February, 1787. It consisted of one hundred and forty-four persons, amongst whom were seven Princes of the blood, nine Dukes and Peers of France, eight field Mareschals, eight Counsellors of State, and eleven Bishops and Archbishops. The remaining members were chiefly selected from the different Parliaments and magistracies in the kingdom. The convention of Notables was opened in great state by the King in person, with a speech from the throne, in which he declared "that they had been chosen by him from the different orders of the state, to impart to them his designs, and to receive from them the observations of which they might think them susceptible. This, said the monarch, has been the custom of many of my predecessors, and particularly of the chief of my family, whose name remains still dear to every Frenchman, and whose example I shall always be proud to make the rule of my conduct." His Majesty then, in general terms stated "the views by which he was actuated—the improvement of the revenue—the equalization of taxes—the liberation of commerce—and expressed the fullest confidence in the zeal with which they were animated for his service." This was followed by an elaborate address from M. de Calonne, in which he accused his predecessor M. Necker of leaving at his dismission from office an arrear of 684,000,000 of livres totally unprovided for. The difference between the annual revenue and the annual expenditure he estimated at 80,000,000. The minister to his Majesty his intention of granting their request, the King did not hesitate to declare that he could not remain a quiet spectator, and gave immediate orders for augmenting his forces both by sea and land; and in the course of this transaction he had concluded a subsidiary treaty with the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel. In the mean time, the rapid success of the Duke of Brunswick enabled the provinces to deliver themselves from the oppression under which they laboured; and all the subjects of contest being thus removed, an amicable explanation had taken place between the courts of London and Versailles." The addresses in answer to the speech were voted with great unanimity in both Houses; the subsidy to Hesse, by which twelve thousand men were retained for a term of years in the service of Britain, passed without a dissentient vote; and in a short time treaties of amity and alliance were concluded between the courts of London, Berlin, and the Hague, by which the two former guaranteed the stadtholderate in perpetuity to the serene house of Orange, as an essential part of the constitution of the United Provinces.*

The army establishment, which had been reduced from seventy to sixty-four regiments at the termination of the war, was now raised to the customary complement. A great naval promotion had also taken place, in the contemplation of a war with France; in which sixteen captains had been selected for flags, while a much greater number had been passed over in silence and neglect. A motion was consequently made in the House of Commons, "that the House should resolve itself into a committee, to inquire into the conduct of the Admiralty in the business of the late promotion." This motion was negatived by a very small majority; and the First Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Howe, became the subject of very severe censure. His Lordship soon afterwards resigned, and was succeeded by the Earl of Chatham.†

Disputes having arisen, between the two Boards of Directors and Control, established by the India Regulation Bill, Mr. Pitt brought in his famous Declaratory Act, by which various new and important powers were conferred on the Board of Control, under pretext of explaining and determining the sense of the former bill.

Early in the session Mr. Hastings had delivered in his answer to the impeachment of the Commons, who immediately proceeded to the appointment of a committee of managers. It was also determined to institute a similar process against Sir Elijah Impey, chief-justice of the Supreme Court established by the Regulating Act of 1773. Six articles of impeachment were accordingly exhibited to the House by Sir Gilbert Elliot. On the 4th of February Sir Elijah was permitted to make his defence at the bar of the House; which he performed at great length, and with great ability. On the 28th of April (1786) Sir Gilbert Elliot entered upon his summary of the charge; and after much discussion, Mr. Pitt declared himself convinced of the innocence of the accused, and the motion of Sir Gilbert Elliot was negatived by 73 to 65.

Mr. Hastings's trial commenced on the 15th of February—Westminter Hall having been fitted up for the purpose with great magnificence. Mr. Burke occupied four successive days in his preliminary speech. On the 22d of February the Benares charge was opened by Mr. Fox; and it was concluded on the 25th by Mr. Grey, member for the county of Northumberland, whose talents had, at an early period of life, attracted the attention of the House. On the 15th of April, the charge relative to the Begums of Oude was brought forward by Mr. Adam; and the evidence on this charge was summed up by Mr. Sheridan, in a speech which lasted five days.

Towards the close of the session, a bill was brought into the House of Commons by Sir William Dolben, member for the University of Oxford, to regulate the transportation of slaves from the coast of Africa to the West Indies. Early in the year, a multitude of petitions had been presented from the different towns, cities, and counties of the kingdom, imploring the abolition of that traffic. A motion on the subject of these petitions was expected to be made by Mr. Wilberforce, member for Yorkshire; but in consequence of the long protracted indisposition of that gentlemen, Mr. Pitt on the 9th of May moved a resolution, importing that the House minister proceeded to develope his plan for restoring energy and stability to the state by a grand reform of its abuses, of which he exhibited an interesting and curious detail. To preclude even the shadow of opposition, he had so organized the assembly, that forty-four suffrages should to all efficient purposes constitute the majority of one hundred and forty-four. "The assembly was with this view divided into seven sections or chambers, over each of which a Prince of the blood presided. Voting by sections, eleven votes in four of these chambers respectively, would, of course be counted as the majority of the whole, although, had the votes been individually taken, the majority might, very possibly, be converted into an insignificant minority." Notwithstanding these precautions, the notables soon displayed a very refractory disposition. Numerous objections were started to the plan laid before them. To the new territorial impost they positively refused their concurrence, unless the accounts and estimates of the government were submitted to their inspection. This was refused with disdain; and the King caused it to be signified to them, "that he was determined to introduce the impost, and that it therefore became them to debate, not the principle of the measure, but the most equitable form it could assume." This only rendered the discontent of the assembly violent and general. The enemies of Calonne seized this favourable opportunity to effect his ruin. The Count de Vergennes, who had supported the authority and credit of M. Neckar, had expired a few days only before the meeting of the Notables; but this event was not attended with any advantage to M. de Calonne. The whole of the Queen's party were active against him; they were zealously assisted by the numerous friends of M. Neckar; in the midst of their investigations, the assembly was adjourned from the 5th to the 12th of April for the Easter recess; and on the 8th M. de Calonne was dismissed from his employments. The public clamour and odium rising high against M. de Calonne, he was exiled to his estate in Lorraine; and he soon afterwards thought it expedient to take refuge in foreign parts. He was succeeded by M. Leomine de Brienne, Archbishop of Toulouse, a leading member of the Assembly of Notables, and of great popularity in the kingdom at large. The sacrifice of M. de Calonne produced no concessions in favour of the court. The Assembly of Notables, in their next sitting, declared themselves utterly incompetent either to suggest different taxes, or to adopt and sanction those which had been proposed. The views of the court having been thus finally frustrated, the assembly was dissolved (May 25, 1787), with a cold acknowledgment from the King of the services which they had rendered to the public. In July (1787) the states of Holland presented to the States General a proposition for soliciting the mediation of the court of Versailles; soon after which, the French ambassador presented also a memorial to the States General, declaring that the King, his master, was highly sensible of this mark of the confidence of the republic, and was ready to co-operate by every means in his power for the restoration of harmony and peace. In September, France tardily professed her intention of assisting the Dutch, in case they were attacked by any foreign power. This only animated the court of London to act with the greater spirit, and vigorous naval preparations were made to support the King of Prussia, in opposition to the menacing declarations of France. The object of the Prussian expedition, however, being accomplished in a much shorter space of time than could have been imagined, the French court found itself disengaged from all obligations. The Duke of Dorset, ambassador at Paris, in consequence of the events which had taken place, presented (October 27) a memorial to the King of France, signifying, that "no subject of discussion, much less of contest, now remaining between the two courts, he was authorised to ask, whether it was the intention of his Most Christian Majesty to carry into effect the notification made by his Most Christian Majesty's plenipotentiary? which, by announcing that succours would be given to Holland, had occasioned the naval armaments on the part of his Britannic Majesty, which armaments have been reciprocal. If the court of Versailles is disposed to explain herself satisfactorily on this subject, the ambassador proposes, that all warlike preparation should be discontinued, and that the navies of the two nations should be again placed on the footing of the peace establishment, as it stood on the 1st of January of the present year." To this memorial the Count de Montmorin, the new minister for foreign affairs in France, replied, on the very same day, "that the intention of his Majesty not being, and never having been, to interfere by force in the affairs of Holland, the communication made to the court of London, on the 16th of the last month, having had no other object than to announce to that court an intention, the motives of which no longer exist, especially since the King of Prussia has imparted his resolution; his Majesty makes no scruple to declare, that he will not give any effect to the declaration above-mentioned; and agrees with pleasure to the proposal of mutually disarming, made on the part of his Britannic Majesty." Thus happily and honourably for England did this important business terminate.

* By the treaty between Great Britain and Prussia, each of the high contracting powers engaged, in case of attack, to furnish the other with a succour of sixteen thousand infantry and four thousand cavalry, or an equivalent in money, within the term of two months from the date of the requisition.

† About the same time the Earl of Mansfield resigned the chief-justiceship of England, which he had held with high reputation thirty-two years. The vacancy thus made was supplied by the Attorney-General, Sir Lloyd Kenyon, created Lord Kenyon.

would early in the next session proceed to take into consideration the state of the slave-trade. The bill of Sir William Dolben, which was intended merely to establish a certain reasonable proportion between the number of slaves and the tonnage of the ships, was violently opposed by petitions from the merchants of London and Liverpool concerned in the African trade. Counsel was therefore engaged, and witnesses examined, when it appeared in evidence at the bar of the House," that five feet six inches in length, and sixteen inches in breadth, was the average space allotted to each slave. The lower deck of the vessel was entirely covered with bodies. The space between the floor of that deck and the roof above, in height about five feet eight inches, was divided by a platform, also covered with human bodies. The slaves were chained, two and two, by their hands and feet, and by means of ring-bolts fastened to the deck. In that sultry climate, their allowance was a pint of water each per diem; and they were usually fed twice a day with yams and horse beans. After meals they were compelled by the whip to jump in their irons, which by the slave dealers was called dancing. They had not, when stowed together, so much room as a man in his coffin, either in length and breadth. They drew their breath with laborious and anxious efforts, and many died of suffocation. The customary mortality of the voyage exceeded seventeen times the usual estimate of human life." Mr. Pitt declared, "that if, as had been asserted by the members for Liverpool, the trade could not be carried on in any other manner, he would retract what he had said on a former day, and, waving every farther discussion, give his instant vote for the annihilation of a traffic thus shocking to humanity. He trusted that the House, being now in possession of such evidence as was never before exhibited, would endeavour to extricate themselves from the guilt and remorse which every man ought to feel for having so long overlooked such cruelty and oppression." The bill was carried up (June 18th) to the House of Lords, where it encountered the determined opposition of Lord Thurlow. The Duke of Clandos predicted a general insurrection of the negroes in the West Indies, in consequence of the agitation of the present question; and Lord Sydney expressed in warm terms his admiration of the system of the slave laws established in Jamaica, and saw no room for any improvement. The bill was defended by the Duke of Richmond and Marquis Townsend; and it finally passed by a considerable majority.

The session was closed, July 11, by a speech from the throne, in which the King observed, "that his faithful subjects had every reason to expect the continuance of the blessings of peace; and the engagements which he had recently formed with the King of Prussia and the States General of the United Provinces, would, he trusted, promote the security and welfare of his own dominions, and contribute to the general tranquillity of Europe."*

Shortly after the prorogation, the King, who had been for some time indisposed, was advised by his physicians to try the mineral waters of Cheltenham, which he was believed to drink in too profuse a quantity. His health appeared, however, during his residence there, greatly improved; and he amused himself, by various excursions in the vicinity of that place, displaying much condescension and affability, and being every where received with loud acclamations. On his return to Windsor, late in the summer, his illness returned with new and alarming symptoms; and by the end of October, it could no longer be concealed that his malady was of a nature peculiarly afflictive and dreadful. A mental derangement had taken place, which rendered him totally incapable of the business attached to the regal office.

Parliament had been prorogued to the 20th of November; a few days previously to which, a circular was issued by the ministers, in which the impracticability of a farther prorogation was signified, and the attendance of the members earnestly requested. On the meeting of Parliament, the state of the King's health was formally notified to the House of Peers by the Lord Chancellor, and to the Commons by Mr. Pitt; and as the session could not be opened in the regular mode, an adjournment of fourteen days was recommended; at the end of which term, should the King's illness unhappily continue, it would be incumbent upon them to enter into the immediate consideration of the state of public affairs. On the re-assembling of Parliament, on the 4th of December, a report of the Board of Privy Council was presented to the two Houses, containing an examination of the royal physicians; and it was suggested, that, considering the extreme delicacy of the subject, and the dignity of the personage concerned, Parliament would do well to rest satisfied without any more direct and express information, especially as the examinations of council had been taken upon oath, which the House of Commons had no power to administer.

At this time, the Prince of Wales, into whose hands the government of the country seemed likely to fall, retained a deep resentment against ministers for their recent conduct respecting him, and took no pains to conceal his decided predilection for the person and politics of Mr. Fox. That gentleman, on the intelligence of the King's indisposition, had returned from an excursion to the continent with incredible expedition; and in contemplation of an approaching change, a new arrangement of administration was already believed to be formed, consisting of the principal members of the former coalition ministry, Lord North only excepted, and of which the Duke of Portland was to be, once more, the ostensible head. Doubts, however, were started by Mr. Fox, Mr. Burke, and others of the same party, whether Parliament could, in this momentous case, dispense with that sort of evidence on which they had been accustomed to proceed. The objection was very faintly contested, and a committee of twenty-one persons in each House, was appointed to examine and report the sentiments of the royal physicians. The report of the committee was laid upon the table of the House of Commons on the 10th of December; when a motion was made by Mr. Pitt, for the appointment of another committee to inspect the journals for precedents of such proceedings as had been adopted in former instances, when the sovereign authority was suspended by sickness, infirmity, or any other cause. Mr. Fox opposed the motion, as calculated only for delay. As to precedents, there were, he said, none which applied to the present case; and all that was requisite to their ultimate decision had been obtained by the report now lying on the table. He advanced, as a proposition deducible from the principles of the constitution, and the analogy of the law of hereditary succession, "that whenever the Sovereign was incapable of exercising the functions of his high office, the heir apparent, if of full age and capacity, had as indisputable a claim to the exercise of the executive authority, in the name and on the behalf of the sovereign, during his incapacity, as in the case of his natural demise." Mr. Pitt immediately rose, and with much warmth declared, "that the assertion which had been made by Mr. Fox was little short of treason against the constitution." And he pledged himself to prove that the heir apparent, in the instances in question, had no more right to the exercise of the executive power than any other person; and that it belonged entirely to the two remaining branches of the legislature to make such a provision for supplying the temporary deficiency as they might think proper." Here it was remarkable, that Mr. Fox, the great advocate of the rights of the people, became the defender of prerogative; and Mr. Pitt, who had been loudly accused of deserting the principles of liberty, appeared in the light of their intrepid and zealous assertor. "When the regular exercise of the powers of government," said he, "was from any cause suspended, to whom could the right of providing a remedy for the existing defect devolve but to the people, from whom all the powers of government originated? To assert an inherent right in the Prince of Wales to assume the government was virtually to revive those exploded ideas of the Divine and indefeasible authority of Princes which had so justly sunk into contempt and almost into oblivion. Kings and princes derive their power from the people, and to the people alone, through the organ of their representatives, did it appertain to decide in cases for which the constitution had made no specific or positive provision." At length, Mr. Fox not choosing to take the sense of the House, Mr. Pitt's motion for precedents was carried without a division. A similar motion was the next day made by Lord Camden in the House of Peers, and the doctrine of Mr. Fox was reprobated by his Lordship with great severity. Lord Stormont, however, concluded his speech with recommending an immediate address to the Prince of Wales, entreating him to assume the exercise of the royal authority. As it was seen that the discussion of the abstract question of right afforded a great and unexpected advantage to the ministry, the Duke of York, soon after this debate, expressed his wishes, in the name of the Prince, "that the question might be waved. No claim of right," said his Royal Highness, "had been advanced by the Prince of Wales;" and he was confident that his brother too well understood the sacred principles which seated the house of Brunswick upon the throne, ever to assume or exercise any power, be his claim what it might, that was not derived from the will of the people expressed by their representatives." Lord Thurlow, who had at first consented to take a part in the new administration, now spoke with great energy of his "sentiments of affection towards the King. Nothing could be more disgraceful than to desert the sovereign in his distressed and helpless situation. His own debt of gratitude was ample; and when he forgot his King might God forget him." These expressions were ill-naturedly whispered to be the result of certain intimations, which his Lordship had received, of the happy and not very distant prospect of the King's recovery. This was however, only a matter of speculation.

* Early in the present year (February 1) died at Rome, Charles Louis Casimir Stuart, eldest son of the late Pretender to the throne of Great Britain, at the age of sixty-seven years. Since the demise of his father he had taken upon himself the appellation of King, but this title was not acknowledged by any of the Sovereigns of Europe. He had married a Princess of the house of Stolberg, by whom he left no issue; but his property, which was considerable, he bequeathed to a natural daughter whom he had created Duchess of Albany. His brother, the Cardinal of York, was now the sole survivor of the Royal House of Stuart.

On the 16th of December, in the committee on the state of the nation, Mr. Pitt moved two declaratory resolutions:

"I. The interruption of the royal authority; and

"II. That it was the duty of the two Houses of Parliament to provide the means of supplying that defect."

A warm debate ensued; in the course of which Mr. Fox declared "the principles of the minister to be, that the monarchy was indeed hereditary, but that the executive power ought to be elective. The legal metaphysics that thus distinguished between the crown and its functions were unintelligible. The investigators should be schoolmen, and not statesmen, if a question that so deeply involved the existence of the constitution were to be thus discussed. Where (said he) is that famous dictum to be found, by which the crown is guarded with such inviolable sanctity, while its powers are left to the mercy of every assailant?" The resolutions were at length carried by 268 against 204; and on the 23d of December, a third resolution passed, empowering the Chancellor of Great Britain to affix the Great Seal to such bill of limitations as might be necessary to restrict the power of the future Regent. This mode of procedure was strenuously opposed by Lord North. "A person," said his Lordship, "is to be set up without power or discretion; and this pageant, this fictitious being, is to give the force of a law to the decision of the two Houses. Was it ever before heard of, that there could be a power of giving assent without the power of refusing that assent? Would any man seriously maintain that the third estate thus conjured up is really distinct from the other two?" An amendment was moved by Mr. Dempster, "That the Prince of Wales be requested to take upon himself the administration of the government during the royal incapacity;" but the amendment was negatived by 251 to 178. In the Lords, a similar amendment to that of Mr. Dempster was moved by Lord Rawdon; when, after a violent debate, the resolutions were confirmed.

On the 2d of January, 1789, died Mr. Cornwall, Speaker of the House of Commons; and on the 5th, the vacant chair was filled by Mr. Grenville, brother to Lord Temple. The plan of limitations, when ready to be introduced into the House, was obstructed by a motion of Mr. Loveden, (January 6) that the physicians be re-examined on the subject of the King's illness, and the probability of recovery. This motion was the result of various reports respecting the disagreement of opinion amongst the physicians themselves,—reports sufficiently corroborated by the subsequent examination, which left the House as much in the dark as ever as to the event. A letter had previously been written to the Prince of Wales, by Mr. Pitt, informing his Royal Highness of the plan meant to be pursued:—"that the care of the King's person, and the disposition of the royal household, should be committed to the Queen, who would by this means be vested with the patronage of four hundred places, amongst which were the great offices of Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, and Master of the Horse; that the power of the Prince should not extend to the granting any office, reversion, or pension, for any other term than during the King's pleasure, nor to the conferring any Peerage." The Prince in his answer, (dated July 2) said, "it was with deep regret that he perceived in the propositions of administration a project for introducing weakness, disorder, and insecurity, into every branch of political business—for separating the court from the state, and depriving government of its natural and accustomed support; a scheme for disconnecting the authority to command service, from the power of animating it by reward, and for allotting to him all the invidious duties of the kingly station, without the means of softening them to the public by any one act of grace, favour, or benignity. He observed, that the plea of public utility must be strong, manifest, and urgent, that could thus require the extinction or suspension of any one of those essential rights in the supreme power or its representative, or which could justify the Prince in consenting, that in his person an experiment should be made to assertain with how small a portion of kingly power the executive government of this country could be conducted. In fine, the Prince declared, that his conviction of the evils which might otherwise arise out-weighed in his mind every other consideration, and would determine him to undertake the painful trust imposed upon him by that melancholy necessity which of all the King's subjects he deplored the most."

A series of propositions, respecting the limitations, were brought into the House of Commons by Mr. Pitt, on the 16th of January. In one of the long and violent debates which ensued, Mr. Burke pronounced this to be no other than "a solemn mockery of royalty, when it was known to the whole world that Providence, in its inscrutable wisdom, had hurled the monarch from his throne, and had reduced him to a state in which he was the object of compassion to the meanest of his subjects."

The propositions at length passed the Commons by a large majority; but the contest in the Lords was extremely obstinate; and a protest was entered (January 23) upon the journals of the House, signed by the Dukes of York and Cumberland, and fifty-five other Peers, expressive of their highest indignation at the restrictions on the executive authority thus arbitrarily imposed. A committee appointed by the two Houses then presented the resolutions to the Prince, who, though evidently dissatisfied, declared his acceptance of them. He expressed himself sensible of the difficulties which must attend the execution of the trust reposed in him, in the peculiar circumstances in which it was committed to his charge, "of which," said his Royal Highness, "as I am acquainted with no former example, my hopes of a successful administration cannot be founded on any past experience." He also expressed his confidence, "that the limitations on the exercise of the royal authority were intended by the two Houses only as a temporary measure, founded on the loyal hope in which he ardently participated, that his Majesty's disorder might not be of long duration." On the following day (January 31) Lord Camden, with a view to restore the efficacy of legislation, moved that the Lord Chancellor be directed, by authority of the two Houses of Parliament, to issue a commission in the name of the sovereign for opening the session, consisting of the Princes of the blood and all the great officers of state. This finally passed both Houses; but the Princes of the blood expressly refused to suffer their names to appear on this commission. However, the session was opened in form by the Lords commissioners upon the 3d of February; the bill, founded on the propositions already agreed upon, passed the House of Commons (February 12,) with some amendments and variations; the peerage clause, in particular, being limited to three years.

Happily for the nation, these extraordinary measures were arrested in their progress by an official information from the Lord Chancellor, that the King was declared by his physicians to be in a state of convalescence. An adjournment of all farther proceedings in the bill immediately took place; and for nearly three weeks a total suspension of all Parliamentary business ensued. This was followed by a declaration (March 10) that "his Majesty, being perfectly recovered from his indisposition, had ordered a commission to be issued for holding the Parliament in the usual manner." The news of the King's recovery diffused the most general and heartfelt satisfaction. A national thanksgiving was appointed, and his Majesty himself went in solemn procession to St. Paul's Cathedral, to offer up his grateful devotions on this event; which was celebrated throughout the kingdom by splendid illuminations, and every other demonstration of joy, to an unprecedented extent.

Parliament, as already intimated, was opened by commission; and, in the speech which was delivered by the Chancellor in the name of the King, his Majesty conveyed to the two Houses, his warmest acknowledgments for the additional proofs they had given of their attachment to his person, and their concern for the honour and interests of his crown. The late proceedings of the ministry were evidently acceptable to the sovereign; and those persons holding posts under the government, who had concurred in the measures of the opposition, were unceremoniously dismissed from their offices: amongst them were the Marquis of Lothian, the Duke of Queensberry, Lord Carteret, and Lord Malmesbury.

One of the first motions was that of Mr. Fox, for the repeal of the Shop Tax; and as Mr. Pitt did not choose any longer to refuse his assent, it was this time successful. Mr. Dempster at the same time moved for a repeal of the Hawkers' and Pedlars' Tax; a total repeal of which could not be obtained; but a bill passed to explain and amend the act, by which the more oppressive clauses were mitigated. Mr. Beaufoy also again renewed his motion, for the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts. This motion was supported by Mr. Fox, and opposed by Lord North, and Mr. Pitt; and, on a division, it was negatived, by 124 against 104. Lord Stanhope next introduced a bill into the House of Peers, for the repeal of a number of obsolete laws, inflicting penalties upon persons absenting themselves from the service of the church, speaking in derogation of the book of Common Prayer, &c. This bill, which experienced the most decided opposition from the Bishops,* was rejected.

Mr. Dundas, in conformity to the India regulation bill, made his annual statement of the finances of the Company, which he represented as in a prosperous and flourishing condition; concluding however, with a motion to empower the Company to raise the sum of one million, by way of increase of capital, to be subscribed by the present proprietors of East India stock. The bill, founded on this motion, passed both Houses without difficulty.

Towards the close of the session, Mr. Wilberforce brought forward his motion, relating to the abolition of the African slave trade;† and he concluded a long and excellent speech, by moving, a series of propositions,

* Dr. Moore, Archbishop of Canterbury, declared that "The bill under their Lordships' discussion, if permitted to pass, would serve as a cover to every species of irreligion. If unrestrained speaking, writing, and publishing, on the subject of religion were tolerated, there was scarcely any mischief to the church or to civil society that imagination could frame which might not be effected. The very foundation of religion, as by law established, might be undermined and overthrown." Dr. Warren, Bishop of Bangor, observed, "that it remained for these days of licentiousness to call in question the propriety and wisdom of those regulations which their Lordships were now solicited to repeal. To compel men by penalties not to absent themselves from the public places of worship did not militate against any sort of religious liberty, since the dissenters were allowed to resort to their own congregations: and he who would not communicate with either, might well be supposed to hold doctrines injurious to the state, and which ought not to be tolerated." Dr. Halifax, of St. Asaph expressed himself to the same effect, and reminded the House of the institution among the Locrians, which obliged every man that proposed a repeal of an existing law to come into the assembly with a rope about his neck. Dr. Horseley, of St. David's, expressed himself in terms still more indignant. "The bill in question," he said, "was calculated to tear away the foundations of the church of England, and through her means to destroy the very being of the English constitution. The act of Elizabeth, imposing a fine upon the non-attendants on divine worship, was a salutary law. It was a mistake to suppose the right of private judgment in religion unlimited. The magistrate had a right to punish atheism as a crime against the welfare of society; and, by the same rule, to punish a contempt for the revelation of God in the Christian religion. There was, moreover, always danger in disturbing ancient laws, for the existence of which, at a distant period, no good reason could be given. Their wisdom, though not obvious at the period of the repeal, was generally proved by the mischief that ensued upon their annihilation." Lord Stormont complimented the bench of Bishops, declaring that they had that day done themselves infinite credit, and rendered their characters sacred in the public estimation.

† Mr. Wilberforce divided his subject into three parts—the nature of the trade as it affected Africa itself; the appearance it assumed in the transportation of the slaves; and the considerations suggested by their actual state in the West Indies. "What must be the natural consequence of a slave trade with Africa," said he, "with a country vast in its extent, not utterly barbarous, but civilized in a very small degree? Was it not plain that she must suffer from it? that her savage manners must be rendered still more ferocious, and that a slave-trade carried on round her coasts, must extend violence and desolation to her very centre? Such were precisely the circumstances proved by the evidence before the privy council." With respect to the mode in which the slaves were transported from Africa to the West Indies, he affirmed that "so much misery condensed into so small a compass was more than human imagination had ever before conceived. It was the constant practice to set sail in the night, that the slaves, wrung with distress at quitting for ever their native country, might not be sensible of the moment of departure. This dreadful event was marked with songs and tears of lamentation. It appeared in evidence, that a Captain, more susceptible than the rest, had threatened a woman with the terrors of the lash, because her song was too painful for his feelings. The mortality on board the ships was prodigious; and, including the subsequent seasoning, it did not amount to less than 50 per cent. On their arrival in the West Indies, astringents and washes were employed to hide their wounds, and make them up for sale—artifices at once fraudulent and fatal. This infamous traffic was also known to be the grave of sailors employed in it. Of 3170 seamen who sailed from Liverpool in 1787, only 1428 had returned." Wr. Wilberforce said, he "felt the wickedness of the slave trade to be so enormous, so dreadful, and irremediable, that he could stop at no alternative short of its abolition. He acknowledged that his mind had indeed been harassed with the objections of the West India planters, who had asserted that the ruin of their property must be the consequence of this regulation. He could not, however, help distrusting their arguments. He could not believe that the Almighty Being, who forbade the practice of rapine and blood, had made rapine and bloodshed necessary to any part of his creation. Light soon broke in upon his mind. His suspicions were confirmed by daily information, and the evidence he had now to offer upon this point was decisive and complete. The principle upon which he founded the necessity of the act was not indeed policy but justice; but though justice were the principle of the measure, he would pledge himself to prove it reconcileable with our truest political interest. From an induction of authentic facts, he shewed that the number of slaves had rapidly increased by natural means on those plantations—and many such he enumerated—where they had been treated on a plan of lenity and humanity; and that the enormous annual importation from Africa was rendered necessary merely by the prevalence of that system of cruelty and oppression which the abolition of the slave-trade must eventually subvert. But it was urged, that the interests of the masters would induce them in the usual course of things, to treat their slaves with kindness and humanity. He appealed to universal experience for the fallacy of this argument. It tions, twelve in number, specifying the number of slaves imported from Africa into the British West Indies; the different descriptions of persons included in this aggregate number; the injury sustained by the seamen employed in the African trade; the causes of the mortality of the negroes; and the different items of calculation respecting the increase of population in Jamaica and Barbadoes; declaring, that no considerable or permanent inconvenience would result from discontinuing the farther importation. Mr. Pitt, at length, conceded, with the consent of Mr. Wilberforce, to the examination of witnesses on the part of the slave merchants and planters—"trusting that unnecessary delays would not be introduced, as he could by no means submit to the ultimate procrastination of so important a business." Evidence having been heard at the bar of the House for several successive weeks, it was at length, (June 23,) moved by Mr. Alderman Newnham, "that the farther consideration of the subject be deferred to the next session." This motion was carried without a division, and the temporary Regulation Act of Sir William Dolben was renewed for another year.

Mr. Grenville, Speaker of the House of Commons, having been advanced, upon the resignation of Lord Sydney, to the office of Secretary of State, and subsequently to a peerage, was succeeded by Henry Addington, Esq. who soon acquired great reputation for dignity, integrity, and impartiality, in the discharge of his office. The Parliament was prorogued on the 11th of August,* by a speech from the Lord Chancellor in the name of the sovereign: in which it was observed, that, "Although the good offices of the King and his allies had not been effectual for the restoration of the general tranquillity, the situation of affairs promised to this country the uninterrupted enjoyment of the blessings of peace."

Considering the important scenes which were at this time opening, in different parts of Europe,† the pacific assurances contained in the royal speech, were in the highest was certainly the true and ultimate interest of the planters to adopt the system of lenity. But they consulted their apparent and immediate interest in imposing rigorous tasks, and in circumscribing within the narrowest limits their miserable allotments of food, of clothing, and of repose. To assert that men will of course act as their interest under the guidance of reason would dictate, is in effect to pronounce all men upright and virtuous; for virtue is the path to genuine happiness. But are not mankind enveloped in the mists of ignorance, of folly, and of passion? Was it not the grand and perpetual object of religion, of morality, and of all just and beneficent legislation, to enlighten the human mind, and to assist men in discerning their true interest; to warn them of the danger of departing from it, of being deceived by false and flattering suggestions,—in a word, to incite them, though too oft in vain, to the practice of what is right, and to deter them from the commission of that which is wrong, by motives the most powerful, by sanctions the most sacred?"

* An important operation of finance had been effected in the course of the session, in exchange of the heavy duties on tobacco from the customs to the excise. This measure experienced general approbation, and was of great advantage to the public.

† Ever since the memorable treaty of Westphalia, by which the independence of Holland had been recognized by Spain, the house of Austria had adopted, to the provinces which remained, a mild and lenient system of government; and, during all vicissitudes, the Austrian Netherlands had continued to flourish under the protection of their own laws, and the limitations of their own constitution. Of the provinces subject to Austria, by far the most considerable and extensive was Brabant; the constitution of which, like that of England, was compounded of three estates; and the executive authority was vested in the sovereign, as Duke of Brabant. This free form of government was not congenial with the views of Joseph the second; and, on the 1st of January, 1787, two imperial edicts were issued, formally suppressing the ancient institutions, and even the great council of Brabant; and establishing in their stead a new council of general government, assisted by tribunals erected on the severe and arbitrary model of those actually existing under the proper Austrian government. At the same time, the Emperor annulled the charter of the university of Louvain, and established a new general seminary for the study of theology—the professors to be nominated by the sole authority of the Emperor. Serious commotions instantly took place; the States of Brabant, Flanders, and Hainault, assembling, forbade the people, in express terms, to pay any regard to the late edicts; all ranks of men enrolled themselves in military associations for their common defence; and deputies were dispatched to Vienna to represent their grievances, and to remonstrate with the Emperor against these atrocious and unprecedented violations of their rights. These measures proved effective; and, in a short time, the late proceedings of the Emperor were formally revoked

The advantages which had been acquired by Russia, from the treaty of 1784, excited the chagrin and envy of the Emperor Joseph; and the Turkish empire, at this period, presenting an easy prospect of conquest, a negotiation was set on foot with this view between the two imperial courts. In the spring of 1787 a conference took place between the Czarina and the Emperor at the new capital of Cherson, whither the Empress of the Russias had repaired, for her inauguration as sovereign of the Taurica. The Porte, apprized of the machinations of the imperial courts, immediately published a declaration of war against Russia—in the hope, it was supposed, of being able to conciliate the Emperor before his plan of hostility should be matured. The Emperor, however, ordered, after a short interval, a memorial to be delivered to the Porte, stating, "that he was compelled by treaty to assist his ally the Czarina with 80,000 men; and if this should be considered by the Porte as an act of hostility, he was prepared for every event." Not awaiting the answer, he made (Dec. 2, 1787) an attempt to surprise the fortress of Belgrade. Disappointed in this enterprise, he offered an apology for his conduct. The imperial declaration of war, at length appeared, February, 1788; and, contrary to the usual practice, the ambassadors of both the imperial courts were suffered to depart from Constantinople. The operations of the Germans were in the commencement of the war far from successful. Little impression could be made upon the Turkish frontier; and no sooner had the grand Vizier taken the command of the army, than the Turks became the assailants; and the Emperor, who commanded in person, after suffering repeated losses, was compelled to a precipitate retreat, leaving the Bannat and the Lower Hungary to the mercy of the enemy. On the western side, however, while Mareschal Laudohn commanded, the towns of Dubitza and Novi were reduced; and, on the eastern quarter, the city of Choczim surrendered to the united arms of Russia and Austria. Before the end of the year, the important fortress of Oczakow was carried by storm; the Russians marching to the assault over the frozen snow, with which the trenches were filled. A decisive superiority in the Black Sea was also obtained by the Russians over the celebrated Turkish Admiral, Hassan Pacha.

The King of Sweden, in the interim, actuated by ambition, and prompted by the King of Prussia, and the powers in alliance with him, and inimical to Russia, entered suddenly, at the head of a considerable army, the territory of Russian Finland, in the idea of passing by a direct and rapid march to St. Petersburgh. A subject of bitter chagrin, however, awaited him, in the absolute and pertinacious refusal of his officers to engage in offensive war, on the pretext, that the King had not, agreeably to the provisions of the constitution of 1772, obtained the previous consent of the States. The Czarina, on the first intimation of the attack from Sweden, had called for the aid and assistance of Denmark, conformably to the terms of the treaty of alliance subsisting between the two courts. The court of Copenhagen entered entirely into her views; and in the month of September (1788,) a large body of Danish troops, commanded by Prince Charles of Hesse Cassel, accompanied by the Prince of Denmark in person, passing over to Norway, were joined by a strong reinforcement of Norwegians. The combined forces suddenly and unexpectedly entered the Swedish province of Wermlandia, and advanced to the city of Gottenburgh with slight opposition. The King of Sweden repaired in person, with expedition almost incredible, to the defence of this important place, which, being attacked thus unprepared, seemed very unable to resist the force of the Danes. At this critical moment the courts of London and Berlin interposed their powerful mediation in favour of Sweden. Under these circumstances the resolution of the Prince was soon taken, and a suspension of arms was signed on the part of Denmark, (October 9, 1788,) which was subsequently converted into a treaty of neutrality. At the commencement of the following year, died the Grand Signor, Achmet IV. a Prince apparently of good understanding and of beneficent and upright intentions, but whose talents were totally inadequate to the task of restoring the declining empire of the Ottomans to its pristine prosperity and greatness. He was succeeded by his nephew, Selim III. son of the late Emperor Mustapha, whose first act of authority consisted in the deposition and consequent death of the Grand Vizier, Jossuph Pacha, who had conducted the operations of the campaign with great ability and success. His immense wealth, to the amount of a million sterling, was confiscated to the use of the sultan.

Joseph II. sinking under the pressure of disease and disappointment, had retired to Vienna; and Mareschal Laudohn having been appointed to the chief command, the operations of the war were renewed with great skill and vigour. After the reduction of Gradisca, this veteran commenced the siege of Belgrade; and on the 8th of October, (1789,) that important city, the bulwark of the Ottoman empire, surrendered on terms of honourable capitulation. The remainder of the campaign presented a series of rapid successes. Cladova, Semendria, Czernitz, &c. followed the example of Belgrade. Orsova only attempted a serious resistance, and it was not reduced till after a long investment and blockade. On the eastern side, the Prince of Cobourg, General of the Austrian army in Wulachia, after gaining a considerable advantage in an action fought near Foczan, attacked in conjunction with the Russian General Suwaroff, with a very inferior force, (September, 22, 1789,) the army of the new Grand Vizier, Hassan Pacha, at Martinesti, on the banks of the Rimnik, and gained a complete victory. This was attended with the immediate capture of Bucharest, the capital of Wulachia, and the almost entire reduction of the country north of the Danube. In the interim, Bielgorod on the Black Sea, and the city of Bender on the Tartarian frontier, surrendered to the arms of Russia, under Prince Potemkin. The war in the North was carried on little to the advantage of Sweden: for although the King of Sweden had entirely re-established his authority, and taken a severe vengeance on the individuals, who, by their audacious and inflexible contumacy, had arrested the progress of his arms, highest degree satisfactory and grateful, to the feelings of the nation. The French Revolution—the more prominent features of which, at its commencement, are rapidly sketched in the note below*—was now in full activity, and the entire political horizon of Europe presented a stormy and portentous aspect. On the minds of the people of England, the impression made by the passing events in France, was various. The general opinion, however, was highly favourable to the Revolution; and even its most criminal excesses, seen through a disarms, he could not so easily regain the advantages he had lost by that unexpected opposition. The immense power of Russia was now fully exerted; Sweden was reduced to act upon the defensive in Finland; and various naval encounters took place, in which the bravery and superior skill of the Swedes by no means compensated for the Russian superiority of force. In the ensuing campaign of 1790, the triumphs of the Russian arms over the Ottomans continued without any considerable interruption. The progress of these barbarous conquerors had been throughout marked with blood and desolation; but the capture, under General Suwarroff, of the city of Ismail, taken by storm December 22d, 1790, exceeded all in horror. The garrison, consisting of the flower of the Turkish army, was massacred in cold blood, and the inhabitants indiscriminately given up to the worse than brutal licentiousness of an enraged soldiery.

The successes of the Austrians, under Laudohn, excited the Emperor Joseph to renew his attempts against his subjects of Flanders and Brabant. Count Murray, distinguished by his lenity of temper, was succeeded in the government by Count Trautmansdorff; and the military placed under the command of General Dalton, an officer of approved skill, but of unrelenting and savage ferocity. The new system commenced with the revival of the former attempt against the university of Louvain: resistance being made, the rector and professors were expelled by the point of the bayonet, (August 1788) and many lives lost by the indiscriminate firing of the soldiery. Similar outrages and excesses took place at Antwerp, Mechlin, &c. in consequence of the orders issued by the government; military law, enforced by military execution, was in a manner proclaimed through the provinces; and a prodigious emigration of the principal inhabitants immediately succeeded. The emigrants, favoured and protected by the Dutch government, now under the influence of England and Prussia, assembled in numerous bodies on the frontier: in the autumn of 1789, they entered Austrian Flanders in great force, and in a very short time over-ran the whole country, a few fortresses excepted, the Austrians flying before them. The Emperor now once more offered, in the most flattering and conciliatory language, to restore to them their ancient constitution, and even to endow them with additional privileges; but his overtures were scornfully rejected. The States of Brabant assembling at Brussels, (December the 22d, 1789,) in concert with the deputies of the other provinces, formally disclaimed allegiance to the Emperor, and proceeded to the appointment of an administration. General Vandermersch, distinguished for his patriotism and bravery, was nominated to the command of the troops; M. Vandernoodt was declared prime minister, and M. Van Eupen secretary of state. In January, (1790) the plan of a federal constitution was formed by the Belgic States—the appellation which they now assumed—nearly resembling that of the United Provinces. The leader of the revolt, however, either little understanding or little regarding the essential rights of the people, had merely changed the imperial despotism to an aristocratical tyranny. The Catholic religion was established in its most intolerant form, the power of arbitrary imprisonment was assumed, the liberty of the press was disallowed, and the immunities of the privileged orders confirmed and even extended. In the midst of these transactions, died (February, 1790,) the Emperor Joseph, who was succeeded in his hereditary dominions by his brother Leopold, Grand Duke of Tuscany, who now took upon him the style and title of King of Hungary. As the sovereign of a small state, this Prince had acquired the character of moderation, and even sagacity; but, in proportion to the elevation of his situation his faults became conspicuous, and his excellencies were unobserved.

* The appointment of Cardinal Leomine de Brienne, Archbishop of Toulouse, which has been already mentioned, as successor to M. de Calonne, proved the source of equal disappointment to the court and to the nation. On his elevation, his patriotism seemed to vanish; and, by losing the confidence of the people, he deprived himself of the power of being serviceable to the monarch. The project of the court to obtain the sanction of the assembly of notables to the measures in contemplation had proved wholly abortive: it consequently became necessary to raise money by the King's edict alone; and the doubling of the land tax, the re-establishment of the third twentieth, and a stamp duty, were immediately proposed. To render these effective, however, it was absolutely necessary that they should be registered by the Parliament of Paris, on whose deliberations the eyes of the whole kingdom were now turned; but, instead of a ready compliance, as was expected, the Parliament exhibited a steady opposition, and even insisted, that a true account of the state of the finances, and of the purposes to which the sums in question were to be applied, should be previously laid before it. As soon as the King learned that the Parliament had refused to register the edict, he had recourse to a bed of justice, which met on the 6th of August, 1787, and registered the edict. The next day the Parliament entered a formal protest against the registration of the edict, declaring it to be prepared against its approbation and consent; and adding, that the first person who presumed to carry it into execution should be adjudged a traitor, and condemned to the gallies! A few days afterwards, the King ordered the hall of the Parliament to be surrounded by a body of troops, and banished the members to Troyes, in Champagne. They were, however, recalled soon after; and, at nine o'clock in the morning of the 14th of November, the King visited the Parliament, and produced two edicts, which were required to be enforced, one of which indicated a new loan to the amount of about 19,000,000*l.* sterling. A discussion continued for nine hours, when his Majesty suddenly arose, and commanded the edicts to be instantly registered. This being considered as a direct violation of the forms of this assembly, the Duke of Orleans, anxious for popularity, protested against the proceedings, which, he said, had been rendered null and void by the unprecedented conduct of the sovereign. The King, in return, immediately sent the Duke into exile, and issued lettres de cachet against two other members. These proceedings occasioned warm remonstrances on the part of the Parliament, who at length declared, "That it was neither in their power, in that of the crown, nor of both united, to grant or to levy any new taxes upon the people!" At this moment, M. de Brienne, the prime minister, was secretly aiming a deadly blow at the power of the assembly, by the project of a cour pleniére, composed of Princes, Peers, Magistrates, and military men, devoted to the court, by which the royal edicts were henceforward to be registered. This produced a fresh remonstrance, containing an attack on the ministers, a protest against the plans in agitation, and a declaration, that "France is a kingdom governed by a King, according to the laws; and that the raising of subsidies is in the nation, represented by the States General duly convened." On this, the hall of the Parliament was again encircled by troops, and some of its members seized and confined. The King also held a bed of justice, on the 8th of May, 1788, in which he presented a number of edicts to be registered; among these was one for the establishment of the cour pleniére, and another for the diminution of the members of the Parliament of Paris, from one hundred and twenty, to sixty-seven, as had been done by Louis XI. The magistrates having entered a solemn protest, his Majesty was advised to shut up the place of their deliberations by means of an armed force; he at the same time suspended all the Parliaments throughout the kingdom;—a measure which was opposed by an address, signed by forty-seven Peers and Bishops, in behalf of themselves and the nation.

In consequence of these proceedings, commotions of an alarming nature ensued. In Brittany, the nobles and the people seemed to suspend their disputes on purpose to investigate public grievances; the intermediate commission of the states exhibited great firmness on this occasion; Rennes, the capital of the province, experienced an unusual degree of agitation. Of the members constituting the Parliaments of Toulouse and Grenoble, part were in exile and part in prison; and the inhabitants were so irritated, that they had driven the governor of Languedoc out of his capital; while the troops, hitherto the firm supporters of arbitrary power in every monarchy, and particularly in France, refused to fire upon the populace. At Grenoble, in Dauphiny, the peasants collected in large bodies from the neighbouring country, to assist the townsmen, if necessary, against the soldiery; and terror and indignation, rage and dismay, every where prevailed.

The court, seriously alarmed, now dismissed the ministers; and such was the deplorable state of the finances, that only part of the demands on the treasury was paid in cash, the remainder being liquidated by means of bills, due at the end of the year. The appearance of a partial bankruptcy was only avoided by a royal edict, enjoining all bankers, and others, to receive the paper of the caisse d'escompte as money. In addition to this, a scarcity was threatened, and many of the people were actually perishing for want of bread: the notion therefore became prevalent, that the States General alone could rescue the nation from impending ruin.

On the entreaty of M. Neckar, who had been recalled to the office of minister of finance, his Majesty consented to the convocation of the States General. An order of council was at length procured on the 27th of December, declaring that the deputies to the States General should amount to at least one thousand; that the number sent by each bailiwick should be in a ratio compounded of its population and taxes; and lastly, that the members of the third should be equal to the joint amount of the other two estates. Neckar, it should be observed, was brought up in the counting house of a banker, and having an education precisely calculated for such a situation, was utterly unacquainted with the science of government, and knew as little of the qualities and duties of a statesman, as of the forms and etiquette of a Chinese court. A foreigner by birth, a Calvinist by faith, and a republican in principle, he was one of the last men in the world who should have been entrusted with the destinies of a Catholic monarchy, at any time, but more particularly at a period when a turbulent spirit of innovation had gone forth, and when the people were ripe for every act of violence and outrage against persons and institutions, which, till now, they had been taught to respect, and accustomed to venerate.

The States General, after a lapse of one hundred and twenty-five years, at length assembled at Versailles, on the 5th of May, 1789. The ceremony commenced with an act of devotion; the representatives of the nation, preceded by the ministers of the altar, and followed by the King, repaired to the temple of the deity, amidst an immense crowd, who offered up vows for the success of their endeavours to reform and regenerate the state. After a long ceremonial, the King, seated in a magnificent alcove, with the Queen on his left hand, and the Princes and Princesses of the blood around him, delivered a discourse to the assembly, in which he expressed his hope, that the convocation of the States General would communicate new vigour to the nation, re-establish public credit, and open additional sources of happiness. The speech of his Majesty was listened to with profound attention, and hailed with repeated bursts of applause. The keeper of the seals followed, and M. Neckar succeeded a distorting medium, were viewed, by the multitude, with a favourable aspect. Nor was this at all strange. Attachment to the British constitution naturally generates an abhorrence of despotism, under every possible form and shape. And to this principle may, probably, be attributed the praise which many men, of superior intellects, bestowed on, what they considered, the efforts of the French nation to shake off the shackles of tyranny, and to establish a new government, on the basis of civil liberty. But such men must have contemplated the Revolution the keeper of the seals, in a pompous but unmeaning speech of great length, in which he wished to direct the attention of the assembly principally to the state of the finances, which he allowed to be deranged, but stated the actual deficit not to exceed fifty-six millions of French livres.

After this sitting, some disputes arose between the respective orders. The third estate, (the Commons,) to the number of 583, declared themselves the representatives of the nation; and their first act was to declare all the imposts illegal, because they had not been consented to by the nation. They, however, re-enacted them instantly in the name of their constituents, declaring, that they ceased on the very day on which the present assembly should be dissolved. All future proceedings were prevented in consequence of a step on the part of the King, who, on the 20th of June, declared, by a herald at arms, that the debates of the assembly were suspended, and that it was his Majesty's intention to hold a royal session on the 22d. The members of the assembly, thus finding themselves excluded from the national hall, by a guard of soldiers, now assembled in the tennis-court at Versailles, and the people, stimulated by the conduct of their deputies, in their turn excited new zeal by their plaudits. Some of the soldiery, even formed a guard of honour at the entrance, while one of the members, who had been confined to his bed, caused himself to be carried into the hall: and, as though actuated by one general impulse, all the deputies arose and took an oath never to separate until the constitution should be formed, and the regeneration of France accomplished.

The three orders were assembled by the King's command, in royal session, on the 23d of June. The speech which the King had been advised to deliver on this occasion, was little calculated to give satisfaction to the nation. After lamenting the disputes which had taken place, his Majesty insisted on maintaining the distinction of orders, and annulled the celebrated decree, by which the Commons had declared themselves the national assembly. He at the same time alluded to the benefits which he was preparing to confer on his people; but nothing positive was said relative to the liberty of the press, or the participation of the States General in the enaction of laws; on the other hand, he hinted at the retention of the most unpopular of all the prerogatives claimed by the crown—that of lettres de cachet, subject, however, to certain restrictions; and the continuance of the tyrannical privileges arising out of the feudal system.

The sittings of the assembly having been continued, an union of the orders took place, and on the 27th, 47 of the nobles, headed by the Duke of Orleans, repaired to the hall of the states, and the minority of the clergy and the majority of the nobles, at the express recommendation of the King, whose intentions were as good as his conduct was imbecile, followed their example.

Notwithstanding these appearances of cordiality, orders had been for some time issued by the court to collect a large body of troops; and as the French soldiery could not now be depended on, foreigners were necessarily employed. Thirty-five thousand men were already cantoned in the neighbourhood of the capital; twenty thousand more were expected; a formidable train of artillery was provided at a prodigious expence; camps began to be traced out; the commanding eminences were crowned with batteries; the roads and bridges were occupied by military posts; and the Marshal de Broglio was nominated to the chief command. The capital, ever jealous of the court, and alarmed at these formidable preparations, was now greatly agitated. The people assembled in prodigious multitudes in the gardens of the Palais Royal, and dividing into groups, were addressed by certain persons, whom they styled "orators," with a degree of eloquence that did not fail to please and even to fascinate. A large body of the soldiery began to make common cause with the inhabitants. Nor were other means of seduction wanting: they were loaded with presents and caresses; they were feasted for whole days and nights in the Palais Royal, the residence of the factious Duke of Orleans; and to the delights of wine, were added the fascinations of gold, and the allurements of the softer sex.

On the 12th of July, Neckar was suddenly deprived of his office, and sent into exile; and a new administration was formed, all the members of which were considered as the decided advocates of the ancient regime. Whilst the deputies, incapable of resistance, stood aghast, the citizens of Paris were taking measures to alter the destiny of the assembly, the monarch, and the empire. They began by carrying in triumph the busts of Neckar and the Duke of Orleans. They were attacked by a patrole of the Royal Allemande, and several persons were wounded, but the guard was at length obliged to take refuge in the Thuilleries. At this critical period, Gorsas, then a school master, and afterwards a deputy, with a stentorian voice, harangued a large body of citizens in one quarter; at the same time that Camille Desmoulins, a celebrated advocate, with a pistol in each hand, addressed an inflammatory oration to the surrounding multitude in another; and after being exhausted with fatigue, and rendered unable to proceed, still articulated the words,—"To arms! to arms!" Whilst the women and children, terrified at the first appearance of the troops, rent the air with their shrieks and lamentations, the alarm bell was rung in every parish; the theatres were shut; cannons were fired by way of signal; some of the citizens barricaded their houses, and prepared to defend themselves against the assailants; while the multitude, unprovided with any certain means of annoyance, rushed into, and seized all the arms to be found in the shops of the gun-smiths and armourers, and then proceeded towards the town-house. At this critical moment, the Marquis de Valadi, formerly an officer in the French guards, repaired to the barracks, where he excited the passions, aroused the ambition, and subdued the fidelity of the troops. At nine o'clock in the evening, the guards accordingly sallied out, when, being joined by patroles of armed citizens, as well as by a mob, many of whom carried torches, they attacked and dispersed a company of the Royal Allemande. The fugitives having retreated to the main body of their regiment, posted in the Place de Louis XV. twelve hundred of the guards repaired to the Palais Royal, where they held a council of war, and at length determined, though destitute of both officers and artillery, to give battle to the "foreign troops."—They accordingly commenced their march, obtained a complete victory, obliged them to retreat, drove them before them to the Boulevards, and at length forced all the regular troops to evacuate Paris, and withdraw to Versailles. An extraordinary circumstance occurred at this moment, which tended not a little to produce and accelerate the catastrophe which ensued. Twenty thousand men of different nations, who had been employed in cutting roads over Montmartre, but who were now without bread, and without occupation, threatened to plunder the capital, which was itself rapidly approaching to a state of famine. These banditti had already approached to the suburbs, and after burning the outlet called the White Barriers, began to enter several houses.—To meet this emergency, it was resolved to form a city militia, and the citizens ran in crowds to inscribe their names, as the defenders of their country. Arms being still wanting, upwards of thirty thousand men ran to the hospital of the invalids, seized on the artillery, and obtained possession of about fifty thousand muskets, sabres, and pikes, which had been concealed there. The citizens were immediately marshalled, and more than sixty thousand enrolled and distributed into companies; patroles were established in every district; the serjeants and grenadiers of the French guards were appointed officers: cannon were immediately posted on the Pont Neuf, the Pont Royal, and in all the avenues leading to Versailles; while the Place Dauphine was provided with a numerous artillery, and became the head-quarters of the insurgent army.

On the morning of the memorable 14th of July, some unknown individual, after attracting the attention of the citizens, exclaimed—"Let us take the Bastile!" The cry of "To the Bastile!" instantly resounded from rank to rank, from street to street, from the Palais Royal to the suburbs of St. Antoine. An army, composed of citizens and soldiers, provided with pikes forged during the night, with muskets procured at the invalids, with gilded lances and battle-axes, snatched from the Garde Meuble, was immediately formed, and the French guards were prevailed upon to join this motley crew. Their first attempt was to enter the court by force; but they were told that, if they persisted, they would be fired upon; and, after some time had elapsed, a few musquets were fired from the castle, which had the effect of dispersing the mob. They soon, however, assembled again; and two men who pretended to be deputed by some of the district committees, one Belon, an officer, and Thurcot de la Roziere, an attorney, were admitted by the governor, who assured them that he had no hostile intentions, and should only defend himself, if attacked. He also, most imprudently, informed them, that the cannon were not loaded, and were even removed from the embrasures, a fact which he permitted them to ascertain. He went still further, and, as if intending to encourage the mob to attack him, he exacted an oath from his officers and men, in the presence of these deputed citizens, that they would not make use of their arms unless they should be attacked. The deputies professed to be satisfied; and promised to appease the mob; but the mob, during this parley, had increased so much that the deputies could not be heard, and they had nearly lost their lives in the attempt. During this truce, two men made their way from the top of a perfumer's house to a wall close to the first drawbridge, at the entrance of the Bastile; from thence they reached the guard-house, and leaped into the court. These men were followed by others, who immediately lowered the small drawbridge, for the admission of foot passengers; and proceeded to break the chain of the great drawbridge; by the fall of which one man was crushed to death, and another severely hurt. The mob rushed in, and, in a short time, completely pillaged the governor's house. M. de Launay might, with the greatest facility, have destroyed the whole body of insurgents, by firing on them with canister shot; but, wishing rather to frighten than to hurt them, he ordered a discharge of musquetry upon those who had entered the court, by which some of them were wounded, and the rest put to flight. Had this discharge been followed up by others, and a few cannon fired, not a man would have been left within sight of the Bastile. The mob, however, having brought the cannon which they had taken at the Invalids, renewed their attempt on the Bastile. The cannon played upon the castle; while the soldiers, who appeared on the walls, were shot from the tops of the neighbouring houses. In this manner was the garrison, consisting of a hundred and fourteen men, of which eighty-two were invalids, and thirty-two Swiss, attacked by thirty thousand of the rabble, assisted by a great number of the French guards. When they had succeeded in setting the governor's house, and the guard house, on fire, a deputation from the electors, at the town-house arrived, preceded by a white flag. The deputies, however, were prevented by the mob from advancing; and Monsieur de Launay, observing the flag to be stationary, ordered some musquets to be fired, which, however, did no execution. The mob, observing this, brought two pieces of artillery up, and planted them at the opening of the avenue to the castle. The governor then ordered Revolution in the abstract, and have looked to remote consequences, which their ardent imagination represented to them as certain, without descending to any minuteness of enquiry into the motives in which it originated, the means by which it was accomplished, or the effects which it had actually produced. But while the love of freedom led many, certainly without due consideration, to admire the French Revolution, the admiration of others flowed from a very different source;—from a revolutionary ardour, and a fondness for innovation, which ordered another volley of musquetry, and a cannon loaded with canister shot, to be fired from the top of one of the towers into the Rue d'Antoine, at the extremity of which the Bastile was situated. Another deputation was now sent from the town-house, headed by the Abbe Fauchet; but these deputies were as easily dissuaded as the former, from approaching the scene of action: and the Abbe Fauchet, having more effrontery than courage, magnified the danger which he feared, and returned to give a doleful account of the horrors which he had witnessed. A third deputation was now sent, which, as well as the second, had the following written instructions: "The permanent committee of the Parisian militia, taking into consideration that there ought to be no military force in Paris, but that of the city, charge the deputies, whom they send to the Marquis de Launay, commander of the Bastile, to ask him if he is disposed to receive the Parisian militia, to defend it, in concert with the troops already there, and to be under the command of the city. Done at the Hotel de Nille, July 14, 1789. Signed de Flesselles, Provost and President of the Committee; De la Nigne, President of the Electors, &c. &c." This deputation, however, like the others; returned without executing their commission. But had it made its way to the Bastile, it is perfectly clear that the commander must have rejected, with indignation, the proffered terms, which proposed to make one of the King's officers a leader of rebels; for those electors were as much in a state of rebellion, by raising an armed force, and deposing his Majesty's officers, as the French guards, and the rabble who were attacking his fortresses. The line of duty which Monsieur de Launay had to pursue, was so perfectly clear as not to admit of either hesitation or doubt. He had no alternative, consistently with his duty, but to defend himself to the last extremity, and rather to bury himself in the ruins of the castle, than suffer the royal flag to be lowered to the standard of revolt. But fear, or some other unworthy motive, made him adopt a different line of conduct. He caused the drums to beat a parley, and held out a napkin as an indication of his wish to capitulate. As the danger diminished, the fury of the mob increased, and this pacific signal was hailed with repeated vollies of musquetry and cannon. M. de Launay having appealed to his men, they requested him to stipulate only that they should not be massacred. A piece of paper was then passed to the mob, on which was written: "We have twenty thousand weight of powder, and if you do not accept our capitulation, we will blow up the garrison, and all the quarters about it." And an officer, at the same time, said, "We are willing to surrender, provided we are assured that the troops shall not be massacred." The answer to this was an unanimous exclamation: "On the faith of French soldiers we accept it, and will do you no harm; let down the bridge." Confiding in this assurance, M. de Launay caused one of the drawbridges to be let down, when some of the mob rushed in, and would have been followed by the rest, if some of the French guards, who were there, had not interposed to prevent them. The sentry, who opened the little gate, asked the first, who came up, what they wanted. "The Bastile to be surrendered," they answered, and, at the same instant, the great drawbridge was lowered, and before it was quite down, a grenadier of the French guards leaped in, and the populace followed him.

Although the ministers were culpable for not having taken any measures for averting the coming storm, the symptoms of which were too strong and decisive to be either mistaken or overlooked, M. de Launay was not the less reprehensible for having entered into any kind of compromise with a furious mob. Had he defended the Bastile, as he ought, the place was impregnable. Be that as it may, the unfortunate governor was amply punished for his misconduct. The people, in violation of their plighted faith, seized him, the instant they entered the Bastile, dragged him to the Place de Greve, where after having subjected him to every kind of insult and outrage, on the way, they cut off his head, fixed it on the head of a pike, and paraded it through the streets to the Palais Royal. Most of the invalids, too, who were in the Bastile, were murdered, without mercy, by the mob. The Bastile having been thus basely surrendered, it remained to release those victims of tyranny, with which this horrible den of despotism was always said to be crowded! But what was the surprise, and disappointment of the insurgents, when, on forcing their way into the towers, in which the prisoners were confined, they found only seven persons. The names of these persons were Pujade, Béchade, La Roche, La Caurege, the Count de Solages, Tavernier, and Whyt, the four first of them were committed on a charge of forgery; the Count de Solages was confined, at the request of his family, for offences not known, but which M. de Bertrand assures us, were of the most serious nature," and the two last were mad! The horrors of this memorable day were completed by the murder of M. de Flesselles, the Provost, who was shot by one of the rabble, at the instigation of that very body of electors whose president he was, on the vague charge of having corresponded with M. de Launay, which there was not the shadow of a proof to support, for which, indeed, there was not the smallest foundation. His head was severed from his body, and, being placed on a pike, was carried, with that of M. de Launay, about the streets of Paris. In this procession of civilized cannibals, appeared a private of the French guards, on a litter crowned with laurels, and wearing the cross of St. Louis. This man, whose looks betrayed his alarm at the unmerited and unwelcome honors thus unexpectedly showered upon him, had been drinking at a public house, in the vicinity of the Bastile, during the attack on that fortress; and did not repair to the scene of action, till an hour after its surrender. Some workmen mistook him for one of those who had been lately employed in the siege, decorated him, in the manner already described, much against his will, and, mistaking his reluctance for modesty, carried him in triumph to the Place de Greve. The man acknowledged, the next day, that he had suffered the most bitter anguish, till he escaped from these furies, for he fully expected that they were carrying him to the place of execution, and that his head, also, was destined to grace this horrible procession.

Astonished and intimidated at these proceedings, the King appeared in person the next day in the national assembly, and declared "that he had issued orders for the immediate removal of the troops." A burst of joy and acclamation succeeded; M. Neckar was almost immediately recalled and reinstated in his office; the Count d'Artois, Marshal Broglio, the Prince of Conde, and others of the noblesse were compelled to seek for safety in flight, and on the 17th of July, the King made his triumphal entry into Paris.

The assembly now proceeded without interruption in their labours; and, amongst the decrees, which they passed, were those which pronounced the annihilation of all feudal privileges; the abolition of all distinction of orders; the resumption of tithes and other ecclesiastical and monastic property; the dissolution of monastic institutions; the allotment of the kingdom into a new territorial division, under the name of departments, eighty-three in number, nearly equal in population and extent; finally, the extinction of the provincial Parliaments, and the establishment of departmental assemblies, of courts of justice, and the trial by jury in each department. The general principles on which the government of the kingdom was modelled were comprehended in a Declaration of Rights, drawn up in the following terms:—

"I. Men were born, and always continue, free and equal with respect to their rights. Civil distinctions, therefore, can be founded only on public utility.

"II. The end of all political associations is the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of man. And these rights are liberty, property, security, and resistance to oppression.

"III. The nation is essentially the source of all sovereignty.

"IV. Political liberty consists in the power of doing whatever does not injure another.

"V. The law ought only to prohibit actions hurtful to society.

"VI. The law is an expression of the will of the community. All being equal in its sight, are equally eligible to all honours, places, and employments, without any other distinction than that created by their talents and virtues.

"VII. No man shall be accused, arrested, or held in confinement, except in cases determined by the law, and according to the forms which it has prescribed.

"VIII. No one ought to be punished but in virtue of a law promulgated before the offence.

"IX. Every man is to be presumed innocent till conviction of guilt.

"X. No man ought to be molested on account of his opinions, not even his religious opinions; provided his avowal of them does not disturb the public order.

"XI. Every man may speak, write, and publish freely—being responsible for the abuses of this liberty in cases determined by law.

"XII. A public force is necessary only to give security to the rights of men and citizens.

"XIII. Public contributions ought to be divided equally among the members of the community, according to their several abilities.

"XIV. Every citizen has a right, by himself or his representative, to a free voice in determining the necessity and appropriation of public contributions.

"XV. Every community has a right to demand of its agents an account of their conduct.

"XVI. Every community, in which the separation of powers is not determined, nor a security of rights provided for, wants a constitution.

"XVII. The rights to property being inviolable and sacred, no one ought to be deprived of it, except in cases of evident public necessity legally ascertained, and upon condition of a previous and just indemnity.

"The National Assembly, desirous of establishing the French constitution on the principles which it has just now recognised and declared, abolishes irrevocably those institutions which are injurious to liberty, and equality of rights.

"There is no longer any nobility, nor peerage, nor hereditary distinctions, nor difference of orders, nor feudal governments, nor patrimonial jurisdictions, nor any of the titles, denominations, and prerogatives which are derived from them; nor any of the orders of chivalry, corporations, or decorations, for which proofs of nobility were required; nor any kind of superiority but that of public functionaries, in the exercise of their functions.

"No public office is henceforth hereditary or purchasable.

"No part of the nation, nor any individual, can henceforth possess any privilege or exception from the common rights of all Frenchmen.

"There are no more wardenships or corporations in professions, arts, or trades.

"The law recognises no longer any religious vow, nor any other engagement which would be contrary to natural rights, or to the constitution."

By

which led them to look on all resistance to power as commendable, to confound revolt with liberty, and to convert conspirators into patriots. Amidst this general predilection for the new politics of regenerated France, there were some few enlightened minds, who viewed the French rebellion with horror, who considered the principles broached by the leading members of the National Assembly, and adopted by the majority, as striking at the very root of society; and who foresaw that those outrageous proceedings, instead of producing such a change in the condition of the French people, as every friend to rational and well regulated freedom must desire, would bring forth the most calamitous consequences, and terminate either in popular anarchy, or in the establishment of unqualified despotism. Amongst its most ardent admirers, was an assemblage of persons, who had associated themselves for the purpose of commemorating the British Revolution of 1688; and who appear to have seen, in that event, nothing but what was revolutionary as deserving of their praise, and thence to have conceived an idea, that they were bound to stand forth the champions of every revolution in every country. The members of this "Revolutionary Society" were chiefly dissenters from the established church; but the president, at the period in question, was a British Peer, remarkable for the eccentricity of his mind. Dr. Price, a dissenting minister, equally eminent for his talents and his zeal, who was one of its most distinguished members, could not suffer the opportunity to escape, which an anniversary meeting afforded, (in November, 1789) for proclaiming his admiration of the new principles which had been promulgated at Paris and Versailles.—The committee laid down three fundamental principles:—

I. That all civil and political authority is derived from the people.

II. That the abuse of power justifies resistance.

III. That the right of private judgment, liberty of conscience, trial by jury, and the freedom of election, ought ever to be held sacred and inviolable.

They then resolved to congratulate the members of the Society "on the glorious success of the French Revolution," and to express "their ardent wishes that the influence of so glorious an example may be felt by all mankind, until tyranny and despotism shall be swept from the face of the globe;" the Doctor moved a congratulatory address to the National Assembly of France, which was unanimously adopted. In this address, the Society offered to the National Assembly of France, their congratulations on the revolution in that country, and on the prospect it gave to the two first kingdoms in the world of a common participation in the blessings of civil and religious liberty. They expressed the particular satisfaction with which they reflected on the tendency of the glorious example given in France to encourage other nations to assert the unalienable rights of mankind, and thereby to introduce a general reformation in the governments of Europe, and to make the world free and happy. The resolution of this club was accordingly transmitted to the National Assembly, whose President duly acknowledged the honour conferred upon them.

At the time that public opinion took this direction, Mr. Pitt, and his colleagues, remained perfectly quiescent, and contented themselves with a renewal of their assurances of continued amity with France, without expressing either approbation or disapprobation of the measures of internal policy, which the government, or rather the National Assembly, had thought proper to adopt.

A. D. 1790.] Such was the state of affairs, when the British Parliament assembled, on the 21st of January. The King's speech contained nothing remarkable. It slightly glanced at the affairs of France, in declaring "the internal situation of the different parts of Europe to have been productive of events which had engaged his Majesty's most serious attention." Early indications, however, appeared of the light in which the recent transactions in that kingdom were viewed by the English government. Lord Valletort, in moving the address, took occasion to contrast the tranquil and prosperous situation of England with the anarchy and licentiousness of France, and to denounce the revolution in that kingdom as an event the most disastrous, and productive of consequences the most fatal, which had ever taken place since the foundation of the monarchy.

Soon afterwards, upon the debate which took place on the army estimates, Mr. Burke observed, that, on a review of Europe, he did not find that we stood in the smallest danger from any one state or kingdom it contained; nor that any foreign powers, but our own allies, were likely to obtain a preponderance in the scale.—"France (said he) has hitherto been our first object in all considerations concerning the balance of power: but France is in a political light to be considered as expunged out of the system of Europe. Whether she could ever appear in it again, as a leading power, was not easy to determine: but at present he considered France as not politically existing: and most assuredly, it would take much time to restore her to her former active existence. It was said, as she had speedily fallen, she might speedily rise again. He doubted this. The fall from a height was with an accelerated velocity; but to lift a weight up to that height again was difficult, and opposed by the laws of physical and political gravitation. In a political view, France was low indeed; she had lost every thing, even to her name. He was astonished at it. He was alarmed at it. He trembled at the uncertainty of all human greatness. The French had shewn themselves the ablest architects of ruin that had hitherto appeared in the world. In one short summer they had completely pulled down to the ground their monarchy, their church, their nobility, their law, their army, and their revenue. Were we absolute conquerors, and France to lie prostrate at our feet, we should blush to impose upon them terms so destructive to all their consequence as a nation, as the durance they had imposed upon themselves. In the last age we were in danger of being entangled by the example of France, in the net of a relentless despotism—a despotism, indeed, proudly arrayed in manners, gallantry, splendor, magnificence, and even covered over with the imposing robes of science and literature. Our present danger, from the example of a people whose character knows no medium, is, with regard to government, a danger from licentious violence—a danger of being led from admiration to imitation of the excesses of an unprincipled, plundering, ferocious, bloody, and tyrannical democracy—of a people whose government is anarchy, and whose religion is atheism. What the French nation valued themselves upon was, in his opinion, a disgrace to them. They had gloried, and some

By this time, the National Assembly had acquired an ascendancy over the nation, and its popularity was daily increasing both in the capital and the provinces. Between the assembly and the court considerable jealousies existed, which were heightened by the introduction of a corps of Swiss guards into the metropolis. By the arts of the Duke of Orleans, a factitious famine was created; and the inhabitants of Paris were thrown into a state of violent agitation. The commotion began among the women, who, on the morning of the 5th of October, ran about the streets, crying out "Bread! Bread!" Seizing on a person of the name of Maillard, they forced him to become their conductor; and being joined by a multitude of armed men, and followed by a company of the volunteers of the Bastile, and several cannon, they set out for Versailles, the residence of the royal family. The national guards, actuated by a similar impulse, insisted on marching thither also; and La Fayette, after obtaining the sanction of the municipality, deemed it prudent to accede to the proposition. He was unable, however, to prevent the events that ensued; for some of the mob, having burst into the castle, sacrificed two of the body guards to their fury, and the life of the Queen was perhaps saved by the gallantry of a third, called Miomandre. The guards now, for the first time, placed the national cockade in their hats, and supplicated for mercy. On this, the popular fury seemed to subside, but the cry of "To Paris! to Paris!" clearly intimated their intentions, and his Majesty thought proper to comply. The King accordingly repaired thither, on the 6th of October, preceded by an executioner, between two wretches, each carrying a bloody head of one of the murdered guards on a pike, accompanied by an immense mob, a deputation of two hundred members of the national assembly, the troops of Paris, and the French guards, who had prevented much violence and bloodshed. His Majesty took up his abode in the Palace of the Thuilleries, which was totally unprepared for his reception; and, on the 19th of October (1789) the National Assembly held its first sitting in the capital.

people in England had thought fit to take share in that glory, in making a revolution. All the horrors and all the crimes of the anarchy which led to this revolution, which attend its progress, and which may eventually result from its establishment, pass for nothing. The French have made their way through the destruction of their country to a bad constitution, when they were absolutely in possession of a good one. Instead of redressing grievances, and improving the fabric of their state, to which they were called by their monarch and sent by their country, they had rashly destroyed all the balances and counterpoises which serve to fix the state and to give it a steady direction. These they had melted down into one incongruous ill-connected mass; and, with the most atrocious perfidy and violation of all faith among men, laid the axe to the root of all property, and consequently of all national prosperity, by the principles they established, and the example they set in confiscating all the possessions of the church. They had made and recorded a sort of institute and digest of anarchy, called 'A Declaration of the Rights of Man:' thus systematically destroying every hold of authority, by opinion, religious or civil, on the minds of the people. By this mad declaration they had subverted the state, and brought on such calamities as no country, without a long war, had ever been known to suffer. He felt some concern that this strange thing called a Revolution in France should be compared with the glorious event commonly called the Revolution in England. In truth, the circumstances of our Revolution, as it was called, and that of France, were just the reverse of each other in almost every particular, and in the whole spirit of the transaction. What we did was in truth and substance not a revolution made, but prevented. We took solid securities; we settled doubtful questions; we corrected anomalies in our law. In the stable fundamental parts of our constitution we made no revolution; no, nor any alteration at all. We did not impair the monarchy. The nation kept the same ranks, the same subordinations, the same franchises, the same order in the law, the revenue, and the magistracy—the same Lords, the same Commons, the same corporations, the same electors. The church was not impaired: her estates, her majesty, her splendor, her orders and gradations, continued the same: she was preserved in her full efficiency, and cleared only of that intolerance which was her weakness and disgrace. Was little done then, because a revolution was not made in the constitution? No—every thing was done; because we commenced with reparation, not with ruin. Instead of lying in a sort of epileptic trance, exposed to the pity or derision of the world, for her wild, ridiculous, convulsive movements, the state flourished; Great Britain rose above the standard of her former self. All the energies of the country were awakened, and a new æra of prosperity commenced, which still continues, not only unimpaired, but receiving growth and improvement under the wasting hand of time."

Mr. Fox warmly expressed "his total dissent from opinions so hostile to the general principles of liberty; and which he was grieved to hear from the lips of a man whom he loved and revered—by whose precepts he had been taught, by whose example he had been animated to engage in their defence. He vindicated the conduct of the French army, in refusing to act against their fellow-citizens, from the aspersions of Mr. Burke, who had charged them with abetting an abominable sedition by mutiny and desertion—declaring that, if he could view a standing military force with less constitutional jealousy than before, it was owing to the noble spirit manifested by the French army, who, on becoming soldiers, had proved that they did not forfeit their character as citizens, and would not act as the mere instruments of a despot. The scenes of bloodshed and cruelty that had been acted in France, no man could hear of without lamenting. But when the grievous tyranny that the people had so long groaned under was considered, the excesses they had committed in their efforts to shake off the yoke could not excite our astonishment so much as our regret. And as to the contrast which Mr. Burke had exhibited, respecting the mode in which the two revolutions in England and France were conducted, it must be remembered, that the situation of the two kingdoms was totally different. In France, a free constitution was to be created: in England it wanted only to be secured. If the fabric of government in England suffered less alteration, it was because it required less alteration. If a general destruction of the ancient constitution had taken place in France, it was because the whole system was radically hostile to liberty, and that every part of it breathed the direful spirit of despotism."

Mr. Sheridan pronounced the French Revolution to be as just as our own, proceeding upon as sound a principle, and a greater provocation;—and he vehemently defended the general views and conduct of the National Assembly. He charged Mr. Burke with an unwarrantable freedom of speech respecting that assembly; and with having libelled those illustrious characters, M. Bailly and M. de la Fayette.

Mr. Pitt, without entering into the merits of the revolution, warmly applauded Mr. Burke, for the zealous and seasonable attachment which he had displayed to the principles of the British constitution.

Since the decision of the late session relative to the repeal of the Test Laws, the dissenters had not ceased their efforts, to increase the number of their friends in the House of Commons; and, in contemplation of the approaching general election, they had even recommended a preference in favour of those who had shewn themselves the friends and advocates of what they termed "equal and universal liberty." Instead of Mr. Beaufoy, Mr. Fox was now solicited to move the House a third time for the repeal of the acts in question; to which he readily assented. The nation at large were now led to believe this to be a matter of high and serious import; and counter meetings of the friends of the church were called, in which the repeal of the test was deprecated as fatal to its security. On the 2d of March, Mr. Fox brought forward his motion of repeal, which he supported with wonderful ability. The decision of the House, however, was less favourable than on the former occasion; the motion being negatived, by 294 against 105.

Mr. Flood, the Irish orator, who had sat some years almost undistinguished in the British Parliament, now brought forward a plan of Parliamentary reform, in conformity to which an additional number of representatives, to the amount of one hundred, was to be admitted into the legislative body, in a proportional ratio to the population of each county, by the election of the resident house-holders only. This motion was vehemently opposed by Mr. Windham, member for Norwich, the professed admirer of Mr. Burke; and by Mr. Pitt, who declared, "That, were the motion before them the precise proposition he himself had formerly offered, he should now vote against it, from a conviction of its actual impropriety. But at a more seasonable opportunity he would most certainly again submit his ideas upon the subject to the consideration of the House." The motion was, at length, withdrawn. This session, nothing of importance was effected, respecting the slave trade.

The trial of Mr. Hastings proceeded very slowly; in the entire course of the session, the court sitting only thirteen days. Towards the close of the session, a resolution passed the House, on the motion of Mr. Burke, that the House do authorize the managers to insist only upon such and so many of the charges as may appear to be conducive to the obtaining speedy and effectual justice." The affairs of the East India Company, under the auspices of Lord Cornwallis, appeared to be, at this time, in the most favourable state.

In the month of April Mr. Pitt presented his statement of the national revenue and expenditure; from which it appeared, that the receipt of the Exchequer had surpassed that of the year preceding in the sum of half a million. About a fortnight afterwards, however, (May 5.) a royal messsage was delivered by the minister, announcing circumstances which indicated the approach proach of war. It appears, that the celebrated Captain Cook, in his last voyage of discovery, touching at several ports on the western coast of North America, purchased from the natives a number of valuable furs, bearing a high price in the Chinese market. To encourage this branch of commerce, a spot of ground was, in 1788, procured from the Indians, and a regular establishment, defended by a slight fortification, formed at a place called Nootka Sound, situated about the 50th degree of north latitude. This was regarded by the Spaniards as an encroachment on their exclusive rights of sovereignty; and, consequently, the Princessa, a Spanish man of war, dispatched for this purpose by the viceroy of Mexico, in the following spring, seised upon the fort, and captured the English vessels, Iphigenia, Argonaut, &c. trading on the coast. The Spanish commandant, hoisting the national standard, declared that the whole line of coast from Cape Horn to the 60th degree of north latitude belonged to the King of Spain. After much delay, and loss and vexation to the proprietors, the captured vessels were, however, restored by the viceroy, on the assumption, "that nothing but ignorance of the rights of Spain could have induced the merchants in question to attempt an establishment on that coast." Of these particulars the court of London had been regularly informed by the Spanish ambassador so long ago as the 10th of February; and his Excellency at the same time requested, "that measures might be taken for preventing his Britannic Majesty's subjects from frequenting those coasts, and from carrying on their fisheries in the seas contiguous to the Spanish continent, as derogatory to the incontestable rights of the crown of Spain." The claims of Spain, in relation to her right of dominion and sovereignty in America, were in the highest degree chimerical. Charles III. however, had died in December, 1788, and his son Charles IV. the succeeding sovereign of Spain, confiding in the justice of his claims, offered to submit the decision to any one of the kings of Europe, leaving the choice wholly to his Britannic Majesty. The reply of the court of London to the memorial of the Spanish ambassador is said to have been unnecessarily haughty; and an atonement was demanded for a proceeding so injurious to Great Britain.

On the statement of the case in the royal message, the House of Commons unanimously voted an address to the King, assuring his Majesty of their determination to afford the most zealous and affectionate support in such measures as might become requisite for maintaining the dignity of the crown, and the essential interests of his Majesty's dominions. A vote of credit also passed the House for the sum of one million; and vigorous military and naval preparations were made in both kingdoms, in the contemplation of an immediate declaration of war.

The session closed on the 10th of June; and, on the 11th, the Parliament was dissolved by proclamation.

Unable to contend alone with England, Spain had, in an early stage of the negotiation, applied to France, for aid; but, finding her unwilling to interfere, she complied with the British demand of previous restitution and indemnification; and, on the 22nd of October (1790) a convention was signed at the Escurial, by which every point in dispute was conceded by Spain. The settlement at Nootka was restored; the free navigation and right of fishery in the Southern Pacific were confirmed to Britain; a full liberty of trade and even of settlement was granted to all the north-west coasts of America, beyond the most northerly of the Spanish settlements, unaccompanied, however, by any formal renunciation of their right of sovereignty; and the two powers were on the other hand, equally restrained from attempting any settlement nearer to Cape Horn than the most southerly of the settlements actually formed by Spain. An article was also inserted in this treaty: "That in all future cases of complaint, or supposed infraction of the present convention, no act of violence shall be committed, but an exact report shall be made of the affair to the respective courts, who will terminate such difference amicably."*

On opening the new Parliament, which assembled on the 25th of November (1790) the King expressed "his satisfaction that the differences with Spain were brought to an amicable termination; and observed, that, since the last session of Parliament, a foundation had been laid for a pacification between Austria and the Porte—that a separate peace had actually taken place between Russia and Sweden; but that the war between Russia and the Porte still continued." The terms of the convention with Spain were approved and ratified in both Houses by great majorities—but not unanimously. To defray the expense of the armament, Mr. Pitt, with the resolution of suffering no permanent increase of debt, proposed various temporary taxes, which would discharge the incumbrance in four years—with the assistance of 500,000*l.* which he had it in contemplation to take from the unclaimed dividends lying in the Bank of England, the amount of which he estimated at 660,000*l.* This proposition, which excited alarm in all the great chartered companies, and in the commercial and mercantile world in general, was strongly opposed by Messrs. Fox, Thornton, and Whitbread; and the minister at length consented, by way of compromise, to accept of a loan of 500,000*l.* from the Bank, without interest, so long as a floating balance to that amount should remain in the hands of the cashier.

Mr. Burke soon afterwards moved (December 17) "that the House do resolve itself into a committee, to take into consideration the state of the impeachment of Warren Hastings, Esq." He then made a second motion, "That an impeachment by this House, in the name of the Commons of Great Britain, against Warren Hastings, for high crimes and misdemeanors, is still pending." From this proposition, almost all the lawyers in the House declared their total dissent; and Mr. Erskine, in a very elaborate speech, endeavoured to shew that, in consequence of the dissolution of Parliament, the impeachment had abated. Upon this great question, in the decision of which the honour, the dignity, and the authority of the House were so deeply involved, the Speaker delivered his opinion; and, upon an extensive review of facts and precedents, he gave it

* This year, the Anniversary of the Revolution in France, dated from the fall of the Bastille (July 14), was celebrated throughout the country, particularly at Paris, with great magnificence. The King assisted in person, and took a solemn oath to maintain the constitution. The National Assembly and the armed citizens repeated it amidst the acclamations of innumerable spectators; and the whole kingdom, as it were with one voice, and almost at the same moment, swore to live free or die. In England, also, the French Revolution was commemorated by those who regarded it in a favourable light. Soon afterwards, Mr. Burke published a work, intituled "Reflections on the French Revolution," written with a force of eloquence and energy of declamation calculated to produce the most powerful effects. The object of this treatise was two-fold:

1. To expose to the public resentment and indignation those persons who had in this country manifested their approbation of the revolution in France; and

2. To place that revolution itself in an odious light, as an event to be deplored, detested, and deprecated.

In an appendix, he invited and exhorted all Christian princes to make, "a common cause with a just prince dethroned by rebels and traitors." The deluded people of France, to be rescued from the evils which they had brought upon themselves, must, as he affirmed, be subdued; and he recommended, that this war, or crusade, should be conducted on principles different from any former one. The members of the Revolution Society, and the other commemorators of the French revolution, he strongly inveighed against; and he charged Dr. Price in particular with having fulminated, in his revolution sermon, principles little short of treason and rebellion. This extraordinary production gave rise to numberless replies, of which the most memorable was "The Rights of Man," written by Thomas Paine. Not content with pointing out what he regarded as the misrepresentations of Mr. Burke, and the abuses and corruptions of the existing government, he daringly attacked the principles of the constitution itself, indecently describing it as radically vicious and tyrannical; and reprobating the introduction of aristocracy or monarchy, under whatever modifications, into any form of government, as a flagrant usurpation and invasion of "the unalienable rights of man." This tract unfortunately appeared at a time when a large proportion of the community were in a state of great irritation and discontent; and as it was written in a popular style and manner, innumerable converts were made to its sytem, and infinite pains were taken to circulate it amongst the body of the people. Political institutions were also formed in every part of the kingdom, professing to have in view the reform of the constitution, but which, with too much reason, were suspected really to aim at its subversion.

as his decided judgment, That the impeachment was still legally pending. In this opinion Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, and the most eminent Parliamentary authorities on both sides, concurred.

After a short interval Mr. Burke, adverting to the perpetual obstructions thrown in the way of this trial by the body of the law, made a third motion, (December 23) that the managers be instructed to proceed to no other parts of the impeachment, excepting such as relate to contracts, pensions, and allowances; which was carried, with slight opposition. After considerable delay, the Lords proceeded with the trial; and, on the 2d of June, 1791, Mr. Hastings opened his defence, in a speech occupying many hours.*

A. D. 1791.] Soon after the Parliamentary recess (February 21,) Mr. Mitford (now Lord Redesdale) moved, under the sanction and approbation of government, for a bill to relieve such of the English Catholics from the legal penalties still existing and in force against them, which bill passed through both Houses without a dissenting voice.

Mr. Fox next moved for a bill to ascertain the rights of juries in the matter of libel. It passed the Commons;† but, on its transmission to the Lords, it was opposed on the second reading by the Lord-Chancellor, on pretence of its being too late in the session to discuss a measure of such importance; and the bill was consequently postponed.

Mr. Wilberforce, on the 18th of April, brought forward his long expected motion for the abolition of the Slave Trade, which he introduced with a copious and masterly display of the arguments in favour of that measure. His specific motion was, "for a bill to prevent the further importation of African negroes into the British colonies;" but, unfortunately for humanity, it was negatived by a majority of seventy-five voices.

A discussion now incidentally arose, the result of which, in a political point of view, was of high importance. At the time that Canada was ceded to this country by France and became a British colony, the King had promised its inhabitants the benefits of the British constitution. The French settlers in that country, and the native Canadians, had been joined by a considerable number of British subjects, and by Royal emigrants from America; and these were most anxious to secure the advantages which the Royal promise had held out to their expectations. The ministers had, for some time, directed their attention to the subject, and it was recommended to the immediate notice of Parliament, by a message from the King in the present session. Accordingly, on the 4th of March, Mr. Pitt moved for leave to bring in a bill for regulating the government of Canada, and he entered into a long and minute detail of every provision which he meant to propose. It was meant to divide the country into two provinces, Upper and Lower Canada, and to establish two distinct governments. The legislature of each province was to consist of a Council and House of Assembly, the members of the Assembly were to be chosen by freeholders possessing landed property to the amount of forty shillings a year, or occupiers of houses worth twenty pounds a year, and the members of the council were to hold their seats for life; with a reservation of a power to the crown, for annexing to certain honours, an hereditary right of sitting in the council. The Habeas Corpus act was to be rendered a permanent law of the colony. A provision was to be made for the Protestant clergy, by an allotment of lands. Appeals were to be allowed to the privy council, in the first instance, and from thence to the House of Lords. Great Britain renounced the right of taxation; no taxes were to be imposed but such as were necessary for the regulation of trade and commerce; and these only by the legislature of the country. The bill passed through its first stages without opposition, and almost without debate. It was read a first and second time; it passed the committee, and the report was received by the House; and nothing like disapprobation was shewn. But, to the surprise of every one, on the second consideration of the report, on the 8th of April, Mr. Fox who had hitherto given at least his tacit approbation to the bill, stood forth its determined opponent; "The great object of all popular assemblies," he observed, "was, that the people should be fully and fairly represented; but when the assembly of one province was to consist of only sixteen, and the other of thirty persons, they deluded the people by a mockery of representation. They seemed to give them a free constitution, when in fact they withheld it; and he hoped it would never be said, that the constitution of Canada was modelled after that of England. That these representatives should be elected for the term of seven years, he reprobated as equally inconsistent with freedom. Even in England, where the frequent return of elections was attended with so much real inconvenience, the propriety of the Septennial Bill was justly a subject of doubt; but in a country so differently circumstanced as Canada there could be no plausible objection to annual, or at most triennial, elections." Another strong ground of objection with Mr. Fox was, "that the legislative councils were unlimited as to numbers by any other restriction than the pleasure of the King, to whom a power was also reserved of annexing to certain honorary and titular distinctions an hereditary right of sitting in councils. As to hereditary honours, or hereditary powers, to say they were good or not, as a general proposition, was difficult —but he saw nothing so good in them as to warrant their introduction into a country where they were not known. He did not think it wise to destroy them where they existed; but to create them where they did not exist, he considered as exceedingly unwise. He could not account for it, unless it was that, Canada having been formerly a French colony, there might be an opportunity of reviving those titles of honour, the extinction of which some gentlemen so much deplored, and to revive in the West that spirit of chivalry which had fallen into so much disgrace in a neighbouring country."

On the re-commitment of the bill (May 6th) Mr. Burke enlarged upon "the importance of the act which they were now about to perform. The first consideration was the competency of the House to such an act.

* The summing up, by Mr. Hastings, was in the following terms:—"To the Commons of England, in whose name I am arraigned for desolating the provinces of their dominion in India, I dare to reply, that they are, and their representatives annually persist in telling them so, the most flourishing of all the states in India—it was I who made them so. The valour of others acquired; I enlarged, and gave shape and consistency to the dominion which you hold there. I preserved it; I set forth its armies with an effectual but economical hand through unknown and hostile regions, to the support of your other possessions: to the retrieval of one from degradation and dishonour; and of the other from utter loss and destruction. I maintained the wars which were of your formation, or that of others, not of mine. I won one member of the great Indian confederacy from it by an act of seasonable restitution: with another I maintained a secret intercourse, and converted him into a friend: a third I drew off by diversion and negotiation, and employed him as the instrument of peace. When you cried out for peace, and your cries were heard by those who were the object of it, I resisted this and every other species of counteraction by rising in my demands; and accomplished a peace, and I hope an everlasting one, with one great state; and I at least afforded the efficient means by which a peace, if not so durable more seasonable at least, was accomplished with another. I gave you all, and you have rewarded me with confiscation, disgrace, and a life of impeachment."—"There is no object upon earth so near my heart as that of an immediate determination of this tedious prosecution. I am so confident of my own innocence, and have such a perfect reliance upon the honour of your Lordships, that I am not afraid to submit to judgment upon the evidence which has been adduced on the part of the prosecution."

† Mr. Fox observed, "that when a man was accused of murder, a crime consisting of law and fact, the jury every day found a verdict of guilty: and this was also the case in felony and every other criminal indictment. Libels were the only exception, the single anomaly. He contended, that if the jury had no jurisdiction over libels, the counsel who addressed them on either side as to the criminality of the publication were guilty of a gross and insolent sarcasm. It was admitted on all hands, said Mr. Fox, that a writing might be an overt act of treason. In this case, if the court of King's Bench were to say to the jury, 'Consider only whether the criminal published the paper—do not consider the nature of it—do not consider whether it correspond to the definition of treason or not'—would Englishmen endure that death should be inflicted without a jury having had an opportunity of delivering their sentiments, whether the individual was or was not guilty of the crime with which he was charged?" Mr. Fox wished to know, whether the modern doctrine of libels did or did not extend to high treason!

A body

A body of rights, commonly called the Rights of Man, had been lately imported from a neighbouring kingdom. The principle of this new code was, that all men were by nature free and equal in respect of their rights. If this code, therefore, were admitted, the power of the House could extend no farther than to call together the inhabitants of Canada to choose a constitution for themselves. The practical effects of this system might be seen in St. Domingo and the other French islands. They were flourishing and happy till they heard of the Rights of Man. As soon as this system arrived among them, Pandora's box, replete with every mortal evil, seemed to fly open, hell itself to yawn, and every dæmon of mischief to overspread the face of the country."—Mr. Fox defended his former sentiments respecting the French revolution; and repeated "that he thought it upon the whole one of the most glorious events in the history of mankind. In this assertion, however, he spoke of the revolution, not of the constitution, which still remained to be improved by experience, and accommodated to circumstances. The Rights of Man, which his right honourable friend had ridiculed as visionary, were the basis of the British constitution. Our statute book recoguized 'the original inherent rights of the people as men, which no prescription could supersede, no accident could remove or obliterate.' These had once been the principles of his right honourable friend, from whom he had learned them. His right honourable friend had said with equal energy and emphasis 'that he knew not how to draw a bill of indictment against a whole people.' Having been taught by him that no revolt of a nation was caused without provocation, he could not help rejoicing at the success of a revolution resting upon the same basis with our own—the immutable and unalienable Rights of Man."

Mr. Burke insisted "that the discussion of the Quebec bill was a proper opportunity to put the country on its guard against those dangerous doctrines which prevailed in France, and which had found so many advocates here. He had differed on many occasions from Mr. Fox, but there had been no loss of friendship between them. But there was something in the 'accursed' French constitution that envenomed every thing."—On hearing this, Mr. Fox abruptly exclaimed, "there was no loss of friendship." Mr. Burke said, "there was—he knew the price of his conduct; he had done his duty, and their friendship was at an end." Mr. Fox's feelings were now too powerful for utterance. Involuntary tears were observed to steal down his cheek, whilst a profound and expressive silence pervaded the House. At length, recovering himself, he said, "that however events might have altered the mind of his right honourable friend, for such he must still call him, he could not so easily consent to relinquish and dissolve that intimate connection which had for twenty-five years subsisted between them. He hoped that Mr. Burke would think on past times; and, whatever expressions of his had caused the offence, that he would at least believe such was not his intention." The concessions of Mr. Fox are said to have produced no visible impression on Mr. Burke; and from this day a schism took place in the politics of opposition.

On the 28th of March, Mr. Pitt had delivered a message to the House of Commons from the King, importing, "that the endeavours which he had used in conjunction with his allies to effect a pacification between Russia and the Porte, not having proved successful, his Majesty judged it requisite, in order to add weight to his representations, to make some further augmentation of his naval force." When this message was taken into consideration, Mr. Pitt, fully aware of the ambitious views of the Empress Catherine—who had avowed her resolution to interfere in the internal concerns of Poland, and had made no secret of her intention to place the imperial crown on the head of her grandson, Constantine, in the metropolis of the Ottoman empire—enlarged much on the necessity of attending to the preservation of the balance of power in Europe. "The influence of the Turkish empire (he observed) was of great effect in the general scale. Its present situation was such as to afford just cause of apprehension to other powers: and to Prussia in particular it must be highly injurious to suffer the Turkish empire to be diminished in force and consequence." He therefore moved an address, assuring his Majesty that his faithful Commons would make good such expences as might be found necessary." This address was vehemently opposed by the opposition; but it was carried, by 228 against 135 voices. On the 12th of April following, Mr. Grey moved a series of resolutions expressive of the impolicy and inexpediency of a war with Russia, on such grounds. The motion was negatived by 259 against 170; but, as a Russian war was evidently an unpopular measure, ministers at length relinquished the point in dispute; Oczakow and its district remained with Russia; and, in the course of the ensuing summer, preliminaries of peace between the two empires were signed at Gralutz, and afterwards ratified (January, 1792) at Yassi.*

The affairs of France, though unnoticed in the King's speech, at the opening of Parliament, were now in a very critical state. On the evening of September 2, (1790) Neckar, whose popularity had been long extinct, having received information from M. de la Fayette, that his life was in danger, and that the mob

* In the progress of the negotiation, not confining himself to the constitutional mode of opposing the ministers, in Parliament, he adopted the unprecedented measure of sending Mr. Adair, a gentleman known only as a distant relation of his own, to the court of St. Petersburgh, as "his" representative, and for the express purpose of counteracting the endeavours of his Majesty's accredited ministers to induce the Empress to accede to the proposals of the British Cabinet. This transaction cannot be so well described as in the language of Mr. Burke, who could not be suspected of entertaining any undue prejudice against one with whom he had long lived in habits of the closest intimacy, and of the most endearing friendship.

"The laws and constitution of the kingdom," says that eloquent writer, "entrusts the sole and exclusive right of treating with foreign potentates to the King. This is an indisputable part of the legal prerogative of the crown. However, notwithstanding this, Mr. Fox, without the knowledge or participation of any one person in the House of Commons, with whom he was bound by every party principle, in matters of delicacy and importance, confidentially to communicate, thought proper to send Mr. Adair as his representative and with his cypher, to St. Petersburgh, there to frustrate the objects for which the ministers from the crown were authorised to treat. He succeeded in this his design, and did actually frustrate the King's ministers in some of the objects of this negotiation. This proceeding of Mr. Fox does not, as I conceive, amount to absolute high-treason. Russia, though on bad terms, not having been then declaredly at war with the kingdom; but such a proceeding is, in law, not very remote from that offence, and is, undoubtedly, a most unconstitutional act, and a high treasonable misdemeanour. The legitimate and sure mode of communication between this nation and foreign powers is rendered uncertain, precarious and treacherous, by being divided into two channels, one with the government, one with the head of a party in opposition to that government, by which means the foreign powers can never be assured of the real authority or real validity of any public transaction whatsoever. On the other hand, the advantage taken of the discontent, which at that time prevailed in Parliament, and in the nation, to give to an individual an influence directly against the government of his country, in a foreign court, has made a highway into England for the intrigues of foreign courts in our affairs. This is a sore evil; an evil from which, before this time, England was more free than any other nation. Nothing can preserve us from that evil which connects cabinet factions abroad with popular factions here, but the keeping sacred the crown, as the only channel of communication with every other nation. This proceeding of Mr. Fox's has given a strong countenance, and an encouraging example, to the doctrines and practices of the revolution and constitutional societies, and of other mischievous societies of that description; who, without any legal authority, and even without any corporate capacity, are in the habit of proposing, and to the best of their power, of forming, leagues and alliances with France." The reception which this representative of Mr. Fox experienced at the court of St. Petersburgh, was of itself sufficient to prove that the nature of his instructions was highly agreeable to the Empress, and, of course, that the instructions were such as any subject of Great Britain should have been equally ashamed to dictate, to deliver, or to bear. Mr. Adair had always the post of honour assigned him, at the right hand of Catherine, whenever the British ambassador was present. The encouragement which this extraordinary mission afforded the Empress, made her persist in her claims on the Porte, and reject every proposal which the representative of the British monarch made her, in behalf of that power. The treaty of peace was concluded at Gralutz on the 11th of August, by which Russia acquired the important fortress of Oczakow, and all the country between the Boag and the Niester, with the free navigation of the latter river. The presents made to Mr. Adair, on this occasion, were more costly than those which were made to the King's representative.

which had been very riotous during the day, designed to attack his house in the night, he fled, in alarm, to his country house, at St. Ouen; and, when there, his fears were so strong, that he dared not go to bed, but wandered, till morning, in the neighbouring valley of Montmorenci. The next day, he sent a farewell letter to the assembly, and left Paris, on his way to Switzerland. In the course of the ensuing month, the King of France communicated to M. Bouillé the design he had formed, of quitting Paris, and retiring to one of the frontier towns, where he meant to collect around him such of his troops and subjects as still retained their fidelity. And in case other means should fail, to call in the assistance of his allies, for the restoration of order and tranquillity in the kingdom. The King declared, that with respect to this plan he acted in perfect concert with the Emperor, and his other allies, who insisted on his being at liberty before they took any steps in his favour. M. Bouillé declared himself totally adverse to the project, as fraught with danger, and probably with ruin. At the latter end of January, however, (1791) the King notified to M. Bouillé, that he hoped to accomplish his departure from Paris in the month of March or April.

On the 22d of January, following, the King of France communicated to the Assembly a letter from the Emperor of Germany, containing strong protestations of amity towards France; but intimating, that, to consolidate that friendship, the revocation of the decree of August 4, 1790, would be necessary; that all innovations in virtue of that decree be abolished, and matters put upon their ancient footing.* The Assembly immediately voted a large augmentation of military force, regardless of the intimation, that the Emperor had acted only in an official capacity, in conformity to the decrees of the diet.

On the 18th of April, his Majesty being on the point of setting out from Paris to the palace of St. Cloud, to pass the Easter festival, the royal carriage was stopped by an immense crowd, chiefly of the lowest rank, under the apprehension of an intended escape, and consequent counter-revolution. Notwithstanding the exertions of M. de la Fayette, who attended the King's person, and pledged himself for his security, he was finally compelled to return to the Thuilleries: and though, on a complaint of this insult to the Assembly, the president made a respectful apology to the King, it was not thought expedient to revive the design of visiting St. Cloud.

A transient but fallacious calm succeeded. In a declaration, signed by the Emperor Leopold at Mantua, May 20th, and immediately transmitted to Paris, information was conveyed to the King and Queen, "That the plan concerted for effecting a counter-revolution was in great forwardness, and that 100,000 troops, to be furnished by the several courts of Vienna, Madrid, and Turin, with the aid of the circles of the empire and the Swiss cantons, would be ready to enter France at the latter end of July, to act in conjunction with the regiments remaining loyal, the armed volunteers, and all the mal-contents of the provinces." On the night of the 20th of June, the King, Queen, Dauphin, and Princess Elizabeth, sister to the King, also the Count and Countess de Provence, suddenly disappeared, from the palace of the Thuilleries. Eluding the vigilance of the guard, Monsieur and Madame took the road to Mons; the rest of the royal family that of Montmedi. The King left behind him a paper, in which he formally revoked all his past declarations, as the effect of compulsory influence, prohibiting the ministers from signing any order, and enjoining the keeper of the seals to send them to him when required in his behalf. On the discovery of this event, the King's arms and effigies were taken down, and broken by the populace of Paris. A proclamation of the Assembly, however, soon restored order. The royal authority was formally suspended by a decree of the Assembly, and a provisional executive council appointed. The national guard were instantly in arms; and deputations from all the different public bodies appeared at the bar of the Assembly, with the strongest and firmest professions of patriotism and obedience. Almost immediately, however, it was announced that the King and Queen had been arrested in their progress, at a place called Varennes, near the frontier. They were quickly brought back to Paris, and again consigned to the palace of the Thuilleries. Their entrance into the metropolis, and their slow and mournful procession through the principal streets of the city, exposed to the scornful gaze and bitter taunts of the multitude, formed a spectacle deeply affecting. The Queen, whose morning and meridian way through life had been strewed with roses, and myrtles, now appeared to feel the fatal reverse of her fortune with exquisite sensibility; and perhaps, with a dark and dreadful foreboding of the future.

Commissioners from the Assembly having waited upon the King, to receive his written declaration respecting the late event, his Majesty asserted, "That he had no intention of leaving the kingdom, but meant merely to fix at Montmedi, till the vigour of government should be restored, and the constitution settled." It was said, that the King had long carried on a secret correspondence with M. Bouillé, governor of Metz, and commandant of the forces on the German frontier, who had sent a detachment to escort the King to Montmedi—a position to be maintained only by force, and whence, in case of necessity, he could easily retreat to the Austrian territory of Luxemburg. The accidental arrest of the King entirely disconcerted these measures; and M. de Bouillé made his escape into Germany, where he published a strong declaration against the Assembly.†

Some of the more violent members of the Assembly now proposed, that they should declare an abdication, and place the Dauphin on the throne. Milder and more moderate counsels, however, prevailed; and the King remained at the Thuilleries, vigilantly guarded, till the completion of the constitution. On the 3d of September, the "constitutional act" was presented to the King, who signified his acceptance of it in writing, September 13; and on the following day he appeared at the Assembly, introduced by a grand deputation of sixty members, to consecrate the assent he had given; concluding with an oath "to be faithful to the nation and to the law, and to employ the powers vested in him for the maintenance of the constitution." On the 30th of the same month, the Constituent National Assembly, as it was termed, after an uninterrupted session of two years and four months, terminated its existence, by a spontaneous dissolution.

* This was the decree which annihilated all feudal and seignorial rights, in the provisions of which several of the petty Princes of Germany, possessing fiefs in Lorraine and Alsace, were comprehended. So far as the right of property was affected by the decree, compensations had been offered by the Assembly, and by the Duke of Wirtemberg and Deux-ponts, the Princes of Lowenstein, Hohenloe, &c. actually accepted. Others, however, refused to listen to any terms of accommodation.

† The following letter was also dispatched to all the different courts of Europe, by the Emperor Leopold:—

"Circular of Padua, issued July 6, 1791.

"Before the King's acceptance of the constitution, France presents to Europe the spectacle of a legitimate King compelled by atrocious violence to fly, solemnly protesting against the concessions which had been extorted from him, and soon after arrested, and detained prisoner by the people. His imperial Majesty, therefore, invites the powers of Europe to declare:

"I. That they all regard the cause of his most Christian Majesty as their own.

"II. They demand that the King and his family may be instantly set at liberty, and that the inviolability and respect may be observed towards them, which the rights of nature and the institutions of man loudly call for from subjects towards their sovereigns.

"III. That they will unite for the purpose of inflicting dreadful vengeance, in case of any future restraint being imposed, or any farther indignity offered to the King or the royal family.

"IV. That they will acknowledge no laws to be established in France, unless sanctioned by the voluntary consent of the King in a state of perfect and absolute freedom.

"V. If these proposals are not acceded to by France, that they will employ every means in their power to put an end to the existence of the evil in France, and to prevent its spreading into their own dominions."

The French Revolution was this year again celebrated in England; particularly at Birmingham, where on the 14th of July, the celebrated Dr. Priestley, with a party of his political friends, to the number of ninety, had a public dinner at the Hotel. Previously to the meeting, a most inflammatory hand bill was circulated by some friend of the parties, whose zeal was evidently greater than his judgment.* As party spirit ran very high at Birmingham, as the Dissenters were numerous, and somewhat clamorous, and as the majority of the inhabitants were firmly attached to the church and to the King, such a hand-bill naturally excited a great fermentation in the town. A considerable number of persons assembled round the house at which Dr. Priestley and his friends were to meet, and hissed them as they entered. These symptoms of discontent induced the company to depart at a very early hour; and, after they were gone, the mob became riotous, and demolished all the windows in front of the house, notwithstanding the personal interposition of the magistrates. On the next day, Friday, July the 15th, the mob assembled in still greater numbers, and, there being no adequate force at hand to oppose them, became ungovernable. They destroyed Dr. Priestley's meeting house, and dwelling house, another meeting house, and several other houses belonging to Dissenters, in the town and neighbourhood. These disgraceful riots continued from the evening of Thursday to the evening of Sunday, when a party of light horse, who had marched with incredible rapidity, arrived at Birmingham, to the great joy of the inhabitants of every description. The mob then dispersed, all mischief ceased, tranquillity was restored, and some of the ring-leaders were secured. In an early part of the business, the magistrates had offered a hundred guineas reward for the discovery of the author of that inflammatory hand bill, which was the true cause of all those riotous proceedings. A greater reward was afterwards offered by government, for the same purpose, but without effect. The author was never discovered, so as to subject him to the punishment which he so richly deserved. The rioters, who were apprehended, were put on their trial, at the ensuing assizes, and two of them were executed. At Dr. Priestley's house, his philosophical apparatus, his library, and his manuscripts, were destroyed. The loss, of course, was considerable, and, in some respects, irreparable. The losses sustained by Dr. Priestley, as well as by the other sufferers, from those licentious outrages, were made good by the hundred, in the way which the law directs, and in which all similar losses are made good.† But the jury having made considerable deductions from the Doctor's estimate, he vented his complaints in a letter which he addressed to the people of Birmingham.‡

Previously to this period, societies had been formed, in different parts of the kingdom, upon the plan of the Revolution society; and, although they had not yet proceeded to those extremities to which they soon after had recourse, their avowed principles, and promulgated sentiments, were sufficient to arouse the government to vigilance, if not to fill them with alarm. A regular correspondence was carried on with the revolutionary societies in France, from which even delegates were sent to compliment the associated sons of French liberty in this country.

A. D. 1792.] The English Parliament assembled on the 31st of January, when the King announced "the marriage of his son the Duke of York with the Princess Frederica, daughter of the King of Prussia; and informed the two Houses that a treaty had been concluded, under his mediation and that of his allies, between the Emperor and the Ottoman Porte, and preliminaries agreed upon between the latter of those powers and Russia. The general state of affairs in Europe, he said, promised a continuance of peace; and he was induced to hope for an immediate reduction of the naval and military establishments." On the 17th of February, Mr. Pitt exhibited an interesting picture of national prosperity. "The amount of the permanent revenue, with the land and malt duties annexed, from January 1791, to January 1792, he estimated at 16,730,000*l.* being 300,000*l.* more than the aggregate

* The following is a copy of the bill here alluded to:—

"My Countrymen,

"The second year of Gallic liberty is nearly expired. At the commencement of the third, on the 14th of this month, it is devoutly to be wished, that every enemy to civil and religious despotism would give their sanction to the common cause, by a public celebration of the anniversary.

"Remember that on the 14th of July, the Bastile, that high altar and vastle of despotism, fell! Remember the enthusiasm, peculiar to the cause of liberty, with which it was attacked! Remember that generous humanity that taught the oppressed, groaning under the weight of insulted rights, to spare the lives of oppressors! Extinguish the mean prejudices of nations, and let your members be collected, and sent as a free will offering to the National Assembly! But is it possible to forget that your own Parliament is venal, your ministers hypocritical, your clergy legal oppressors; the reigning family extravagant, the crown of a certain great personage becoming, every day, too weighty for the head that wears it, too weighty for the people that gave it; your taxes partial and oppressive; your representation a cruel insult upon the sacred rights of property, religion, and freedom? But, on the 14th of this month, prove to the sycophants of the day, that you reverence the Olive branch, that you will sacrifice to public tranquillity, till the majority shall exclaim, 'The peace of slavery is worse than the war of freedom!' of that day let tyrants beware!"

† In Cobbett's works, Vol. I. p. 157, we find the following account of the issue of Dr. Priestley's action for damages against the hundred. "The Doctor laid his damages at 4122*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* of which sum, 420*l.* 15*s.* was for works in manuscript, which," he said, "had been consumed in the flames. The trial of this cause took up nine hours; the jury gave a verdict in his favour, but curtailed the damages to 2502*l.* 18*s.*—It was rightly considered that the imaginary value of the manuscript works ought not to have been included in the damages, because, the Doctor being the author of them, he, in fact, possessed them still, and the loss could be little more than a few sheets of dirty paper. Besides, if they were to be estimated by those he had published for some years before, their destruction was a benefit, instead of a loss, both to himself and his country. The sum then of 420*l.* 15*s.* being deducted, the (alledged) damages stood 3701*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* and it should not be forgotten, that even a great part of this sum was charged for an apparatus of philosophical instruments, which, in spite of the most unpardonable gasconade of the philosopher, can be looked upon as a thing of imaginary value only, and ought not to be estimated at its cost, any more than a collection of shells, or insects, or any other of the frivola of a virtuoso."

‡ Dr. Joseph Priestley was born at Fieldhead in Yorkshire, in 1733, and educated in the academy of Daventry, under Dr. Ashworth. At the age of twenty-two he became assistant minister to the independent congregation of Needham market, in Suffolk, after which he was chosen pastor of a congregation at Nantwich, in Cheshire, where also he kept a school. In 1761 he removed to Warrington as tutor in the belles lettres in the academy there. His connection with that institution ended in 1768, when he accepted an invitation from the Dissenters at Leeds, where he published several theological works which attracted considerable notice and controversy. In 1770 he went to reside with the Earl of Shelburne, afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne, as Librarian and Philosophical companion. In 1775, he published his examination of Dr. Reid, on the Human Mind; Dr. Beattie on Truth; and Dr. Oswald's Appeal to Common Sense; in which he treated those gentlemen with great ridicule and contempt. His Disquisitions on Matter and Spirit, printed in 1777, excited great surprise, even among the author's admirers, as therein he explicitly denied the soul's immateriality. At this time he also appeared as a champion for the doctrine of philosophical necessity, in which he had his friend Dr. Price for an opponent. While thus engaged in metaphysical and theological disputations, he pursued his philosophical enquiries with ardour, the result of which appeared in the Philosophical Transactions, and in separate publications, particularly his Experiments and Observations on Different kinds of Air, 2 vols. 8vo. The term of his engagement with Lord Shelburne having expired, Dr. Priestley, with a pension of 150*l.* a year, retired to Birmingham, where he became pastor of a congregation of Unitarian Dissenters, in 1780. He there published several of his works; as, Letters to Bishop Newcome on the Duration of Christ's Ministry, and the History of the Corruptions of Christianity, 2 vols. 8vo. This last brought him into a controversy with Dr. Horsley, since Bishop of St. Asaph. The history was also answered and refuted in the Monthly Review. Dr. Priestley, however, still persevered, and published his History of Early Opinions concerning the person of Christ. After the Birmingham riots, related above, Dr. Priestley retired to London, and for some time officiated to the congregation at Hackney, of which Dr. Price had been minister. He had also a situation in the dissenting college, at Hackney. But his mind being greatly soured by late events, he went to America in 1794, and settled at Northumberland, in the state of Pensylvania, where he died in 1804. Dr. Priestley was a fellow of the Royal Society, and of other learned bodies in different parts of the world. He lived to see his phlogistic system of chemistry universally exploded, yet he persisted in defending it to the last. He was also equally tenacious of his Socinianism, and had a controversy on the subject with Dr. Linn, of Philadelphia. His writings are too various to be enumerated. The principal and best are his Charts of History and Biography; his History of Electricity; the History and Present State of Discoveries relating to Vision, Light, and Colours; Lectures on the Theory and History of Language, and on the principles of Oratory and Criticism.

of the preceding year. The permanent expenditure, including the interest of the debt, the annual million applied towards its extinction, the civil list, and the military and naval establishments, he calculated at 15,810,000*l.* leaving a clear surplus of more than 900,000*l.* In this state of things he thought himself authorised to propose the repeal of a part of the more burdensome taxes, to the amount of about 200,000*l.* per annum; and at the same time to apply the sum of 400,000*l.* to the reduction of the national debt, in aid of the annual million appropriated by Parliament. This would still fall far short of his estimate of the national ability, and there was good ground to believe that we had not reached by many degrees the summit of our prosperity. When the debentures to the American loyalists should be discharged, which would happen in about four years, an addition of near 300,000*l.* would accrue to the revenue. In consequence of the general improvement of credit, the three per cents. would soon rise so high as to enable the Parliament to effect a reduction of the four, and, as soon as by law redeemable, of the five per cents. which would add the sum of 700,000*l.* or little less, to the sinking fund. The indefinite additions which might be expected from the increasing produce of the existing taxes, the result of our rapidly increasing commerce, must mock all calculation. Our exports had risen one-third in value since the year 1783, i. e. from 14,741,000*l.* to 20,120,000*l.* and our internal trade had increased in at least an equal proportion. Thus should we be enabled to make a swiftly accelerated progress in the essential work of liquidating the national debt, and in a very short space of time to reach a point, which, perhaps, not long since, was thought too distant for calculation. On the continuance of our present prosperity it was indeed impossible to count with certainty; but unquestionably there never was a time, when, from the situation of Europe, we might more reasonably expect a durable peace than at the present moment."

On the 2nd of April, in a committee on the slave-trade, Mr. Wilberforce moved, a second time, the question of abolition. Mr. Dundas, who had been advanced to the dignity of Secretary of State, by the resignation of the Duke of Leeds, recommended the adoption of a middle and moderate plan, such as would reconcile the interests of the West India islands with the eventual abolition of the trade; and moved, that the word "gradual" might be inserted, before "abolition."

Mr. Pitt declared his decided disapprobation of the amendment proposed by his right honourable friend; and conjured the House not to postpone even for an hour the great and necessary work of abolition. The amendment, however, was carried, by a majority of 68; on which Mr. Dundas moved, "that the importation of negroes into the British colonies should cease on the 1st of January, 1800." This, on the motion of Lord Mornington (now Marquis Wellesley) was, after great difficulty and debate, altered to January 1, 1796. A series of resolutions founded on this basis were then agreed to, and sent up for the concurrence of the Lords; where the Duke of Clarence, the third son of the King, commenced his Parliamentary career with a violent declamation against the abolition and its advocates. The Lord Chancellor moved, "that evidence be heard, not before a select committee, according to the proposition of Lord Grenville, but at the bar of the House." This motion having been carried, very little more was done in the business during the remainder of the session.

Mr. Fox's renewed motion, for a repeal of the Test Laws; and Mr. Whitbread's motion for an inquiry into the subject of the Birmingham riots, were subsequently negatived, by large majorities. The Libel Bill, however, introduced in the last session by Mr. Fox, and lost in the Lords, was this session triumphantly carried through both Houses, and passed into a law—notwithstanding the opposition of the law Lords, Thurlow, Kenyon, and Bathurst. A Bill introduced into the House of Peers by Lord Elgin, for the relief of the Scottish episcopalians, who had long been subject to heavy penalties on the ground of disaffection to the Revolution establishment, was also passed.

In addition to the political societies already noticed, it was thought proper, by many of the professed advocates of constitutional liberty, about this period, to institute a society under the name of the "Friends of the People," for the alledged purpose of effecting a reform in Parliament, on the principles formerly enforced by Mr. Pitt. About thirty members of Parliament, besides other persons of note, entered their names as members of this association. When Mr. Grey, one of the members, gave notice of his intention to move, in the course of the ensuing session, for an enquiry into the state of the representation, Mr. Pitt warmly declared "his total disapprobation of introducing, at a period so critical and dangerous as the present, a discussion of such difficulty and importance. This he affirmed was not a time for experiments; and if he was called upon either to risk this, or for ever to abandon all hopes of reform, he would say he had no hesitation in preferring the latter alternative. He saw with concern the gentlemen to whom he alluded, virtually united with others who professed the reform of abuses, and meant the subversion of government."—A royal proclamation was immediately afterwards issued against the public dispersion of all seditious writings, and against all illegal correspondences—exhorting the magistrates to vigilance, and the people to submission and obedience. The proclamation having been laid before the House of Commons, (May 25), and an address moved of approbation and support, it was opposed by Mr. Grey with much warmth, and the proclamation itself condemned in severe terms as a measure insidious and pernicious. The "diligent enquiry," said the opposition, "enjoined by the proclamation after the authors and distributors of 'wicked and seditious writings,' could only tend to establish an odious and arbitrary system of espionage. This was the system which had made the old government of France so much the object of general detestation, and it was a system unworthy of the sovereign of a free people to recommend. The real object of the proclamation was merely to discredit the late association in the view of the public." This Mr. Pitt explicitly disclaimed, and expressed his high respect for many of the members of the association in question, declaring "that he differed from them only in regard to the time, and mode which they had adopted for the attainment of their object. The association in question did not come within scope and purview of the proclamation, which was levelled against the daring and seditious principles which had been so assiduously propagated amongst the people, under the plausible and delusive appellation of the Rights of Man."—The address was finally carried, without a division, and, receiving the concurrence of the Upper House, was presented in form to the throne. It was followed by addresses from all parts of the kingdom: and the ministry commenced prosecutions against a number of offenders, amongst whom Thomas Paine stood most conspicuous. Notwithstanding the professional ability of Mr. Erskine, as his advocate, he was found guilty of the charge; but foreseeing the probability of this event, he had effected his escape to France.

The trial of Mr. Hastings occupied twenty-two days of the present session. The attention of Parliament, towards the close of the session, was also drawn to the situation of India.*

On the 15th of June, Parliament was prorogued; his Majesty

* From the peace of Mangalore, concluded with Tippoo Saib in 1784, the power of that prince had been very formidable. He was devotedly attached to the interests of France, to which country he had, soon after that event, sent a splendid embassy. France, however, was now occupied with other and greater objects, and Tippoo might be safely punished for his perfidies and oppressions. The Dutch East India company had, in the last century, conquered from the Portuguese two forts, serving as advanced posts to their favourite settlement of Cochin, and situated within the territory of Mysore, called Cranganore and Acotah, to which Hyder Ally had formerly advanced Majesty expressing "his great concern at the actual commencement of hostilities in different parts of Europe, assuring them that his principle care would be to preserve to his people the uninterrupted blessings of peace." It is proper, also, to remark, that as soon as it was known that there was a war on the continent, a proclamation was published by the King, prohibiting all his subjects from taking any part in it, by accepting commissions from either party, fitting out privateers or letters of marque, by virtue of such commission, or serving on board any ship of war belonging to one of the belligerent powers, against the other.*

At

advanced pretensions. These they had recently disposed of by purchase to the Rajah of Travancore, an ally of the English company. Tippoo Saib, resenting the conduct of the Dutch, who had refused to listen to proposals from him, and affirming that the Rajah had no right to make any such purchase within the limits of his territory, without his consent, as sovereign of Mysore, marched a considerable military force, in the summer of 1789, against Cranganore, with a professed intent to reduce it to his dominion. The conduct of the Rajah, in making the purchase in question, on so precarious and invidious a title, was severely censured by the government of Madras; and Mr. Holland, the president, warned him to desist from his ambitious designs. On the farther advance of Tippoo and his army, at the close of the year, into the territory of Travancore, he received, however, a strong remonstrance from the British presidency; and, in consequence of the powerful mediation thus interposed, Tippoo withdrew his troops, though still asserting his claim to the feudal sovereignty of the forts, and offering to submit his pretensions to any impartial arbitration. On the first of May, 1790, however, the Rajah, relying, on the support of the superior presidency of Bengal, made an attack on the army of Tippoo; and the war having thus commenced, the English government felt itself bound to defend its ally. This the Company were the better enabled to do, not merely from their knowledge of the state of France, but from the treaties they had actually formed with the Nizam of the Decan and the Mahratta states, for the express purpose of humbling the power of Mysore. The grand Carnatic army immediately assembling, under the command of General Meadows, marched through the southern or Coimbetore country, and, penetrating the Ghauts, or passes of the mountains, advanced towards the city of Seringapatam, the capital of Mysore. On the western side, the Bombay army, under General Abercrombie, after reducing Cannanore and several other places on the coast, entered the kingdom of Mysore. The Sultan defending himself with great resolution, and no mean display of military skill, General Meadows found himself under the necessity of retreating to the vicinity of Madras; where, in December (1790), Lord Cornwallis assumed the command of the army in person. A grand effort was now resolved on to force a passage to Seringapatam, through the country westward of Madras. On the 21st of March, 1791, the important town of Bangalore was taken by storm, with little loss on the part of the British, but with a dreadful carnage of the unresisting garrison. On the 13th of May, the army, by extraordinary exertions, arrived in sight of the superb capital of Mysore, defended by the Sultan in person; and on the next day an action took place, in which Tippoo was defeated. The swelling of the Cavery, however, in an island formed by the branches of which Seringapatam is situated, with the want of provisions, compelled Lord Cornwallis to commence his retreat to Bangalore, almost before his victory could be announced. General Abercrombie, who had advanced through the Ghauts on the opposite side, with a view to form a junction with Lord Cornwallis, was now also obliged to lead back his army, over the mountains they had lately passed. In the interim, the troops of the Nizam and the Mahrattas kept aloof, leaving the burden of the war almost entirely to the British. The ensuing campaign, for which Lord Cornwallis had made unremitted preparations, opened early in February, 1792. The eastern and western armies, resuming their former plan of operations, effected, before the end of the month, a junction under the walls of Seringapatam; and the forces of the Peishwa and of the Nizam, encamped also at a small distance, and furnished to the British army a plentiful supply of stores and provisions. On the 7th of February a general attack was made by moon-light, the troops marching in grand and awful silence to their respective posts, on the lines of the Sultan, which was attended with very important effects—Tippoo being compelled to relinquish his former advantageous position, which covered his capital; and Seringapatam was, in consequence of this defeat, closely and completely invested. The situation of Tippoo being now almost hopeless, he thought proper to send a vakeel to the camp of Lord Cornwallis to sue for peace; which the British General granted on the hard terms,

1. Of his ceding one half of his dominions to the allied powers.

2. Of paying three crores and thirty lacks of rupees, as an indemnification for the expences of the war.

3. The release of all prisoners; and,

4. The delivery of two of his sons as hostages for the due performance of the treaty.

On the 26th of February, the Princes, each mounted on an elephant magnificently caparisoned, proceeded to the British camp, where they were received by Lord Cornwallis with all possible demonstrations of kindness and affection. The eldest, Abdul Kalic, was about ten; the younger, Mirzaud-Deen, about eight years of age. The Princes were attired in white muslin robes, with red Turbans richly adorned with pearls, and they conducted themselves with a politeness and propriety which astonished the spectators. On the 19th of March the definitive treaty, signed by the Sultan, was delivered by the young Princes, with great solemnity, into the hands of Lord Cornwallis; but the sums specified in the second article not being actually paid, the Princes still remained under the safeguard and custody of his Lordship.

* The second National Assembly of France met October 1, 1791. By an act of gross absurdity, most pernicious in its consequences, the late Assembly had decreed that no person should be eligible to two successive legislatures. The present Assembly was consequently destitute of the experience, talents, and integrity of the former,; and, having been chosen at a period when the national rage was at the highest pitch, they were of a much more republican complexion. The opening speech of the King was received with applause: and the president expressed the united wish of the Assembly to comply with the benevolent and patriotic views of the King. But this fair prospect was soon overcast. By the King's desire, on the acceptance of the Constitutional Act, a decree of indemnity had passed respecting the emigrants, without any exception, on the condition of their returning to their country within a limited time. The agent, however, deputed on this commission to the refuge princes at Coblentz, in the electorate of Treves, was not only treated with contempt and insult, but actually imprisoned, on pretence of his want of passports. In consequence of this outrage, and of the continuance of the hostile preparations of the emigrants, a decree passed the Assembly early in November, 1791, declaring Prince Louis Stanislaus Xavier to have forfeited, in case he do not return to the kingdom in two months, his eventual claim to the throne; and, by a subsequent decree, the Assembly pronounced the French hostilely assembled on the frontier guilty of a conspiracy against their country, in case they did not return before the 1st of January, 1792; incurring thereby the forfeiture of their estates during their lives, but without prejudice to their children. On the 18th of November a severe decree passed the Assembly against the nonjuring clergy, who were accused, of seditious and incivic practices. To both these decrees the King opposed his veto. In the mean time, the emigrants armed at Coblentz, and a political crisis evidently approached. The Assembly addressed the King to take effectual measures to prevent the dangers which menaced the country; and the King, in reply, assured the Assembly, that the Emperor had done all that could be expected from a faithful ally, by forbidding and dispersing all assemblages of emigrants within his states: he had also acquainted the elector of Treves, that if he did not before the 15th of January, put a stop to all hostile dispositions, he should be obliged to consider him as the enemy of France.

It subsequently appeared, that, on the 24th of August, 1791, the Emperor Leopold, the King of Prussia, and the Elector of Saxony, had met at the castle of Pilnitz, in Lusatia, belonging to the Elector, where they remained to the 28th. On the 27th, the Emperor delivered the following declaration to the Count d'Artois, who assisted at the conferences, and who had, in the month of May preceding, been admitted to a personal interview with the Emperor at Mantua.—"His Majesty the Emperor, and his Majesty the King of Prussia, having heard the desires and representations of Monsieur and of his Royal Highness the Count d'Artois, declare jointly that they regard the situation in which his Majesty the King of France actually is as an object of common interest to all the Sovereigns of Europe. They hope that this concern cannot fail to be acknowledged by the powers whose assistance is claimed; and that in consequence they will not refuse to employ jointly with their said Majesties the most efficacious means, in proportion to their forces, to place the King of France in a state to settle, in the most perfect liberty, the foundations of a monarchical government, equally suitable to the rights of Sovereigns and the welfare of the French. Then, and in that case, their said Majesties are decided to act quickly, and with one accord, with the forces necessary to obtain the common end proposed. In the mean time they will give suitable orders to their troops, that they may be ready to put themselves in motion." This paper was signed by the Emperor and King, whose project was, to form a league between all the powers of Europe, to surround France on every side with their armies; and then to publish a manifesto requiring the French government to restore the King and royal family to their liberty, to re-instate his Majesty in his dignity, and to re-establish the monarchy on a solid basis and upon reasonable principles. Threats of an invasion and an attack upon all points were to be held out, and to be executed in case of refusal. The Emperor declared to M. Bouille "that the sanction extorted from the King of France to the new constitution was of no validity, and would permit his Majesty to retract all he had done." That nobleman was requested to bring with him to Pilnitz a plan for the disposition and operation of the foreign armies upon the different parts of the French frontier; which, having completed, he submitted to the previous inspection of the council of princes at Coblentz, by whom it was approved. The Kings of Sweden, Spain, and Sardinia had also engaged to co-operate; the latter, by an invasion of the southern provinces; and his Catholic Majesty had agreed to advance fifteen millions of livres tournois towards the expense of a Swedish expedition. In consequence of the acceptance of the constitutional act by the French monarch; he, however, had written a circular letter to the powers whom he had invited to confederate, proposing to suspend the efforts of the league; and it was agreed between the courts of Vienna and Berlin, according as circumstances should determine, either to make the claims of the German princes in Alsace a subject of negotiation, or a pretext for war. But the popularity of the King of France had now vanished never to return. Addresses were presented to the Assembly from every quarter of the kingdom, indicating their dissatisfaction with the court. The republican party gained great strength; and forming themselves into a club, or society, assembling at the convent of the Jacobine Friars, recently dissolved, they acquired the then popular but since infamous appellation of Jacobins. The friends of monarchy, on the other hand, had, from a similarity of circumstances, obtained the name of Feuillants.

At this period, France was not the only European state which attracted the notice of the political observer. In Poland, a country always bordering on a state of anarchy, and subject to the undue influence of the neighbouring powers, the efforts of a patriotic King, and of a nobility and clergy, prepared to make every sacrifice for the promotion of the public welfare, were rendered abortive when executed for the laudable end of meliorating the condition of every class of people, by the unjust and unwarrantable interference of Prussia, and Russia. The latter power, in particular, whose ambition carried her to the most unjustifiable lengths, assumed a tone of command, and a conduct correspondent therewith, utterly incompatible with the independence of the state to which it was addressed. The alterations which the Poles made, in the internal government of their country, affected only themselves, and were adopted with the free consent of all the parties who had authority to adopt them. They were the result of no arbitrary assumption of power, either by the King, or by any class of his subjects; but were the friends of the combined and deliberative wisdom of the constitutional representatives of the nation, and were not, in any degree, calculated, either by their influence or Warlike preparations continued to be made by the German powers; and the correspondence between the courts of Paris and Vienna being laid before the National Assembly on the 2d of March, it appeared that the Imperial troops in the Netherlands would shortly amount to 90,000 men. The dispatch of Prince Kaunitz (February 17) avowed the concert which had been formed with other powers for preserving unimpaired the monarchy of France. The Assembly, irritated by this intelligence, precipitately, and without any investigation of facts, impeached M. de Lessart, the King's Minister, for criminal concealment and unconstitutional practices; and that gentleman was succeeded by the celebrated M. Dumouriez. On the 1st of March, died suddenly, of a malignant fever, the Emperor Leopold II. He was scceeded by his son Francis II. under the title of King of Hungary: he was, after a short interval, elected Emperor of the Romans. This event produced not the least change in the system of continental policy. Scarcely was the new monarch seated on his throne, when he communicated to the court of Berlin his determination strictly and literally to adhere to the terms of the treaty or convention of Pilnitz. The negociation proceeded slowly and heavily. At length, the French ambassador, M. Noailles, was ordered to require from the Imperial court a distinct specification of its ultimate objects. The reply was contained in a short note from M. Cobentzel, stating the conditions of peace to be the re-establishment of the monarchy on the basis of the royal session of Louis XVI. held June 23, 1789. All hope of reconciliation being now at an end, war was, in conformity with a message from the King, on the 20th of April, formerly declared against Austria. About this time, a letter was written by the King of France to the King of England, expressing his obligations to his Britannic Majesty for his impartial conduct, and making eager advances to the formation of a treaty of amity and alliance. To this letter an answer was returned (July 8) after an interval of twenty days; intimating that, "In the existing circumstances of the war now begun, the intervention of his Britannic Majesty's councils or of his good offices, could not be of use unless they should be desired by all the parties interested." War having been declared, the National Assembly published an address, which tended not a little to inflame the minds of the people, and infuse a martial spirit into the nation. This address was immediately succeeded by offers of voluntary contributions from numerous classes of society, and demands from some of them to be sent to the posts of the greatest danger, "in order that Kings, their valets, and princes, might know the men of the 14th of July." The next concern of the Assembly was to provide a sufficient force for the exigencies of the state; and for this purpose a vote was passed, by which it was enacted, that the army should be increased to 450,000 men, and that a sum of money amounting to 300,000,000 livres, in government paper, called assignats, should be placed at the disposal of ministers, to support and uphold that large military establishment. The command of the French army destined to act against Germany consisted of three separate bodies of troops, extending from Switzerland to Dunkirk, and was confided to three commanders of approved talents. The Marshal Rochambeau, who had acquired renown in the seven year's war, commanded an army of from 30 to 35,000 men in the north, and took up his head quarters at Valenciennes, having under his command d'Arville, Biron, Delbeck, and D'Aumont. The Marquis de la Fayette, commanded the army of the centre, and while he occupied Nancy, Thionville, and Luneville, established his head-quarters at Mentz, having at his disposal an army of 20,000 men, and under his command De Wittgenstein, De Bellemont, Crillon, Parquet, and Defranc. While the army of the Rhine, consisting of 50,000 men, was placed under the command of Marshal Luckner, a foreigner, extending itself from Landau to the frontiers of Switzerland, and in which army Berthier, Lameth, and Jary had subordinate stations. On the 1st of May, General Dillon, with a force consisting of ten squadrons of cavalry, marched from Lisle towards Tournay; this force was opposed by a body of Austrians under Count d'Happencourt, and the French troops, unaccustomed to sustain the fire of regular soldiers, were soon thrown into disorder. Their general did what he could to rally them, but in vain. Struck with an universal panic, the whole body fled precipitately, and were pursued to the gates of Lisle. No sooner had General Dillon entered that city, than he was murdered by his fugitive soldiers, and his dead body torn in pieces by the mob, under pretence of his having betrayed his troops to the enemy. Lieutenant-Colonel Berthois, of the engineers, shared the same fate, and the surviving officers were stigmatized as "aristocrats." On the same day another expedition, consisting of ten thousand men, under Lieutenant General Biron, directed their march towards Mons.—They took possession of Quievrain without opposition; but when they arrived in sight of Mons, they found the heights before the city occupied by a considerable body of Austrians. This determined Biron to wait for news of the attack upon Tournay, before he proceeded to action. But a part of his right wing were attacked about five o'clock in the evening by the Austrians, whom they repulsed.

Notwithstanding this success, two regiments of his cavalry mounted their horses, without orders, about ten o'clock, and moved off to the left of the camp. The general observing this, rode after them alone and unarmed. But they being on a quick trot, carried him along with them for more than a league:—nor could he procure a hearing, while they all cried out that they were betrayed. At length, however, they were prevailed with to listen to him, and he succeeded so far as to bring them all back to the camp, except about forty or fifty, who proceeded to Valenciennes, reporting that the whole army was betrayed by their general, who had deserted to the Austrians. Next morning, which was the 30th of April, Biron having been informed of the failure of Dillon, began his retreat; and leaving a part of his army to keep possession of Quievrain, he led the rest to a camp which he had formerly occupied in that neighbourhood. The party who had been left in Quievrain were soon driven thence by a body of Hulans. Biron, finding his camp not tenable, while the enemy was in possession of that place, determined to attempt the recovery of it, which he effected. But not being able to keep it without reinforcements, he was obliged to give it up; and leaving his camp and his whole train of artillery to the enemy, he retreated with the utmost precipitation to Valenciennes. In this expedition the French lost a number of men, by hunger and fatigue, as well as by the sword of their opponents. A third expedition consisted only of fourteen hundred infantry, and two hundred and fifty horse, under the command of M. Carl. These presented themselves before Furnes; and upon their declaring that they came not to make war upon the Flemings, but to treat them as brethren, the magistrates offered them the keys of their gates. But the failure of the general plan obliged Carl also to retreat: and he arrived at Dunkirk without effecting any thing of importance. La Fayette, who had the command of the main army, had orders to proceed to Givet, where he was to be on the 30th of the month; and they, with the other armies under Dillon, Biron, and Rochambeau, were to form a general rendezvous in the heart of the Austrian Netherlands. La Fayette having collected a train of seventy-eight pieces of cannon, sent it off with a large convoy, under the command of M. Narbonne, who marched fifty-six leagues in the space of five days; himself followed with the rest of the army, and arrived on the day appointed; but the failure of Dillon and Biron rendered this expedition also in a great measure abortive, though La Fayette continued to keep his ground. The Austrian army, on the contrary, was a considerable time before they were able to act on the offensive, and it was not till the 17th of May that they made an attack upon Bavai, and took the garrison prisoners. As soon as the French were informed of this, M. Noailles was sent against them with a van-guard of cavalry, accompanied by Marshal Luckner himself.—Mashal Rochambeau followed with a body of infantry to support him; but before their arrival, the Austrians had retreated, carrying with them a considerable quantity of forage, which seems to have been their principal object. In the month of June, the armies of France made some progress in the Netherlands. They obtained possession of Courtenay, Ypres, Menin, and some other places of less importance. But they did not long enjoy these conquests. Being informed that the Austrians and Prussians were bearing down upon them in two columns, with a force much superior to their own, they retreatad to Valenciennes and Givet.

At this time, the French cabinet was distracted by angry contests, which terminated in the resignation of Marshal Rochambeau, the commander-in-chief of the northern army, and of M. de Grave, the minister for the war department; the former of whom was succeeded by Luckner, and the latter by Servan. The determination of the king not to give the royal assent to the decree for embodying 20,000 men in the neighbourhood of Paris, and his refusal to discard his confessor, who had refused to recognize the new order of things, produced an intemperate letter from Roland to his majesty, which led not only to his removal from the cabinet, but also to the dismissal of Servans and Clavieres; and after some other changes, they were succeeded by a new administration of the Feuillant party.

In the mean time, a great change had taken place in the public mind in Paris, and the conduct of the King had given rise to suspicions, which the dismission of Roland, one of the Girondists, or Brissotins, had tended considerably to increase. On the 20th of June, the suburbs of St. Antoinie were perceived to be in commotion: and one Santerre, a brewer, who placed himself at the head of the mob, produced a petition to the King for the dismission of the new administration, and the withdrawing of the veto, by means of which he had been persuaded to suspend the execution of several decrees. An immense multitude then commenced their march, armed with pikes, preceded by two pieces of cannon, and accompanied by a crowd of women. "Tremble, tyrant, thy hour is come!" was the murderous threat displayed on one of their banners; and a reeking heart, stuck on a pike, inscribed, "The heart of an Aristocrat," affording a convincing proof of the disposition to carry such a threat into execution. Increasing as they advanced, they at length reached the assembly, or example, to excite commotions in the neighbouring states, or to afford any reasonable ground of offence or uneasiness to their rulers. There existed, therefore, no pretext for interference, except what arose out of views too unjust to acknowledge, and out of designs too dishonourable to reveal. The principal change thus effected in the constitution of Poland, was the substitution of an hereditary for an elective monarchy; a change highly favourable to the national independence constitutional stability, and social order. The destined successor of Stanislaus was the Elector of Saxony, a Prince to whom no national objection could be raised by any one. The King communicated the result of this bloodless revolution to the Emperor Leopold, and to the King of Prussia, both of whom expressed their general approbation of the event, and their particular congratulations on the wise choice which had been made of a successor. The Empress of Russia, however, indignant of every attempt to remove the shackles which she had imposed on this devoted country, openly expressed her high displeasure at the presumption of its King, and its representatives, in their resolution to assert their own independence, assembly, and having halted some time, deputed a few persons to require permission to present their homage, and file through its hall. They then proceeded to the palace, which was shut; but they soon forced their way, in spite of every opposition, and arrived in the presence of his Majesty, to whom they read their petition.—Louis XVI. exhibited on this occasion a degree of courage, which had been supposed wholly incompatible with his character; neither the threats nor howlings of this insolent mob could prevail upon him to alter his intentions, or withdraw his veto; but he was under the necessity of wearing the red cap, the symbol of the jacobins, which was placed on his head by the hands of a man inebriated with liquor, and ejaculating the most terrible oaths. At length, in consequence of a long and animated speech, delivered by Vergniaux, who placed himself on the shoulders of one of the mob, and a few words from Petion, Mayor of Paris, the populace was persuaded to retire. This visit to the Thuilleries was but a prelude to one far more terrible; for though the Girondists, who only wished for a popular administration, always exhibited a laudable aversion to the shedding of blood; yet it was otherwise with the Robespierrean party, their rivals, who now began to display a degree of ferocity hitherto unexampled in any age or country. On the 14th of July, the day of the federation, when Louis approached the altar to renew his oath, a thousand tongues denounced him as a perjured prince; and it was with some difficulty that the Swiss guards, and the national grenadiers could insure his safety, amidst the immense and exasperated crowd which surrounded him. Brissot, Vergniaux, and the other popular leaders, repeatedly invoked the assembly to depose him; but the jacobins, in conformity to the violence of their character, were for recurring to more desperate measures.

On the 29th of April a declaration of war against France, had been promulgated in the names of Maria Christina Princess Royal of Hungary and Bohemia, and Albert Casimir, Prince Royal of Poland and Lithuania, the Governor-General of the Austrian Low Countries. This proclamation was followed, on the 5th of July, by a counter-declaration against France, on the part of Francis II. King of Hungary and Bohemia; and on the 26th of the same month, Frederic-William II. published a concise exposition of the reasons which determined Prussia to take up arms against France. It was at this crises, that the armies of the allied sovereigns, amounting to 80,000 of the best troops in Europe, accompanied by a formidable band of expatriated nobles, were about to enter France under the command of the Duke of Brunswick, a leader who had served with distinguished reputation under Frederic the Great, and who had gained fresh laurels by the sudden conquest of Holland. On the arrival of the Duke at Coblentz, with the first division of his army, he was proclaimed Generalissimo, and on the 25th of July, he put forth a manifesto, explanatory of the reasons which actuated the alled sovereigns in taking up arms against France, and pointing out the line of conduct which would be pursued by the invading army towards that nation. Such of them as are found in arms against the troops of the allied powers are threatened to be punished as rebels to their King, and destroyers of the public tranquillity; and the city of Paris, in case the King, Queen, and royal family, are not immediately set at liberty, is menaced with the horrors of military execution, with avenging punishments and total destruction. Speaking of the arrest as Varrennes, the manifesto declares, "that the King was obliged to return to Paris, there to be suspended from his authority by a decree of the usurping assembly—as if any power on earth had the right of passing so infamous and odious a sentence. To regain his power, the King signed an acceptance of the constitution: but his hands was in chains, and the act which he performed was invalid. All powers, filled with indignation at this horrid spectacle, had already concerted measures for avenging the honour of the diadem. His late imperial Majesty, Leopold II. by his circular letter, written from Padua, inviting all the powers of Europe to form a confederation for this purpose. The Convention of Pilnitz determined those circumstances which made their Imperial and Prussian Majesties have recourse to arms."

It was not doubted that the King had authorized the use thus made of his name, and matters were almost immediately brought to a crisis. On the 3d of August, M. Petion, at the head of the sections of Paris, appeared at the bar of the National Assembly, to demand the decheance or dethronement of the King. A petition of the same tenor was presented by a countless multitude on the 6th, and the Assembly had appointed the 10th of August to decide upon this grand question; but the discussion was dreadfully anticipated. Early on the morning of that day, the palace of the Thuilleries was attacked by the Parisian populace; and, being valiantly defended by the Swiss guards, whose first volley covered the Place de Carousel with dead bodies, a most bloody conflict took place, which terminated in the total defeat and destruction of the guards, and the complete triumph of the Parisians. The King at the commencement of the engagement had retreated across the gardens of the Thuilleries, with the Queen, to the hall of the assembly, who continued there sitting in the midst of this unexampled scene of terror and confusion, and the incessant noise of musketry and cannon. All freedom of deliberation was now at an end. A decree now passed without debate, declaring the executive power suspended, and summoning a national convention to meet on the 20th of September. The King and Queen meanwhile were committed close prisoners to the temple. A justificatory declaration of the measure of suspension was published by the Assembly, concluding with these words: "We have discharged our duty in seizing with courage on the only means of preserving liberty that occurred to our consideration; we shall be spared remorse at least; nor shall we have to reproach ourselves with having seen a means of saving our country and not having embraced it." On the following day a new provisional executive council was appointed, consisting of Roland, Servan, and Claviere, dismissed by the King; to whom was added M. le Brun, as minister of foreign affairs. M. Luckner, M. Dumouries, now acting in the capacity of general in the army, and the other commanders, submitted with readiness to the authority of the Assembly. La Fayette alone attempted resistance; but, finding himself wholly unsupported by his troops, he was obliged to make a precipitate escape. Being intercepted in his flight, and delivered up to the Prussians, he was committed close prisoner to the fortress of Magdeburg, and treated with uncommon severity.(a)

The combined armies in the mean time made a rapid and alarming progress. The town of Longwy surrendered on the 21st of August, and in a few days afterwards that of Verdun. The country was now prounced to be in danger; notwithstanding which, the National Assembly declared war against the King of Sardinia, who had given repeated proofs of his attachment towards the royal family.

Subsequently to the deposition of the King, the prisons had been

(a) M. P. J. R. Y. G. Motier, Marquis de la Fayette, so distinguished in the annals of the French Revolution, was born in Auvergne, and descended from an ancient family. He was educated in the college of Louis le Grand, at Paris, and received a commission in the Mousquetaires; soon after which he married a lady of the family of Noailles. When only nineteen, he repaired to America, where he acquired considerable reputation by his military achievements. When the French Revolution occurred, La Fayette prepared to act a distinguished part. In 1789 he became a member of the states-general, as a deputy from the nobility of Riom, in Auvergne; he had already been a member of the notables, in 1789, and his attack on the administration of Calonne is said to have contributed to the downfal of that minister. He was the first to propose to the national assembly a plan for a "declaration of rights," and after the recal of Neckar, was unanimously elected commander-in-chief of the national guards. In this capacity he presided at the grand confederation on the 14th of July, as the generalissimo of a greater body of troops, perhaps, than had ever been commanded by any other man since the days of Xerxes. No sooner was the constitution organized, than he resigned his power, and retired to one of his family estates, whence he did not return until a war against Austria had been resolved upon. He was at that period a major-general, but soon obtained the rank of lieutenant-general, and finally that of marshal of France, with a red-rib-band.—Having been invested with the command of the armies of the Meuse and the Moselle, he left his head-quarters soon after the 20th of June, 1792, on purpose to complain of the indignities to which the King had been exposed in the course of that day. Subsequently to this period he expressed his abhorrence of the catastrophe of the 10th of August, and his determination to support the "nation, the law, and the King;" but a decree of accusation being at length voted against him, he was forsaken by his troops, and deemed it prudent to seek an asylum in a foreign land.—Being seized, though on neutral ground, he was considered in the light of a prisoner of war, and conveyed to Luxembourg, where he was exposed to the emigrants, who saw in him one of the prime authors of the Revolution. He was afterwards delivered up to the King of Prussia, who caused him to be removed to Wesel, and afterwards to Magdebourg, where he remained a year in a dungeon; but when Prussia made peace with France, the prisoner was restored to the Austrians, who sent him to Olmutz, where he was treated with still more rigour than at Magdebourg. A long illness however, compelled the physicians to request that his captivity might be mitigated, and then Dr. Bollman and the young Huger, the son of the man with whom La Fayette had originally lived in America, executed the bold project of having him carried off, when he was led out to take the air; but eight leagues from Olmutz he was re-taken and confined more strictly than before, which increased his illness, and during the severe illness of 1794, he was without light, and even without linen, but at the end of the year 1795, his wife and daughters obtained permission to share his captivity. At last, after three years and five months of imprisonment, he obtained his liberty in August, 1797, at the repeated request of the directory, and of General Buonaparte. He then withdrew to Hamburgh; and afterwards returned to France to his estate in Auvergne, which was restored to him.

pendence, to consult their own happiness, and to act for themselves. The rebellious nobles of Poland, who would not submit to a curtailment of their own power for the general good, she assembled around her in the capital of her empire. Nothing could exceed the wisdom, temperance, and judgment displayed by Stanislaus throughout the whole of these events. He encouraged the timid, he restrained the violent, he was the first to make sacrifices, and the last to claim privileges or power. But the arrival of a minister plenipotentiary from France, a M. Descorches, who was lately the Marquis de St. Croise, but who seemed to have lost his honour with his titles, gave courage to the few violent and factious men at Warsaw, who wished to avail themselves of the present disposition to change, in order totally to subvert the constitution, and to introduce a new order of things after the French. The prudence of the King, however, defeated their efforts, in a great degree, though, through their influence, one measure was carried, which gave great disgust to the nobility; this was the sale of the stanosties, or fiefs, of the crown, by which the power, both of the crown and of the aristocracy, was considerably abridged. The new constitution was confirmed by the Dictines, which assembled in the spring of 1792. The popular voice was decidedly in its favour. Nothing, therefore, was wanting to insure its stability, but the support, or even acquiescence, of the neighbouring states. But, before the commencement of the year 1792, a material change had taken place in the situation of Europe, and in the sentiments of Austria and Prussia. The rapid progress of French principles had excited a well founded alarm in the minds of all the continental powers. The Emperor of Germany, and the King of Prussia, were the first to express their apprehensions of the rising danger, and the Empress of Russia had lately warned her subjects, emphatically and successfully, against the fatal contagion. These apprehensions had led the two first of these powers to dread any, and every, change, in the constitutions of adjoining states, to regard the cry of liberty as the watchword of insurrection; and, consequently, to extend their fears to the late revolution in Poland, which, till now, they had viewed with a favourable eye. The Imperial Catherine, who, in her late proclamation against French principles, had artfully asserted, that they "would soon ruin Poland," would have been equally hostile to the new Polish constitution, if the French Revolution had never occurred. Every thing which tended to give stability and permanence to the government of that unhappy country; and, consequently, every thing which went to establish its perfect independence on foreign Potentates, was certain to incur the most marked opposition on the part of the Empress, because they were calculated to disappoint her ambitious hopes, and to frustrate her unprincipled plans of conquest and aggrandizement. Her hatred of French principles was natural, but she afforded not the smallest proofs of its sincerity; for, while she anxiously stimulated other powers to take up arms against France, she never contributed, herself, a single man, or a single ruble to the support of that cause which she affected to have so much at heart. But Catherine had too much sagacity not to perceive, that the new constitution of Poland differed, most essentially and radically, from the revolution in France, in every one of its features, in its object, its end, its means, and its principle. Her dread, therefore, of the effects of French principles, in Poland, was assumed, for the purpose of giving a colour to the most unjust and tyrannical interference in the internal concerns of an independent state, which unprincipled despotism ever enforced or attempted. She had long resolved that Poland should not be free, should not be independent; and she now determined to destroy, by force, what, in vain, she assailed by argument. On the 18th of May, her Envoy, at the court of Poland, Mr. Non Bulgakow delivered a declaration to the Diet, by order of his Sovereign, couched in the most insolent and most insulting terms. Catherine did not scruple to make the partial change in their own constitution, without consulting her pleasure, the subject of complaint and reproach to the Poles. The advocate for monarchy in France, she did not blush to avow herself the champion of republicanism in Poland; an absolute sovereign herself; she did not hesitate to reprobate the union of power in one single hand as utterly incompatible with republican principles." In possession of an hereditary throne, she dared to tax, as an audacious violation of the laws, the conversion of the elective throne of Poland, into an hereditary throne; and, lastly, while she punished, with the most rigorous severity, every reflection of her subjects upon her own government, she openly encouraged the seditious and rebellious Poles, and appealed from the lawful rulers of the state to the people! In short, a more flagrant, outrageous, and unprincipled interference with the internal polity of a foreign state, history does not exhibit. In this declaration, too, which it is impossible to characterize in terms of adequate strength, she accused all those filled with persons accused or suspected of disaffection to the existing government; and, a sort of phrenzy seizing the populace on the unexpected approach of the Duke of Brunswick, the prisons were forced open on the night of the 2d of September, and a most inhuman and infamous massacre of the prisoners took place. It is said that, application being made on this occasion to M. Danton, minister of Justice, to interpose his authority, in order to put a stop to these detestable enormities, he replied, "When the people have done their part, I will perform mine." A considerable number of persons, confined at Orleans for various state offences, being brought to Versailles, by order of the Assembly, for trial, were met by the same band of assassins at their arrival, (September 3.) and put indiscriminately to the sword—the military escort regarding the bloody scene as passive spectators, while the inhabitants of Versailles stood stupified with horror. Amongst these victims of madness and anarchy were the ex-ministers Montmorin and De Lessart, and M. de Brissac, commandant of the King's life-guards. On the 20th of September the National Convention met at Paris, and a decree was immediately passed by acclamation for the eternal abolition of royalty in France. It was now the fate of the allied armies to experience a severe reverse. Of the five passes of the forest of Argonne, those of Croix-aux-Bois and Chene Popnleux to the eastward, were, after many ineffectual attempts, forced by General Clairfait; on which General Dumouriez abandoned the important defile of Grand-Pre, to avoid being inclosed, and after a series of admirable manœuvres retreated without loss to the strong camp of St. Menehould. The passes of Chalade and Islettes, on the great road from Verdun, commanded by the heights of Bienne, were heriocally defended by General Dillon. On the 16th of September the Prussians entered the Grand-Pre, and took post on the heights of La-Lune, between the enemy and Chalons. A fierce cannonading, followed by a severe but partial conflict, or succession of conflicts took place. But the position of the French army being adjudged, after much deliberation, impregnable, and the attempt to proceed to Paris, leaving a force, now increased to 60,000 men, in the rear, appearing to the Prussian General, in the highest degree, rash and dangerous, no alternative remained. The French army receiving continual reinforcements, and the Prussians beginning to experience the evils of sickness and famine, in addition to the ordinary sufferings of war, the Duke of Brunswick was reduced to the necessity of commencing his retreat on the 1st of October, and by the 18th the Austrian and Prussian armies had completely evacuated France. At this time indeed, the French arms were triumphant in every quarter. General Montesquieu, entering Savoy on the 20th of September, was received with acclamation at Chamberri, the capital, and the whole country submitted almost without resistance. On the other side, the fortress of Montalban and the entire county of Nice, were conquered by General Anselm. On the banks of the Rhine, General Custine reduced successively the cities of Worms, Spire, Mentz, and Frankfort. On the 20th of October, a decree passed the National Convention, declaring "that the republic was saved, and the country no long in danger." Early in November Dumouriez entered the Austrian Netherlands; and on the 5th of the month, he attacked the Austrian entrenchments at Gemappe near Mons. He gained a complete and signal victory, the consequences of which were decisive as to the fate of the Netherlands. Mons instantly surrendered. Tournay, Ostend, Ghent, and Antwerp, soon followed; and on the 14th the French General made his triumphal entry into Brussels; the Archduchess Christina, governess of the Low Countries, quitting that place with the utmost precipitation, a few days previously to this event. Before the end of the year the whole of the Austrian Low Countries, Luxemburg only excepted, with the city and territory of Liege, were subjected by the victorious arms of France. Elated by this unexampled series of triumph, the following decree was passed by acclamation in the Assembly, November 19, 1792. "The National Convention declare, in the name of the French nation, they will grant fraternity and assistance to all those people who wish to procure liberty. And they charge the executive power to send orders to the generals to give assistance to such people; and to defend citizens who have suffered, and are now suffering, in the cause of liberty." This decree, was productive of very serious consequences. Two other decrees of the Assembly also require to be mentioned: the one passed November 27, erecting the duchy of Savoy into an 84th department of the French republic, contrary to a fundamental article of the constitution, by which she renounced all foreign conquest: the other, on the capture of Antwerp, declaratory of the freedom of navigation on the river Scheld.

Poles who had sworn obedience to the constitution, and who had formed, at least, nine-tenths of the whole population of the country, with perjury; and she expressed her resolution to send an army into Poland, for the purpose of restoring, by force, the ancient order of things. The King of Prussia, at the same time, determined to remain neuter, though in direct violation of an existing treaty with Poland, concluded in 1790; and the Emperor of Germany adopted the same lime of conduct;—so that Catherine had now nothing to fear from the unequal efforts of a people, whom she exerted every art to divide. The Polish government had no difficulty in confuting the fallacies and the falsehoods which the Russian Empress had stooped to adopt in the declaration of her minister. Their answer was firm, temperate, and dignified, and an animated address, from the King to his subjects, was published about the same time, which produced the desired effect. But the ability to make the necessary preparations for opposing so powerful an enemy, was by no means equal to the public spirit which prevailed. The Empress poured one formidable body of troops into the Ukraine, and another into Lithuania, in neither place was there any force adequate to a successful resistance. The Poles, however, notwithstanding their inferiority, fought bravely and skillfully; but numbers soon prevailed over courage, and, in less than two months, the Russians, having advanced to within three days march of the capital, compelled the King to save his throne, by consenting to the abolition of the new constitution. This compulsory act took place on the 23d of July, when an armistice was immediately concluded. And the command of the Polish troops consigned to a Russian General.

During the exhibition of this disgraceful scene in Poland, Sweden had been the theatre of another exhibition, not less disgraceful, and still more atrocious. Gustavus, the heroic monarch of that country, who had taken a deep interest in the fate of the unhappy King of France, and who had it in contemplation to lead a body of six and thirty thousand Swedes and Russians into his territories, in order to co-operate with the allies, for restoring him to liberty, was assassinated, on the 16th of March, 1792, at a masquerade at the Opera House, in Stockholm, by a person named Ankerstrom, who had formerly been an officer of the guards, and who was one of a band of conspirators who had taken offence at some part of the public conduct of the King, and had long had this deed in contemplation. The King met his death with the firmness, resignation, and temper of a Christian. With his dying breath, he pardoned the traitors who had deprived him of life, except the immediate perpetrator of the deed, who, on the representation of the destined regent, the Duke of Sudermania, was reserved as a victim to offended justice. This Prince, who possessed many great and heroic qualities, had rendered his country infinite service, by curtailing the power of a corrupt and turbulent nobility, by increasing the comforts of his people, and by shaking off the degrading yoke of dependance, in which the Russian Outocrat had long kept the court and cabinet of Stockholm. The tears of the virtuous and the good consecrated the memory of Gustavus, while it was further honoured by the loud exultations which the leaders of the French revolution manifested at his premature death.

The functions of royalty having been suspended in France, by the transactions of the 10th of August, and the virtual deposition of the French monarch, Lord Gower, the English ambassador at Paris, received orders from the court of London to quit the kingdom. M. Chauvelin, the French ambassador, however, still remained in London, though from this period unacknowledged in any public or authorized capacity. The deposition of the French monarch, and the provocations and injuries which preceded and produced that event, naturally wrought upon the minds of the generality of the people, in England, and completely alienated their minds from the revolution, and struck them with terror at the idea of innovation. In this feeling, an association, openly countenanced by, though not originating with government, was formed in London, "for the protection of liberty and property against republicans and levellers;" and a multitude of judicious pamphlets, in the popular form of letters, dialogues, and narratives, were circulated by this means throughout the country, inculcating due submission to government. The spirit of this association spread rapidly through the kingdom; and in every county, and almost every town, resolutions were subscribed strongly expressive of loyalty and attachment to the King and constitution, of their dread of innovation, and abhorrence of all levelling and republican doctrines.

Previously to this period, the violent zealots of pretended liberty in England had been accustomed to transmit addresses to the National Convention, declaratory in high-flown terms of their applause and admiration. The most remarkable of these, intituled "An Address from several Patriotic Societies in England," was presented, November 7th, at the bar of the Convention, containing, in addition to the usual complimentary expressions, the most indecent and indefensible reflections upon the government and constitution of their own country.* The president of the Convention, in his answer to this insolent effusion, had the mischievous folly to use expressions full of respect and complacency; and, to crown the absurdity, copies of the address were ordered to be sent to all the armies and departments of the republic. On the 28th of November, a deputation from the "Society for Constitutional Information" presented an address at the bar of the Convention, congratulating that assembly "on the glorious triumph of liberty on the 10th of August," and declared, "that, notwithstanding the hireling pens which might be employed by the power of government to contradict them, they spoke the sentiments of a majority of the English nation." In the prefatory speech of the deputies, "citizens" John Frost and Joel Barlow, were expressions yet more seditious and offensive than in the address. They took upon them to predict, "that, after the example given by France, revolutions would become easy. Reason (say these enlightened patriots) is about to make a rapid progress; and it would not be extraordinary, if, in a much less space of time than can be imagined, the French should send addresses of congratulation to a National Convention of England." The French president, in reply, paid the highest compliments to the English nation, as having afforded illustrious examples to the universe. "The shades of Hampden and of Sydney (exclaimed he) hover over your heads; and the moment, without doubt, approaches, in which the French will bring congratulations to the national convention of Great Britain. Generous republicans! your appearance among us prepares a subject of history."—The speech, the address, and the answer of the president, were ordered to be printed, and sent to the eighty-three departments, and translated into all languages! On the same "auspicious day" a deputation from the British and Irish resident at Paris appeared at the bar, and, amidst loud and reiterated plaudits, they declared their belief, "that the disgraceful memory of those 'pretended governments,' the offspring of the combined fraud of priests and tyrants, would in a short time alone remain. Our wishes, citizen legislators, render us impatient to behold the happy moment of this great change, in the hope that, on its arrival, we shall see an intimate union formed between the French republic, and the English, Irish, and Scottish nations. Nor are we alone animated by these sentiments:—we doubt not that they would be equally conspicuous in the great majority of our fellow countrymen, if the public opinion were to be consulted there, as it ought, in a National Convention." Again, the president answered in a strain of inflated rhetoric. —"Principles are waging war against tyranny, which will fall under the blows of philosophy. Royalty in Europe is either destroyed, or on the point of perishing on the ruins of feudality; and the declaration of rights, placed by the side of thrones, is a devouring fire which shall consume them. Worthy republicans! congratulate yourselves on thinking that the festival which you have made in honour of the French revolution is the prelude to the festival of nations."

* "Whilst foreign plunderers ravage your territories, (say these addresses) an oppressed part of mankind, forgetting their own evils, are sensible only of yours, and address their fervent prayers to the God of the Universe, that he may be favourable to your cause, with which theirs is so intimately connected.—Degraded by an oppressive system of inquisition, the insensible, but continual, encroachments of which quickly deprived this nation of its boasted liberty, and reduced it almost to that abject state of slavery from which you have so gloriously emancipated yourselves.—five thousand English citizens, fired with indignation, have the courage to step forward to rescue their country from that approbrium which has been thrown on it by the base conduct of those who are invested with power. We see with concern that the Elector of Hanover unites his troops to those of traitors and robbers; and the King of England will do well to remember that England is not Hanover. Should he forget this, we will not forget it."

On the 1st of December, a royal proclamation was issued, announcing, that, notwithstanding the late proclamation of the 21st of May, the utmost industry was still employed by evil disposed persons within the kingdom, acting in concert with persons in foreign parts, with a view to subvert the laws and constitution; and that a spirit of tumult and disorder, thereby excited, had lately shown itself in acts of riot and insurrection—and that, these causes moving him thereto, his Majesty had resolved forthwith to embody part of the militia of the kingdom." On the same day another proclamation was issued for convening the Parliament (which stood prorogued to the 3rd of January, 1793,) on the 13th of December; the law requiring, that if the militia be drawn out during the recess of Parliament, Parliament shall be assembled within the space of fourteen days. At the same time, troops were marched to the metropolis, the guard at the Bank was doubled, and the fortifications of the Tower of London were repaired.

On the meeting of Parliament on the day appointed, the expressions of the first proclamation were repeated in the royal speech; towards the conclusion of which, the King expressed himself as follows:—"I have carefully observed a strict neutrality in the present war on the Continent, and have uniformly abstained from any interference with respect to the internal government of France: but it is impossible for me to see without the most serious uneasiness, the strong and increasing indications which have appeared there, of an intention to excite disturbances in other countries, to disregard the rights of neutral nations, and pursue views of conquest and aggrandizement, as well as to adopt towards my allies the States General measures which were neither conformable to the law of nations nor to the positive stipulations of existing treaties. Under these circumstances his Majesty thought it right to have recourse to those means of prevention and internal defence with which he was entrusted by law, and to make some augmentation of his naval and military force." On moving the address, a warm debate arose; in the course of which, Mr. Fox asserted "That there never was a period when this country had so much reason to wish for peace. Never was there a period less favourable to a system of hostility." He afterwards moved an amendment, simply pledging the House that enquiry should be made into the facts stated in his Majesty's speech. The amendment was negatived, by 290 against 50. In the Lords, the address was carried without a division; but the Duke of Norfolk, and the Lords Lansdowne, Rawdon, and Stanhope, strongly opposed the address.

By this time, the opposition had suffered a serious defection; in the Upper House, of the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Portland, and Lords Fitzwilliam, Spencer, and Loughborough, who, on the resignation of Lord Thurlow, at this period, was advanced to the Chancellorship; and in the Lower House, Mr. Burke, Mr. Windham, Sir Gilbert Elliot, Mr. Anstruther, &c. who by their secession acquired the appellation of Alarmists. On the bringing up the report, on the succeeding day, however, the debate was resumed; and Mr. Fox moved an amendment, "beseeching his Majesty to employ every means of negotiation consistent with the honour and safety of this country, to avert the calamities of war." Mr. Burke affirmed, "that to send an ambassador to France would be the prelude to the murder of our sovereign." Mr. Pitt was not at this time a member of the House, having vacated his seat by the acceptance of the wardenship of the Cinque Ports, void by the death of the Earl of Guildford. In his absence, Mr. Dundas entered into a long and able vindication of the measures of administration, and the amendment was negatived without a division. Mr. Fox, however, on the 15th of December, moved, "that a minister be sent to Paris to treat with those persons who exercise provisionally the executive government of France." This motion was also negatived, without a division.

One of the earliest measures of precaution which Mr. Pitt next deemed necessary for the preservation of public order, was a bill, for subjecting Aliens to particular regulations and restrictions. The motive which gave rise to this bill, was the influx of Frenchmen into the kingdom, who came hither for the purpose of maintaining a closer communication with the seditious clubs, and for directing the efforts of their members to the subversion of the constitution; a task for which they were eminently qualified. This bill, though supported by the most respectable members of the opposition in both Houses, was strenuously resisted by Lords Guildford, and Lauderdale, in the Upper House, and by Mr. Fox, in the Lower House. It occasioned some further declaration of sentiment, on the part of Mr. Fox, and of those who had seceded from his party, respecting the present state of public affairs, both in England and in France. This only served to confirm the difference which was already known to exist between them. Mr. Burke most clearly proved that the exultation which Mr. Fox had manifested, on the success of the French, was totally inconsistent with the dread which he had expressed of the aggrandisement of France; because her aggrandisement was both the object and the consequence of her successes. He expatiated, with his usual energy, on the nature of French fraternization, and of that liberty which the revolutionists were so anxious to propagate throughout Europe, by plunder and the sword; and which he truly characterized as a liberty without property, without honour, without morals, without order, without government, and without personal security. These apostles of liberty had boasted of having destroyed the Bastile, while they had converted every man's house in Paris into a Bastile. Mr. Burke quoted the speech of M. Dupont in the Convention, to shew that Atheism was the first fruits of French liberty. This man had profligately declared, the religion of Jesus Christ to be unfit to be tolerated in a republic, because it was a monarchical religion, and preached subjection and obedience to God! And the Convention received the declaration with loud applause. He pathetically deplored the natural effects of such systematized profligacy, which went to deprive man of all happiness in life, and of all consolation in death. He considered the Alien bill, as calculated to save the country; for, although the number of suspicious Aliens in the kingdom at this time might be small, yet it should be remembered, that the horrid massacres at Paris, in the preceding autumn, had been perpetrated by a body of men, not exceeding two hundred. He averred that, at that very moment, three thousand daggers, of a peculiar construction, were manufacturing at Birmingham, under the orders of an individual. How many of these were intended for exportation, and how many were designed for home consumption, had not yet been ascertained. He then produced one of these daggers, and threw it on the floor, exclaiming,—"These are the presents which France designs for you.—By these would she propagate her freedom and fraternity. —But may Heaven avert her principles from our minds, and her daggers from our hearts." The debates on the bill were renewed, in its different stages, when Mr. Fox took the lead in opposing it; but it was finally carried, by a decisive majority.

A. D. 1793.] These measures of the British Parliament appear to have had as little influence as a regard for justice, or attention to existing laws, on the minds of the French, who had dethroned their sovereign, and usurped his authority. After a mock trial, in which the forms of justice, and all the principles of law, were violated without scruple, and without reserve, the virtuous Louis was doomed to the scaffold. His execution took place on the 21st of January, and in his last moments he displayed that christian patience, resignation, and fortitude; which a consciousness of innocence, and a firm confidence in the promises of God, are alone competent to inspire.* After this atrocious deed, which fixes

* Ever since the massacre of the 2d of September, 1792, the Mountain, or Anarchists, as they were called, had been labouring to wash away the remembrance of their own guilt on that fatal day, in the blood of their sovereign; and in the month of October various motions were introduced into the convention, and carried by overwhelming majorities, sometimes by acclamation, for the purpose of bringing the King to trial and punishment; and though these measures were generally opposed by the Girondist party, their eloquence and influence were found insufficient to restrain that implacable and sanguinary disposition which had taken possession of the breasts of their rivals, and communicated itself to a great part of the population of the metropolis. About this period a discovery was made, which heightened the popular resentment against the unfortunate sovereign, and led to the most important consequences. A workman, who had been employed to form an iron chest or closet in the wall of the Thuilleries, revealed the fact to Roland, the minister of the home department, and conducted him to the place which contained the sacred deposit.—This chest was found to contain a great number of correspondences; and a committee consisting of 24 members of the convention was therefore chosen to inspect the papers, and prepare the act of accusation. On the 6th of November, Valaze read the report; the discussion upon which was immediately followed by the introduction of a question, the most embarrassing to his accusers, and to the convention: viz. whether the King was not by the constitution invested with perfect and legal inviolability; and whether, consistently with justice, he, whom the law had solemnly pronounced to be above the reach of any legal process, could be brought to trial. This objection was strangely and most unjustly over-ruled by the convention, who in this instance established the precedent, always so fatal to liberty, of an ex post facto law, and evinced to the eyes of Europe their inattention to those "rights of man," which the nation had so solemnly proclaimed. Immediately on the act of accusation being passed, the King was forcibly separated from his family, and the whole of the unhappy prisoners in the temple were guarded with redoubled vigilance; and, contrary to the practice in all criminal cases, in almost every civilized country, it was decreed that Louis should be brought before the Convention without previous notice or preparation. On the 11th of December, the unfortunate monarch was ordered to the bar of the convention, and the act of accusation having been read, he was required by the president, Barrere, to answer to each separate charge. The following extract of the proceedings of the National Convention, on the 11th of December, 1792, will best elucidate the nature of this unprecedented trial:—

"Louis came to the bar: a profound silence reigned in the Assembly. The President said to him,

"'Louis, the people of France accuse you; the National Convention has decreed that you shall be tried, and that its members shall be your judges. You shall now hear the declaration of the crimes imputed to you. Louis, sit down.'

"The King seated himself. A secretary read the accusation, and the President then said,

"'Louis, you are to answer the questions I am commissioned by the National Convention to propose to you.—Louis, you are accused of having committed a multitude of crimes to establish your tyranny by destroying liberty. On the 20th of June, 1789, you committed an outrage against the sovereignty of the people, by suspending the Assemblies of its representatives, and by driving them with violence from their place of meeting. The proof of this is in the verbal process, drawn up in the Tennis Court at Versailles, by the members of the Constituent Assembly. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I acted against no law then in existence.'

"President. 'On the 23d of June, 1789, you attempted to impose laws upon the nation; you surrounded the sitting of the Constituent Assembly with troops, presented them with two royal declarations, subversive of all liberty, and you commanded them to separate.'

"To this the King gave the same answer as to the preceding question.

"President. 'You ordered an army to march against the citizens of Paris; their blood was shed, you did not withdraw your troops till the Bastile was taken, and a general insurrection taught you that the people were victorious. The answers you returned to the deputations of the Constituent Assembly, on the 9th, 12th, and 14th of July, shew what your intentions then were; and the massacre at the Thuilleries also deposes against you. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I had at that time the power to employ my troops where I thought the circumstances required; but I never had any intention to shed blood.'

"President. 'After these events, notwithstanding the promise made by you in the Assembly on the 15th, and in the Hotel de Ville on the 17th, you persisted in your projects against the national liberty. You long evaded sanctioning the decree of the 11th of August, for abolishing personal servitude, feudal rights, and titles; you at first refused to acknowledge the declaration of the rights of man; you doubled the number of your body-guards, and ordered the regiment of Flauden to Versailles; during the festival at that place, you permitted the national cockade to be trampled under foot before your face, the white cockade set up, and the nation to be blasphemed. In short, you rendered a new insurrection necessary, and occasioned the death of many citizens. It was not till after the defeat of your guards, that you changed your language, and renewed your perfidious promises. The proofs of these facts are in your own observations of the 18th of September on the decree of the 10th of August, in the verbal process of the Constituent Assembly, on the events which took place at Versailles on the 5th and 6th of October, and in the answer you returned to the Constituent Assembly, namely, 'That you would be guided by their counsel, and never separate yourself from them.' What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I made the observations which occurred to me, as just and necessary upon the decrees presented to me. The charge respecting the cockade is false. I was witness to no such scene.'

"President. 'At the federation of the 14th of July, 1790, you took an oath which you did not adhere to, but endeavoured, on the contrary, to corrupt the public mind through the agency of Talon in Paris, and the influence of Mirabeau in the provinces. You lavished millions to corrupt the public mind; you attempted to make popularity itself an engine against the people. These facts are evident from a memorial of Talon's, verified by your own hand, and by a letter which La Porte wrote to you on the 19th of April, in which, speaking of a conversation he had with Rivarol, he informs you that the sums you had been advised to distribute had produced nothing.'

"Louis. 'I don't exactly remember what passed at that time; but all these are circumstances which occurred previously to my accepting the constitution.'

"President. 'Was it not in consequence of a plan formed by Talon, that you went to the Fauxbourg St. Antoine, distributed money amongst the poor workmen, telling them that you could do no more for them?'

"Louis. 'I had no greater satisfaction than in giving to those who required relief. In this I had no insidious design.'

"President. 'Was it not in consequence of the same project that you feigned an indisposition to prepare the public mind for your journey to St. Cloud, or to Rambouillet, upon pretext that the country air was necessary for your health?'

"Louis. 'This accusation is quite absurd.'

"President. 'You had long meditated the design of escaping. A plan for that purpose was presented to you on the 23d of February, 1791, which you verified by your own hand writing; and, on the 28th, a considerable number of officers and nobles assembled in the palace of the Thuilleries in order to favour your escape. You attempted to go from Paris to St. Cloud, on the 11th of April; but the opposition of the citizens convinced you, that your design was suspected by the public. You endeavoured to dissipate this distrust by communicating to the Assembly the letter in which you make a declaration to foreign powers, that you had freely accepted the constitution. Notwithstanding this, you made your escape by means of a false passport, on the 21st of the month of June following, leaving behind you a declaration against this very constitution. You ordered the ministers not to sign any acts which came from the National Assembly; and you prohibited the minister of justice from sealing them with the seal of the state; the public money was lavished to ensure the success of this treason; and you ordered Bouillé to assist you with an armed force; that same officer who commanded at the massacres of Nancy, to whom you wrote on that occasion, 'endeavour to preserve your popularity, it may be useful.' These facts are founded on the memorial of the 23d of February, verified by your own hand; and on the declaration of the 20th of June, entirely in your own hand-writing; on your letter of the 4th of September, 1790, to Bouillé; and on a note from him, giving you an account of the employment of 993,000 livres which you had given him, and which he had partly expended in corrupting the troops that were to escort you. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I know nothing of the memorial of the 23d of February. With respect to my journey to Varennes, I refer to the answer I at that time made to the Constituent Assembly.'

"President. 'After you were stopped at Varennes, your executive power was for some time suspended, but you still conspired; and on the 17th of July, the blood of the citizens was shed in the Champ de Mars. A letter in your own hand, addressed to La Fayette, 1790, proves that a criminal coalition existed between you and him, to which Mirabeau had also agreed. All kinds of corruption were employed by you. You paid the expence of publishing libels, pamphlets, and journals, which tended to pervert the public opinion, to discredit assignats, and to support the cause of the emigrants. The registers of Septeuil state what enormous sums were expended for these profligate purposes. You affected to accept the constitution of the 14th of September, you declared yourself willing to maintain it, yet you laboured to overthrow it before it was completed. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'What passed on the 17th of July cannot be justly attributed to me. As to the other charges I have no knowledge of them.'

"President. 'A convention took place at Pilnitz, on the 24th of July, between Leopold of Austria and Frederick William of Brandenburg, for the purpose of re-establishing absolute monarchy in France, with which you were acquainted, yet you concealed it from the National Assembly, until it was known to all Europe. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I made it known as soon as I knew it myself; besides, by the constitution, it was the business of the ministers.'

"President. 'Arles raised the standard of revolt; you favoured it by sending commissioners, who, in place of endeavouring to check the counter-revolutionists, encouraged them by justifying their attempt. What do you answer?'

fixes an indelible stain on the national character of the French people, it was not possible to suffer the representative of the deceased monarch, to continue his residence at the British court. M. Chauvelin was, therefore, ordered to quit the kingdom, within eight days.

Immediately afterwards, a memorial was presented by Lord Auckland, ambassador at the Hague, to the States General, in which his Lordship affirmed to their High Mightinesses, "That not four years ago, some wretches assuming the title of philosophers, had the presumption

"Louis. 'The commissioners' instructions will evince the nature of the orders with which they were intrusted. I knew none of the commissioners when my ministers proposed them to me.'

"President. 'Avignon and Venaissin had been re-united to France; but you did not execute the decree till a month afterwards; during that interval, a civil war desolated the country, and the commissioners you sent completed the devastation. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'That charge cannot personally affect me. I know not what delay attended the execution of the decree; but those who were intrusted with it are alone responsible.'

"President. 'Nismes, Montauban, Mendes, and Jales, experienced violent commotions in the commencement of liberty. You did nothing to extinguish these sparks of counter-revolution till the moment when the conspiracy of Saillans broke out. What do you answer?'

"Louis. 'I gave the orders upon that occasion which were proposed to me by my minister.'

"President. 'You sent two battalions against the Marseillois, who were marching to reduce the counter-revolutionists of Arles. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I must see the papers which regard this affair before I can answer to the charge.'

"President. 'You gave the command of the south to Weigenstein who wrote to you, on the 21st of April, after he had been recalled, in these terms: 'A few moments longer, and I should have surrounded your Majesty's throne with millions of Frenchmen, rendered once more worthy of the wishes you form for their happiness.' What have you to answer.'

"Louis. 'This letter, by the statement of the charge, is posterior to his recall. He has never been employed since. I recollect nothing of the letter.'

"President. 'You paid your disbanded body-guard at Coblentz, as the registers of Septeuil testify; and various orders, signed by you, confirm your having remitted considerable sums to Bouillé, la Vauguyon, Choiseul Beauprè, d'Hamilton, and the woman Polignac.'

"Louis. 'I no sooner received intelligence that my body-guards had assembled in the neighbourhood of the Rhine, than I ordered their pay to be stopped. I remember nothing respecting the rest.'

"President. 'Your brothers, enemies of the state, have called emigrants around their standard; they have raised regiments, borrowed money, and contracted alliances in your name; you did not disavow them, till you were well assured that you could not injure their plans. Your correspondence with them is proved by a note in the hand-writing of Louis Stanislaus Xavier, signed by both your brothers, as follows:

"I have written to you, but it was by the post, so I could say nothing. We are here two, but in mind only one; the same principles, the same sentiments, the same ardour to serve you animates us both. We still keep silence; we should injure you by breaking it too soon, but shall speak out when assured of general support, and that moment is near. If they speak to us on the part of those people, we will listen, but never alter our course; if, therefore, they should exact that you make some declaration to us, make it without hesitation; be easy with regard to your safety; we only exist to serve you: we shall ardently exert ourselves for that purpose, and every thing will go well. Even your enemies have too much interest in your preservation to commit an useless crime which would complete their ruin. Adieu.

"L. S. XAVIER, et
"CHARLES PHILLIPPE."

'What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'As soon as I heard of my brothers' proceedings, I disavowed them as the constitution prescribes. I have none of their letters.'

"President. 'The troops of the line, who ought to have been kept up to the war establishment, amounted only to one hundred thousand men at the end of December; you had thus neglected to guard the safety of the nation. Narbonne, your agent, had required, that fifty thousand additional troops should be raised; but he stopped the levies at twenty-six thousand, declaring that every necessary provision for national defence was made; yet nothing was prepared. Servans proposed to form a camp of twenty thousand men near Paris; the Legislative Assembly decreed this, but you refused to give your sanction to the decree. A patriotic emotion prompted many citizens, in the most distant provinces, to march to Paris: you issued a proclamation, the tendency of which was to stop their march; meanwhile our armies were deficient in soldiers; Dumouriez, who succeeded, declared that the nation was not sufficiently provided with arms, ammunition, or subsistence for the troops; and that the frontier towns were not in a state of defence. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I gave to the minister the orders necessary for the augmentation of the army; the statements were laid before the Assembly; if there were errors in them, it was no fault of mine.'

"President. 'You gave directions to the commanders of the troops to relax the discipline of the army, to excite whole regiments to desert, and to pass the Rhine in order to join your brothers, and Leopold of Austria. This fact is proved by a letter of Toulongeon's, commander in Franche Comté. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'There is not a word of truth in this accusation.'

"President. 'You commissioned your diplomatic agents to encourage a coalition between your brothers and foreign powers against France, particularly to strengthen the peace between Turkey and Austria; that the latter, by withdrawing her troops from the Turkish frontiers, might be enabled to direct a greater force against France, as is proved by a letter from Choiseul Gouffier, ambassador to Constantinople. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'M. Choiseul has not spoken the truth; there is no foundation for such an idea.'

"President. 'You neglected to provide for the safety of the nation at a most dangerous crisis; you delayed till the Legislative Assembly required of the minister Legard to point out the means of defence, and then, but no sooner, you sent a message to the Assembly, proposing a levy of forty two battalions. The Prussians were advancing to our frontiers; your minister was ordered, on the 8th of July, to give an account of our actual situation with regard to Prussia; you answered on the 10th, that fifty thousand Prussians were on their march against us, and that you gave that information to the Assembly as directed by the constitution. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I had no knowledge of the fact until the tenth; all diplomatic correspondence was carried on by the ministers.'

"President. 'You placed Dabancourt, the nephew of Calonne, at the head of the war department; and such was the success of your treachery, that Longwy and Verdun were delivered up as soon as the enemy appeared before them.'

"Louis. 'I did not know that M. Dabancourt was the nephew of Calonne; it was not I who dismantled those towns; I would never have authorised it.'

"President. 'Who dismantled Longwy and Verdun?'

"Louis. 'If such was their situation, I know nothing of it.'

"President. 'You have destroyed our navy; so many of its officers emigrated, that there hardly remained a sufficient number for the service; nevertheless, Bertrand continued to grant passports, and when the legislative body represented to you, on the 8th of March, his criminal conduct, you answered, that you were satisfied with his services.'

"Louis. 'I did every thing in my power to retain the officers in the service. The National Assembly produced no charge that appeared to me of a criminal nature against Bertrand, therefore I did not think it just to dismiss him.'

"President. 'You countenanced absolute government in the colonies; your agents fomented disturbances, and the counter-revolution there, at the same time that it was to have taken place in France.'

"Louis. 'If any persons called themselves my agents in the colonies, they did it without authority from me. I gave no countenance to any thing of the nature you mention.'

"President. 'The national tranquillity was disturbed by fanatics; you shewed yourself their protector, and manifested an evident intention of recovering your former power by their means. What do you answer?'

"Louis. 'I have no answer to make to this charge. I had no knowledge of any such design.'

"President. 'The Legislative Body, on the 29th of November, passed a decree against seditious priests, but you suspended the execution of it. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'The constitution allowed me the free power of sanctioning or rejecting decrees.'

"President. 'Disturbances increased; the minister declared, that he knew no existing laws by which the guilty could be punished. The Legislative Body passed a new decree; you suspended the execution of that also.'

"Louis. 'The same reply.'

"President. 'The bad conduct of those guards which the constitution had given to you, was such, that the Assembly was under the necessity of decreeing, that they should be disbanded; the day after, you wrote a letter to the Assembly, declaring your satisfaction, and yet you continued to pay them, as is proved by the accounts of the treasurer of the civil list.'

"Louis. 'I only continued their pay until they should be re-established according as the decree required.'

"President. 'You retained your Swiss guards about your person in contradiction to the constitution, and after the Legislative Assembly had ordered their departure. What do you answer?'

"Louis. 'I conformed to the decree on that subject.'

"President. 'You authorised d'Augremont and Gilles secretly to maintain private companies in Paris, for the purpose of exciting commotions favourable to your plans of counter-revolution. The receipts of Gilles, who was ordered to organize a company of sixty men, will be presented to you. What have you to answer?'

"Louis. 'I am quite ignorant of those schemes attributed to me. The idea of a counter-revolution never entered my head.'

"President. 'You endeavoured by considerable sums to bribe several members of the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies. This fact is proved by letters from Dufresne, Saint Leon, and many others which will be produced.'

"Louis. 'Such plans were frequently presented to me, but I rejected them.'

"President. 'Who were the members of the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies whom you corrupted?'

"Louis. 'I never sought to corrupt any. I know of none.'

"President. 'Who were the persons that presented plans to you?'

"Louis. The plans were so absurd, that I do not recollect.'

"President.

presumption to think themselves capable of establishing a new system of civil society. In order to realize that dream of their vanity, they found it necessary to overthrow and destroy all received notions of subordination, manners, and religion, which have hitherto formed all the security, happiness, and consolation, of the human race. Their destructive projects have but too well succeeded. But the effects of the new system which they endeavoured to introduce, served only to shew the imbecility and villany of its authors. The events which

" President. ' To whom did you promise money?'

" Louis. ' To none.'

" President. ' You suffered the French nation to be degraded in Germany, Italy, and Spain; by not exacting reparation for the insults offered to the French in those countries. What have you to answer?'

" Louis. ' The diplomatic correspondence proves the contrary. At any rate, that was the business of the ministers.'

President. ' On the 10th of August, you reviewed the Swiss guards at five o'clock in the morning, and they fired first on the citizens. What have you to answer?'

" Louis. ' I that day reviewed all the troops that were assembled near me. The constituted authorities, the mayor of Paris, &c. were present. I had even requested a deputation might be sent me from the National Assembly, that they might advise me how I should act in that emergency; and I afterwards took refuge in the Assembly, with my family.'

" President. ' Why did you cause the Swiss guard to be doubled, in the beginning of August?'

" Louis. ' All the constituted authorities knew that the palace was to be attacked. As I was one of the constituted authorities, I had a right to defend myself.'

" President. ' Why did you send for the Mayor of Paris on the evening of the 9th of August?'

" Louis. ' Because of the rumours that were spread.'

" President. ' You caused the blood of Frenchmen to be shed.'

" Louis. ' No, Sir, it was not I.'

" President. ' Did not you authorise Septeuil to undertake a commercial speculation in grain, sugar, and coffee, at Hamburgh, and in other towns? This is proved by Septeuil's own letters.'

" Louis. ' I know nothing about what you mention.'

" President. ' Why did you put a veto on the decree ordering a camp to be formed round Paris?'

" Louis. ' The constitution gave me full powers to sanction decrees or not. At that time I ordered a camp nearer the frontiers at Soissons.'

" President. ' Louis, have you any thing to add in your defence?'

" Louis. ' I demand a copy of the act of accusation, and that I may be allowed counsel to conduct my cause.'

" Valaze, who sat near the bar, presented and read to Louis Capet the pieces, viz. The memoir of Laporte and Mirabeau, and some others, containing plans of a counter-revolution.

" Louis. ' I disown them.'

" Valaze next presented several other papers, on which the act of accusation was founded, and asked the King if he recognised them. These papers were the following:—

" Letter of Louis Capet, dated June 29, 1790, settling his connections with Mirabeau and La Fayette, to effect a revolution in the constitution.'

" Louis. ' I reserve to myself to answer the contents.' (Valaze read the letter)—' It is only a plan, in which there is no question about a counter-revolution; the letter was not to have been sent.'

" Valaze. ' Letter of Louis Capet, of the 22d of April, relative to conversations about the jacobins, about the president of the committee of finances, and the committee of domains; it is dated by the hand of Louis Capet.'

" Louis. ' I disown it.'

" Valaze. ' Letter of Laporte, of Thursday morning, March 3, marked in the margin, in the hand-writing of Louis Capet, with March 3, 1791, implying a pretended rupture between Mirabeau and the jacobins.'

" Louis. ' I disown it.'

" Valaze. ' Letter of Laporte without date, in his hand-writing, but marked in the margin by the hand of Louis Capet, containing particulars respecting the last moments of Mirabeau, and expressing the care that had been taken to conceal from the knowledge of men some papers of great concern which had been deposited with Mirabeau.'

" Louis. ' I disown it as well as the rest.'

Valaze. ' Plan of a constitution, or revision of the constitution, signed La Fayette, addressed to Louis Capet, April 6, 1790, marked in the margin with a line in his own hand-writing.'

" Louis. ' These things have been blotted out by the constitution.'

" Valaze. ' Do you know this writing?'

" Louis. ' I do not.'

" Valaze. ' Your marginal comments?'

" Louis. ' I do not.'

" Valaze. ' Letter of Laporte of the 19th of April, marked in the margin by Louis Capet, April 19, 1791, mentioning a conversation with Rivarol.'

" Louis. ' I disown it.'

" Valaze. ' Letter of Laporte, marked April 16, 1791, in which it seems complaints are made of Mirabeau, the Abbé Perigord, André, and Beaumetz, who do not seem to acknowledge sacrifices made for their sake.'

" Louis. ' I disown it likewise.'

" Valaze. Letter of Laporte of the 23d of February, 1791, marked and dated in the hand-writing of Louis Capet; a memorial annexed to it, respecting the means of his gaining popularity.'

" Louis. I know neither of these pieces.'

" Valaze. ' Several pieces without signature, found in the castle of the Thuilleries, in the gap which was shut in the wall of the palace, relating to the expences to gain popularity.'

President. ' Previously to an examination on this subject, I wish to ask a preliminary question.—Have you caused a press with an iron door to be constructed in the castle of the Thuilleries, and had you your papers locked up in that press?'

" Louis. ' I have no knowledge of it whatever.'

Valaze. ' Here is a day-book written by Louis Capet himself, containing the pensions he has granted out of his coffer from 1776 till 1792, in which are observed some douceurs granted to Acloque.'

" Louis. ' This I own, but it consists of charitable donations which I have made.'

" Valaze. ' Different lists of sums paid to the Scotch companies of Noailles, Gramont, Montmorency, and Luxemburg, on the 9th of July, 1791.'

" Louis. ' This is prior to the epoch when I forbade them to be paid.'

" President. ' Louis where had you deposited those pieces which you own?'

" Louis. ' With my treasurer.'

" Valaze. ' Do you know these pension-lists of the life-guards, the one hundred Swiss, and the king's-guards, for 1792?'

" Louis. ' I do not.'

" Valaze. ' Several pieces relative to the conspiracy of the camp of Jales, the originals of which are deposited among the records of the department of L'Ardeche?'

" Louis. ' I have not the smallest knowledge of them.'

" Valaze. ' Letter of Bouillé, dated Mentz, bearing an account of 993,000 livres received of Louis Capet?'

" Louis. ' I disown it.'

" Valaze. ' An order for the payment of 168,000 livres, signed Louis, endorsed Le Bonneirs, with a letter and billet of the same?'

" Louis. ' I disown it.'

" Louis. ' I know nothing of it.'

" Louis. ' I do not.'

" Valaze. ' Here is a memorandum for indemnifying the civil list for the military pensions; a letter of Dufresne St. Leon, which relates to it.'

" Louis. ' I know none of these pieces.'

" The President then addressing the King, said:—

' I have no other question to propose, have you any thing more to add in your defence?'

" Louis. ' I wish to have a copy of the accusation, and of the papers on which it is founded. I also wish to have counsel of my own nomination.

" Pres. ' Your two first requests are already decreed, and the determination respecting the other will be made known in due time.' "

It was agreed by the convention, after some deliberation, that counsel should be allowed to the King; and his choice fell upon M. Tronchet, Lamoignon-Malesherbes, and Desèze. On the 26th of December, the King appeared for the last time at the bar, and M. Desèze read a defence which the counsel had prepared, replete with sound argument, and exhibiting a master-piece of composition. At the close of the defence, the King arose, and with a firm voice and dignified manner, expressed himself as follows:—

" CITIZENS,

" You have heard my defence; I now speak to you, perhaps for the last time, and declare that my counsel have asserted nothing but the truth; my conscience reproaches me with nothing; I never was afraid of having my conduct investigated; but I observed with great uneasiness, that I was accused of giving orders for shedding the blood of the people on the 10th of August. The proofs I have given through my whole life of a contrary disposition, I hoped, would have saved me from such an imputation, which, I now solemnly declare, is entirely groundless."

On the 16th of January the trial closed; and after a sitting of nearly thirty-four hours, the punishment of death was awarded. When all the members had voted, the President rose to pronounce the result of their deliberations. A profound and awful silence ensued, while he declared, that out of seven hundred and twenty votes, three hundred and sixty-six were for death, three hundred and nineteen for imprisonment during the war, two for perpetual imprisonment; eight for a suspension of the execution of death till after the expulsion of the Bourbons; twenty-three for not inflicting the punish-so rapidly followed each other since that epoch, surpass in atrocity all which have ever polluted the pages of history. ment of death, unless the French territory should be invaded by some foreign power; and one was for death, but with commutation of punishment. "In consequence of this decision," said the President, "I declare that the punishment decreed against Louis Capet is death!" At this period of the sitting, the King's counsellors were admitted to the bar, when M. Desèze addressing the Convention, said:—"Citizens, representatives, the law of the nation, and your decrees, have intrusted to us the sacred functions of the defence of Louis. We come, with regret, to present to you the last act of our function. Louis has given to us his express charge to read to you a letter, signed with his own hand, of which the following is a copy:

"I owe it to my honour, I owe it to my family, not to subscribe to a sentence, which declares me guilty of a crime, of which I cannot accuse myself. In consequence, I appeal to the nation from the sentence of its representatives; and I commit by these presents to the fidelity of my defenders, to make known to the National Convention this appeal, by all the means in their power, and to demand that mention of it be made in the minutes of their sitting.

(Signed) "LOUIS."

This appeal was rejected, and only one effort more remained to be made in favour of the unfortunate monarch, which was to press for the respite of the sentence of death. The appeal-nominal on this important question was terminated at midnight, on Saturday, the 19th of January. The members were required to give their votes simply yes or no, without arguing the point; and on the scrutiny, 310 votes appeared in favour of the respite, and 380 for the execution of the sentence in twenty-four hours, the time prescribed by the law against criminals; and the executive council were accordingly instructed to prepare the devoted Louis for his fate. At the request of the King, the Abbé Edgeworth, grand vicar of the diocese of Paris, and confessor of the Princess Elizabeth, an ecclesiastic of an Irish family, was permitted to attend him as his confessor; and the following particulars are given on his authority:—

"It was not till the 20th of January, at four o'clock in the afternoon, that the Abbé was sent for to the Thuilleries, by the executive council, who were assembled at that place. This summons he instantly obeyed, and on entering the apartment, Garat, the minister of justice, said, "Louis Capet desires to see you, will you go to the Temple?" "Unquestionably I will," replied the Abbe, "the King's request is an order in my eyes." "Follow me then," said the minister, and ordering his carriage, they drove off to the Temple. After remaining some time in the hall, where his pockets were searched, and his snuff-box examined to see that it did not contain poison; the Abbe was shewn to the apartment of the King, whose countenance exhibited the utmost serenity. He sunk on his knees, kissed his Majesty's hand, and bathed it with tears. The King, equally affected, raised him, saying: "None but the most unrelenting of men have been allowed to approach me of late. My eyes are accustomed to them, but the sight of a man of humanity, a faithful subject, affects my whole soul, and melts me as you see." Being in some measure recovered, he led the Abbe into his closet, and having made him sit down, he read his last will twice over to him, with a firm tone, and proper emphasis, his voice faultering only at those parts where mention is made of the Queen, his children, and the Princess Elizabeth. After this he rose, saying, "I must now go and see my family for the last time. This will be the severest trial of all. When that is over, I will fix my mind solely on what concerns my salvation." Leaving the Abbe in his closet, the unhappy monarch went to the room where his family were already assembled, and which was separated only by a door from that in which were two commissaries constantly on duty; this door was of glass, so that these men could see all that passed. In such horrible circumstances, and in this dismal room, did the King of France meet his deploring family, now rendered more dear to him than ever by his own approaching fate, and their unexampled misfortunes. Here passed a scene of woe far beyond the power of description, to which the mind of sensibility alone can do justice. In such a moment the monarch must forget his crown, and the regrets of ambition must be unfelt amidst the anguish which overwhelms the broken heart. The anguish was not confined to the bosom of the King, the Queen, and his sister: the Princess, his daughter, had attained that age when the heart is perhaps the most susceptible of strong impressions, and its sensibility the most exquisite. Even the young Prince, who was only in his ninth year, partook deeply in the general sorrow, and while his eyes were bathed in tears, he cried sobbing to Santerre, "Ah, laissez moi courir les rues! j'irai aux districts—j'irai à toutes les sections, demander grâce pour mon papa."—"Oh let me run through the streets, I will go to the districts—I will go to the sections, and beg for my papa." At the close of this agonizing interview, which lasted more than an hour, the King returned to his own room, in a state of emotion that cannot be expressed. "Why," said he, addressing the Abbe, after he had recovered himself, "why do I love with so much tenderness; and wherefore am I so tenderly beloved? But the painful sacrifice is over, let me now turn my thoughts to the care of my salvation alone." Having thus expressed himself, he remained for some minutes in silent meditation, interrupted by sighs, accompanied with tears, and then began to converse on the great truths of religion; and astonished his confessor as much by the extensive knowledge he displayed on that subject, as he had before edified him by his piety. About ten o'clock the King took a slight supper, which being over, the Abbe asked him whether he would not like to hear mass, and to receive the communion. The King replied, that he most ardently desired it; but he shewed, at the same time, that he had little hope of that favour being granted him. "I must have permission," said he, "from this council in the Temple, who have hitherto granted me nothing, but what it was impossible to withhold." M. Edgeworth went directly, and signified the King's request to the council sitting in the Temple. He met with many difficulties. "There are examples in history," said a member of the court, "of priests who have mixed poison with the hostie."—"I have been sufficiently searched," said the Abbe, "to satisfy you that I have no poison about me: but to render yourselves still more certain, you have only to furnish me with the hosties; and if it should prove poisoned, the blame will not be imputable to me." To this the council made no immediate answer: but the members went into the room where they usually held their meetings. The King's demand was formally deliberated on; after which, the Abbe being called in, the President said: "Citizen, minister of worship, that which Louis Capet requests not being contrary to law, we have agreed to grant it on two conditions: first, that you sign the request; and secondly, that the ceremony you intend to perform shall terminate before seven o'clock to-morrow morning; as at eight o'clock, Louis Capet must go hence to the place of execution." The Abbe Edgeworth submitted to these conditions, and went to inform the King, who expressed the highest satisfaction at the hope of once more having the consolation of hearing mass, and of receiving the communion. When his confession was ended, M. Edgeworth, seeing the King exhausted by the anguish and fatigue he had undergone, advised him to go to bed, and endeavour to obtain a little repose. With this advice, the King thought proper to comply.

On the 28th of January, his Majesty sent a message to both Houses of Parliament, informing them, that he had given directions for laying before them copies of several papers, which had been received from M. Chauvelin, by the Secretary of State, and the answers thereto, and likewise a copy of an order made by his Majesty in council,

Having slept with tranquillity, Louis called for Clery, his valet, early next morning, to assist him in dressing. He heard mass, and received the communion with the most profound devotion. After having finished his prayers, he said to M. Edgeworth, "How happy am I in having retained my faith in religion. Yes! I shall be enabled to shew them that I do not fear death."

A noise being heard at the door, the Abbe was agitated. He thought the fatal moment had already arrived. The King, without betraying the least emotion, maintained his usual serenity. It was the guards who resumed their posts. "Here they come, however;" said the King, calmly, on hearing some persons ascending the stairs. It was the commissaries of the commune, with a priest at their head, called Jacques Roux. They came to announce that the hour was at hand. "It is enough," said the King, "I will join you directly: but I wish to pass a few moments alone with my confessor." They retired. His Majesty shut the door, and said, falling on his knees, "All is consummated. Give me your last benediction."

Fear of the danger to which M. Edgeworth might be exposed, in accompanying the King to the place of execution, had prevented his Majesty from making such a proposition; and he supposed that they were now about to separate: but when he found that it was the fixed determination of this venerable man, worthy of the sacred functions he exercised, to abide by him to the last, his Majesty was at once moved by tenderness, and filled with satisfaction. Having thrown open the door,

"Marchons," (let us go) said he with a firm tone of voice, to Santerre, who waited without.

Here the King offered to Roux, the priest, a pacquet, containing his testament, desiring that he would deliver it to the commune. He refused to take it, saying, that it was his duty to conduct him to the scaffold, but nothing else. One of his companions, however, took the pacquet, and remitted it carefully to the commune.

Before they came to the stair of the Temple, the King, perceiving that the commissaries were covered, desired Clery to bring his hat, which he immediately put on his head; and being escorted by a very numerous detachment of national guards, he walked through the first court of the Temple, and found the carriage provided for him in the second. Two men belonging to the gendarmes stood at the door. One of them got into the carriage, followed by the King, and M. Edgeworth. The other gendarme placed himself by his comrade.

A profound silence reigned among the people all the way from the Temple to the place de Louis XV. All the streets were lined with national guards under arms. Nothing was heard but the sound of drums. His Majesty continued reading with the utmost devotion, till the carriage stopped near the scaffold. The executioners having opened the door, the King said to the two gendarmes, "Gentlemen, I recommend M. Edgeworth to your protection." As they made no immediate answer, he added, with greater earnestness, "I conjure you take care that no harm befall him after my death."

"Well, well, give yourself no further trouble; we shall take care of him;" answered one of them, in a harsh and ironical tone of voice.

The King having thrown off his coat, was going to ascend the scaffold, when they seized his hands, on purpose to tie them behind his back. As he was not prepared for this last insult, his first movement was to repel it with indignation; but M. Edgeworth, sensible that all resistance would be useless, and would expose the King to outrages still more violent, persuaded him into compliance, by saying: "Sire, this new humiliation is another circumstance in which council, and transmitted by his Majesty's commands, to the said M. Chauvelin, in consequence of the accounts of the atrocious act recently perpetrated at Paris. In the present situation of affairs, his Majesty thought it indispensably necessary to make a further augmentation of his forces by sea and land; and relied on the known affection, and zeal, of the House of Commons, to enable him, to take the most effectual measures, in the present important juncture, for maintaining the security, and rights, of his own dominions; for supporting his allies; and for opposing views of aggrandisement and ambition on the part of France, which would be, at all times, dangerous to the general interests of Europe, but were peculiarly so, when connected with the propagation of principles, which led to the violation of the most sacred duties, and were utterly subversive of the peace, and order, of all civil society.

On the 1st of February, the very day on which a decree was unanimously passed by the National Convention, declaring "The republic of France at war with the King of Great Britain, and the Stadtholder of your Majesty's sufferings resemble those of that Saviour, who will soon be your recompence."

As he was mounting the scaffold, supported by the Abbe Edgeworth, this servant of God addressed the King in this sublime expression, "Offspring of St. Louis, ascend to heaven!"

As soon as he came upon the scaffold, advancing with a firm step to the part which faced the palace, he desired the drums to cease, and was immediately obeyed, in spite of the orders that had been received. He then pronounced, with a voice loud enough to be heard at the gardens of the Thuilleries,

"I die innocent of all the crimes which have been imputed to me. I forgive my enemies. I implore God, from the bottom of my heart, to pardon them, and not to take vengeance on the French nation for the blood about to be shed——"

He was continuing, when Santerre pushed furiously towards the drummers, and forced them to beat without interruption. The executioners, at the same time, laid hold on their victim—his head was placed on the block—the fatal instrument of death descended—and the horrid deed was completed!

As soon as the King's head was severed from his body, a young man, appointed to that service, seized it by the hair, and holding it up to the people, exclaimed repeatedly, Vive la nation! To which some of the populace replied, Vive la république! but the majority appeared to be struck dumb with horror, while the affections of many led them to bathe their handkerchiefs in his blood, and his hair was sold in small parcels, probably to those, whose piety and tenderness would esteem it an inestimable relic. The body was conveyed in a cart to the parish church of St. Madelaine, and laid among the bodies of those, who had been crushed to death on the place de Louis XV. when Louis XVI. was married, and of those, who had fallen before the chateau of the Thuilleries, on the 10th of August. The grave was filled with quick lime; a guard was placed over it, till the corpse was consumed; and the ground was then carefully levelled with the surrounding earth.

The subjoined last will and testament of this ill-fated sovereign was written in the immediate prospect of death:—

"The last Will and Testament of LOUIS XVI.

"In the name of the Holy Trinity, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. This day, the 21st of December, 1792, I, Louis the Sixteenth, King of France, having been for more than four months shut up with my family in the Tower of the Temple, by those who were my subjects, and deprived of every communication, even with my family, since the eleventh of this month; and being moreover involved in a trial, of which, from the passions of men, it is impossible to foresee the event, and for which neither pretext nor precedent can be found in any existing law; having no witness of my thoughts but God, and no one but him to whom I can address myself, I here declare, in his presence, my last will and sentiments.

"I recommend my soul to God, my Creator, beseeching him to receive it in his mercy, and not to judge me according to my merits, but according to the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord, who offered himself as a sacrifice to God his Father for the human race, unworthy as we are, I myself in particular. I die in the communion of our Holy Mother, the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Church, which holds its power by an uninterrupted succession from St. Peter, to whom Jesus Christ intrusted it. I firmly believe all that is contained in the Apostles' Creed, and in the commandments of God, and the church; in the sacraments and mysteries, as the Catholic church teaches, and has always taught. I have never presumed to make myself a judge of the different manners of explaining the doctrines, which divide the church of Jesus Christ, but I have always adhered to, and if it please God to prolong my life, shall always abide by, the decisions which the superior ecclesiastics, in union with the holy church, have given, according to the discipline observed since Jesus Christ. I lament with my whole heart, those of my brethren of mankind who are in error, but do not presume to judge them; and I do not the less love them all in Jesus Christ, as Christian charity enjoins. I implore God to pardon all my sins. I have endeavoured scrupulously to know them, to detest them, and to humble myself in the presence of the Almighty. Not having it in my power to avail myself of the ministry of a Catholic priest, I pray God, to receive the confession which I have made to him; above all, my deep repentance for having signed my name (although against my will) to acts contrary to the discipline and belief of the Catholic church, to which my heart has ever been sincerely united. I beseech God to accept my firm resolution of taking the first opportunity in my power, of making a full confession of my sins to a Catholic priest, and of receiving the sacrament of penitence. I beg all those whom I have offended, through inadvertency, (for I do not recollect having ever intentionally offended any one) and also those to whom I may have given a bad example, to forgive me, for the evil which such conduct may have produced. I beseech all those who are endowed with charity, to join their prayers with mine, to obtain of God the pardon of my iniquities. I pardon, with my whole heart, those who have become my enemies without cause, and I pray God to pardon them; as also those who, from false or mistaken zeal, have done me the greatest injuries.

"I recommend to God, my wife, my children, my sister, my aunts, my brothers, and all those who are attached to me, by the ties of blood, or in any manner whatsoever. I earnestly intreat of God, to cast the eyes of mercy on my wife, my children, and my sister, who have for a long time suffered with me; and, in case of their losing me, that he may be their support and consolation, as long as they shall remain in this perishable world.

"I recommend my children to my wife. I never doubted her maternal tenderness; and I recommend, above all, that she will carefully endeavour to make them good Christians; to teach them to consider worldly grandeur as dangerous and perishable, and to fix their minds on eternity, where alone solid and lasting glory is to be found. I entreat my sister, to continue her tenderness to my children, and that she will be to them as a parent, if they should have the misfortune to lose their mother. I beseech my wife, to forgive me all those hardships she has undergone on my account, and all the uneasiness I may have given her in the course of our union; and if she should think that she has any cause to reproach herself, on account of any part of her conduct towards me, she may rest assured, that I retain nothing on my mind unfavourable to her.

"I recommend, with the greatest earnestness, to my children, after what they owe to God, which must ever be considered as their first duty, to remain always united to each other, submissive and obedient to their mother, and grateful for the pains and care she takes of them; and I conjure them, for my sake, that they will respect their aunt as a second mother.

"If my son should ever have the misfortune to be established on the throne, I anxiously recommend that he should devote himself to the happiness of his countrymen; that he ought to divest himself of all resentment and animosities, particularly those which have a reference to my misfortunes and miseries. He can ensure the happiness of the people only by reigning according to the laws; although, at the same time, a King cannot make himself respected, and do all the good which is in his heart, without a necessary degree of authority; without which he must be confined in his operations; and when he cannot inspire respect, he necessarily becomes more hurtful than useful.

"I recommend to my son, to take care of all those persons who have been attached to me, as far as the circumstances in which he may find himself shall afford him opportunity. He ought ever to regard this as a sacred debt, which I have contracted towards the children or parents of those who perished for my sake, or have been rendered miserable on my account. I know there are several persons, amongst those who were attached to me, who have not behaved towards me as they ought to have done, and who have even shewn ingratitude: but I forgive them (for, in times of trouble and effervescence, men are not always masters of their conduct;) and I beseech my son, should he find an opportunity of serving them, to reflect only upon their misfortunes.

"I wish it were in my power openly to express my gratitude to all, who have shewn me a truly disinterested attachment: but if I have been painfully affected by the ingratitude and disloyalty of those to whom I have always acted with kindness, I have likewise had the consolation of receiving services and strong marks of attachment from several of my subjects, on whom I never had bestowed any favour. I beg that all those persons will accept my grateful acknowledgments. In the present situation of things, I fear that I should injure them by being more explicit on this subject: but I particularly exhort my son to seek opportunities of making them a suitable return. I think, however, that it would be calumniating the nation to express any fear of openly recommending to my son, M. de Chamilly and M. Hue, whose sincere attachment to me has induced them to shut themselves up along with me in this melancholy abode, and who have been frequently in danger of becoming victims to their generosity. I also recommend to them Clery, with whose attention I have had every reason to be satisfied since he has been with me; and as he has remained with me to the last, I beg of the commune to give to him my clothes, my books, my watch, my money, and all the other effects belonging to me, which have been deposited in the hands of the council of the commune.

"I most willingly pardon those who have guarded me, for the harshness of their conduct, and the constraint which they thought necessary to impose upon me. I have found in the Temple some persons of feeling and humanity: may they long enjoy that serenity of mind, which such dispositions naturally produce!

"I beseech Messrs. de Malesherbes, Tronchet, and Desèze, to receive my most grateful thanks, and cordial acknowledgments, for the pains and labour they have taken for me.

"I conclude by declaring, before God, being ready to appear in his presence, that I do not reproach myself with any of those crimes which have been charged against me."

"LOUIS."

Holland,

Holland, this message was taken into consideration by the House of Commons. Mr. Pitt entered into a copious and luminous illustration of French principles, and took an extensive view of the subjects, both foreign and domestic, to which the message related. In the course of his speech, and in illustration of the sentiments and designs of the French rulers, Mr. Pitt read a letter from one of them, Monge, addressed to the friends of liberty, in the different sea-ports of France, and bearing date the 31st of December, 1792, only four days after a communication from Chauvelin, to Lord Grenville, in which that same council had complained that a harsh construction had been put, by the British ministry, on the conduct of France, and at the same time, professed the strongest friendship for Great Britain. In this letter England and Spain were represented as two tyrannical governments, which, after persecuting the patriots in their own territories, thought they should be able to influence the judgment to be pronounced on the tyrant Louis. But the people of France would not suffer laws to be dictated to them by a tyrant. "The King and his Parliament mean to make war against us! Will the English republicans suffer it? Already these free men shew their discontent, and the repugnance which they have to bear arms against their brothers, the French. Well! we will fly to their succour, we will make a descent on the island; we will lodge there fifty thousand caps of liberty; we will plant there the sacred tree, and we will stretch out our arms to our republican brethren: the tyranny of their government will soon be destroyed. Let every one of us be strongly impressed with this idea." Such was the declaration of the sentiments of the minister of the Marine; a declaration which separated not only the King, but the King and Parliament, from the people, who were called republicans. What faith could be put in assurances, given on the part of France by Chauvelin, on the 27th of December, when, in four days after, a member of the French government was found writing such a letter? It was highly proper, therefore, to reject such explanations as those which had been offered only to deceive. The state of the negotiation, then, appeared to be this, the conduct of France was inconsistent with the peace and liberty of Europe, the French had given no satisfaction with respect to the question at issue; they had, indeed, offered what they called explanations, but their principles, and the whole tenour of their conduct, were such, that no faith could be put in their declarations. Their conduct gave the lie to their public professions; and, instead of giving satisfaction on the distinct articles, on which we had a right to claim a clear and precise explanation, and instead of shewing any desire to abandon those views of conquest and aggrandisement, to return within their ancient limits, and to set barriers to the progress of their destructive arms, and to their principles, still more destructive; instead of doing this, they had, by way of explanation, avowed their determination to persist in those practices which constituted the very ground of complaint. If France was really desirous of maintaining friendship and peace with England, she must shew herself disposed to renounce her views of aggression, and aggrandisement, and to confine herself within her own territory, without insulting other governments, without disturbing their tranquillity, without violating their rights. Unless she consented to these terms, whatever might be the wishes of the British nation for peace, the final issue must be war. But, as to the time, as to the moment, when the war was to commence, if there were yet any possibility of satisfactory explanation, and security for the future, it was not to the last moment precluded. Mr. Pitt said, however, that he should disguise his sentiments to the House, if he stated, that he thought an accommodation in any degree probable. The country had always been desirous of peace, it was so still, but of such a peace as might be real and solid, and consistent with the interests and dignity of Britain, and with the general security of Europe. War, whenever it came, would be preferable to peace without honour, without security, and incompatible either with the external safety, or internal happiness, of the country. Mr. Pitt, after he had fully developed his sentiments, on the important question at issue, moved an address, thanking his Majesty for his communication; offering him the heartfelt condolence of the House, on the atrocious act lately perpetrated at Paris; expressing their sense of the aggressive and ambitious conduct of France; declaring their opinion of the necessity of a vigorous opposition to such conduct, and to the principles out of which it arose; and promising to make the necessary provision for a further augmentation of the national forces by sea and land.

A very animated debate ensued, in the course of which, Mr. Fox declared his opinion of the nonexistence of any danger to this country, and strongly deprecated a war. The address, upon this occasion, was carried without a division. A few days afterwards, the intelligence was received that France had declared war against Great Britain and Holland; and on the 11th of February, 1793, a royal message was delivered to the two Houses of Parliament, announcing, "That the Assembly, now exercising the powers of government in France, have, without previous notice, directed acts of hostility to be committed against the persons and property of his Majesty's subjects, in breach of the law of nations, and of the most positive stipulations of treaty; and have since, on the most groundless pretences, actually declared war against his Majesty and the United Provinces. Under the circumstances of this wanton, and unprovoked aggression, his Majesty has taken the necessary steps, to maintain the honour of his crown, and to vindicate the rights of his people. And his Majesty relies with confidence on the firm and effectual support of the House of Commons, and on the zealous exertions of a brave and loyal people, in prosecuting a just and necessary war; and in endeavouring, under the blessing of Providence, to oppose an effectual barrier to the progress of a system, which strikes at the security and peace of all independent nations, and is pursued in open defiance of every principle of moderation, good faith, humanity, and justice. In a cause of such general concern, his Majesty has every reason to hope for the cordial co-operation of those powers, who are united with his Majesty by the ties of alliance, or who feel an interest in preventing the extension of anarchy and confusion, and in contributing to the security and tranquillity of Europe." Upon this occasion, Mr. Pitt contented himself with examining the several articles of the French declaration; and he concluded with asserting, that he found in it nothing but pretexts and allegations too weak to require refutation. "We had in every instance observed the strictest neutrality with respect to France. We had pushed to its utmost extent the system of temperance and moderation. We had waited to the last moment for satisfactory explanation." He then moved the address to the throne. Mr. Fox contended, that every step on our part had seemed to indicate a desire to break with France. To have continued Earl Gower at Paris after the event of the 10th of August, would have implied no recognition of the validity of the government which succeeded to the monarchy, nor approbation of their proceedings: and it was certainly more eligible to treat in a direct, than an indirect mode, with those who exercised the powers of government. As the prohibition of exporting corn to France, when it was allowed to other countries, was a positive infraction of the subsisting treaty; and the order received by M. Chauvelin to depart the kingdom was an act of open hostility on our part; he could not allow the declaration of war to be an unprovoked aggression on that of France. He moved, therefore, an amendment to the proposed address; but it was negatived, without a division.

In the House of Peers during this session, the debates were too similar to those of the Commons, to render a relation of them necessary. By the great defection experienced by the Whig party, however, the numbers of the opposition were now very low. In the Commons, on the 15th of March, the Attorney-General, Sir John Scott, introduced his "Traitorous Correspondence Bill," by which it was not only, according to precedent, declared to be high-treason to supply the existing government ment of France with military stores, &c. but to purchase lands of inheritance in France, or invest money in any of the French funds: also to prevent the subjects of Britain, from going from this country to France, without a license under the great seal. It likewise prohibited the return of such as were already there, unless on giving security to the government. This bill met with much opposition, and several of its more obnoxious clauses were modified in the course of its progress.

About this period, Mr. Pitt brought forward his annual statement of finance. Scarcely had the war commenced, when a debt of six millions was incurred and funded,—the temporary taxes imposed for defraying the expence of the Spanish armament, being made permanent, as a provision for the interest of this new capital. Soon afterwards, Parliament adjourned for the Easter recess.*

On the 2d of April, M. Le Brun, minister of foreign affairs

* In the winter of 1792, General Dumouriez had proposed to the executive council to take possession of Maestricht, without which he alledged neither the passage of the Meuse, nor the territory of Liege could be defended; engaging, by manifesto, to restore it to the Dutch at the end of the war. As soon as war had been decided upon, General Dumouriez hastened to put into execution the plan he had formed, to advance with a body of troops posted at the Moerdyke, and masking Breda and Gertruydenburg on the right, and Bergen-op-zoom, Klundert, and Williamstadt, on the left, to effect a passage over an arm of the sea to Dordt, and thus penetrate at once into the heart of Holland. General Miranda had directions, leaving General Valence before Maestricht, to march with all expedition to Nimeguen, in order to oppose the expected invasion of the Prussians on that side. Dumouriez, assembling his army in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, entered the Dutch territory on the 17th of February, 1793. On the 24th, Breda surrendered, through the cowardice or treachery of its governor, Count Byland, almost on the first summons. The fort of Klundert was taken, after a brave defence, on the 26th. Nine days afterwards, Gertruydenburg followed the example of Breda; but Williamstadt made an obstinate resistance; and while the French troops were still engaged in the siege of this little fortress, intelligence arrived from the eastern frontier of the Netherlands, which materially changed the aspect of the war. On the 1st of March, General Clairfait having suddenly passed the Roer in the night, attacked the French posts on that side, and compelled them to retreat as far as Alderhaven, with the loss of 2000 men. Next day, the Archduke Charles, brother to the Emperor of Germany, carried several batteries, and took nine pieces of cannon. On the 3d, the Prince of Saxe Cobourg, who had highly distinguished himself in the war with the Turks, obtained a signal advantage over General Valence, and his army, driving them from Aix-la-Chapelle to the vicinity of Liege, with the loss of more than 5000 men, and twenty pieces of cannon. The siege of Maestricht was immediately raised; and, at midnight, on the 4th, General Miranda gave orders for retreating to Tongres, whence the French armies were again compelled to fall back to St. Tron, where Miranda was joined by General Valence, who had by this time evacuated Liege, and its territory; and on the 8th they moved towards Tirlemont. Dumouriez now arrived to take the command in person, leaving the conduct of affairs on the northern frontier, to General de Flers. The Prussians advanced by way of Bois-le-duc. A corps of 12,000 Hanoverians, reinforced by several thousand British troops, with the Duke of York at their head, arrived nearly at the same time in Holland; and the siege of Williamstadt was raised. Instead of proceeding to Dordt, De Flers was compelled to throw himself into Breda, the main body of the army retiring precipitately to Antwerp. On the 18th of March a general engagement took place on the plains of Neerwinden, which continued from morning till evening, when the French were totally routed, with considerable loss. The French continued retreating; and, on the 21st, General Dumouriez was posted near Louvain. Here a virtual suspension of hostilities took place, and the French army was allowed to march back to their own frontier without molestation, on condition of evacuating Brussels, and all the other towns of Brabant, &c. in their possession. On the 27th, General Dumouriez held a conference with an Austrian officer of distinction, Colonel Mack, to whom, he intimated his design of marching against Paris, with a view of re-establishing the constitutional monarchy of 1791: and it was agreed that the Imperialists should act merely as auxiliaries, in the accomplishment of this plan; not advancing, except in case of necessity, beyond the frontier of France: and that the troops to be eventually furnished by the Prince of Cobourg should act entirely under the direction of General Dumouriez. The designs of Dumouriez did not, however, pass unsuspected at Paris. Three commissioners from the executive power had therefore been dispatched to Flanders, under the pretence of conferring with the General concerning the affairs of Belgium. In this interview Dumouriez expressed himself with great violence against the jacobins "They would ruin France," said he; "but I will save it, though they should call me a Cæsar, a Cromwell, or a Monk." He styled the Convention, "a horde of ruffians;" and declared, "that this Assembly would not exist three weeks longer; that France must have a King:" adding, "that since the battle of Gemappe, he had wept over his success in so bad a cause." On the return of the commissioners to Paris, Dumouriez was summoned to appear at the bar of the Convention, and M. Bournonville was appointed to supersede him. Four new commissioners also were deputed to the army of the north, with powers to suspend and arrest all officers who should fall under their suspicion. On their arrival at Lisle, (March 28) the commissioners transmitted their orders to General Dumouriez, to appear before them, and answer the charges against him. The General, however, had fully arranged his plan; and he replied, "that, in the present exigent circumstances, he could not leave the army for a moment; that when he did enter Lisle, it would be in order to purge it of traitors; and that he valued his head too much to submit it to an arbitrary tribunal." The commissioners now resolved to proceed to the camp; but they soon found how dangerous was the attempt to seize the person of a General at the head of his army. On the 1st of April they arrived, in company with M. Bournonville, at St. Amand, the head quarters of General Dumouriez; and, being admitted to his presence, explained to him the object of their mission. After a long conference, the General finding them inflexible in their purpose, gave the signal for a body of soldiers who were in waiting, and ordered M. Bournonville and the four commissioners, in the number of whom was the noted M. Camus, immediately to be conveyed to General Clairfait's head-quarters at Tournay, as hostages for the safety of the royal family of France. Notwithstanding the popularity of Dumouriez, symptoms soon appeared in the army, of high dissatisfaction at this act of violence. On the morning of the 3d, Dumouriez repaired to the camp of Maulde, and addressed the troops, amidst the murmurs of many of the battalions. On the next day he departed with his suite for Conde, which fortress, with Valenciennes, he had engaged to put into the hands of the Austrians: but on the road he received intelligence, that it would not be safe for him to enter the place; and, in making his retreat, he fell in with a column of volunteer guards, who called to him to surrender: but, trusting to the swiftness of his horse, he made, with great difficulty, his escape to the quarters of General Mack, through a dreadful discharge of musquetry. His example was followed by General Lamorliere, the Duc de Chartres, son of the Duke of Orleans, and some hundreds of private soldiers. On the following day appeared a proclamation from General Dumouriez, containing a recapitulation of his services to the French republic, an animated picture of the outrages of the jacobins, and of the mischiefs to be apprehended from a continuation of anarchy in France; concluding with an exhortation to the French to restore the constitution of 1791, and a declaration on oath that he bore arms only for that purpose. This proclamation was accompanied by a manifesto on the part of the Prince of Cobourg, now commander-in-chief of the armies of Austria; announcing, "That the allied powers were no longer to be considered as principals, but merely as auxiliaries, in the war; that they had no other object than to co-operate with the General, in giving to France her constitutional King, and the constitution she formed for herself." By this time, however, Antwerp, Breda, and the other conquests of France on the Dutch frontier, were evacuated; and a considerable change had taken place in the aspect of affairs. On the 8th of April, a grand council was held at Antwerp, at which were present the Prince of Orange, accompanied by the grand pensionary Vander Spiegel, the Prince of Cobourg, Counts Metternich, Staremberg, &c. also the Prussian, Spanish, and Neapolitan ambassadors. The whole plan of operations was now changed. At the same time, a memorial was presented by Lord Auckland, (April the 5th) to the States General, in which his Lordship stated, in allusion to the capture of M. Camus, and the other conventional commissioners, "That the divine vengeance, for the atrocious crime which had been by their High Mightinesses with horror foreseen, seemed not to have been tardy. Some of these detestable regicides are now," said his Lordship, "in such a situation, that they can be subjected to the sword of the law; the rest are still in the midst of a people, whom they have plunged into an abyss of evils, and for whom famine, anarchy, and civil war, are about to prepare new calamities. In short, every thing that we see happen, induces us to consider as not far distant, the end of these wretches, whose madness and atrocities have filled with terror and indignation all those, who respect the principles of religion, morality, and humanity. The undersigned, therefore, submit, to the enlightened judgment, and wisdom, of your High Mightinesses, whether, it would not be proper to employ all the means in your power, to prohibit from entering your states in Europe, or your colonies, all those members of the pretended National Convention, or of the pretended executive council, who have directly or indirectly, participated in the said crime; and, if they should be discovered and arrested, to deliver them up to justice, that they may serve as a lesson and example to mankind."—To this memorial the Dutch government declined any reply.

General Dampierre, an officer distinguished by his conduct and valour, was now provisionally appointed to the chief command; and in a short time he was enabled to lead his troops with confidence into action. From the middle of April to the 8th of May, a variety of partial, though sharp and bloody, engagements took place between the two armies, in which no decisive advantage was gained. On that day General Dampierre advanced in person to dislodge a large body of the enemy posted near the wood of Vicoigne; but, exposing his person to the enemy's fire, his thigh was carried off by a cannon ball, and he died the following day, deeply regretted. In this action the English troops were engaged in the field for the first time in this war, and behaved with all their characteristic intrepidity: but by the inexperience of the Duke of York, their commander, being ordered to the attack of a strong post in the wood, where they were exposed to the fire of some masked batteries, they suffered so much, that it was not thought expedient to make any official return of the killed and wounded. The siege of Valenciennes being now in contemplation of the Prince of Cobourg, it was determined by the allies, to attempt an attack upon the fortified camp of Famars, which protected and covered that important fortress, Conde being already invested. At day-break, on the 23d of May, the British and Hanoverians under their royal commander, and the Austrians and German auxiliaries under affairs in France, addressed a letter to Lord Grenville, stating, "That the French republic was desirous to terminate all its differences with Great Britain, and to end a war dreadful to humanity, and requesting a passport for a person vested with full powers for that purpose to the court of London;" and, in a separate letter, he named M. Maret as the proposed plenipotentiary of France, should this intimation produce the desired effect. The present state of affairs, however, was not such as to permit the British government to accede to such an overture. On the contrary, a treaty was about this time concluded with the King of Sardinia, by which England bound herself, "To furnish to his Sardinian Majesty a subsidy of 200,000*l.* per annum, to be paid three months in advance," and also "not to conclude a peace with the enemy, without comprehending in it the entire restitution of all the dominions belonging to this monarch previously to the commencement of the war."

When Parliament met, after the recess, its attention was attracted by the unusual number and extent of the bankruptcies, which had taken place since the commencement of the war. A select committee was immediately appointed to report their opinion to the House, on the best means of applying a remedy to this evil. The report of the committee stated, "that it would be adviseable to issue Exchequer bills, to the amount of five millions, to commissioners nominated for the purpose, for the assistance and accommodation of such mercantile persons as might apply, and who should give proper security for the sums that might be advanced on interest, for a time to be limited." This relief proved extremely beneficial, and commerce soon returned to its accustomed channel, without the slightest national loss.

On the 25th of April, Mr. Sheridan called the attention of the House to the late memorial of Lord Auckland to the States General; which, in his view of the subject, implied that the war was carried on for the purpose of extermination. He accordingly moved, an address to his Majesty, expressive of the displeasure of the House at the memorial in question; and stating, that the minister who presented it had departed from the principles on which the House had concurred in the measures for the support of the war. Mr. Pitt defended Lord Auckland, and maintained the right of Britain to repel the unjust attacks of France—to chastise and punish her; and to obtain indemnification for the past, and security for the future. The motion of Mr. Sheridan was rejected by 211 against 36.—Lord Stanhope's motion, in the Peers, similar to Mr. Sheridan's, ended in an amendment, by Lord Grenville, pronouncing the memorial conformable to the sentiments of his Majesty, and consonant to those principles of justice and policy which it became the honour and dignity of the nation to express; which was carried without a division.

On the 2d of May, Mr. Grey brought forward his promised motion for a reform in the representation. The debate occupied two days; when the motion, for referring the numerous petitions which had been presented on the subject to a committee, was negatived, by 282 against 41.

In the course of the session, Mr. Dundas brought in a bill, which, soon after, passed into an act, to renew the charter of the East India Company for twenty years, upon terms which varied little from the former charter.* On the 21st of June the King prorogued the Parliament; on which occasion his Majesty noticed "The rapid and signal successes which had, in an early period of the campaign, attended the operations of the combined armies; the respectable and powerful force which he had been enabled to employ by sea and land; and the measures which he had concerted with other powers for the effectual prosecution of the war; all of which afforded the best prospect of a happy issue to the important contest in which we were engaged.†" under the Prince of Cobourg, and General Clairfait, made a joint assault upon the advanced posts of the French. The contest was severe; but the French were evidently worsted, and, in the course of the night, they abandoned their camp, retreating towards Bouchain and Cambray. This success enabled the allies to lay siege in form to Valenciennes. On the 1st of June General Custine arrived to take the command of the armies of the North and the Ardennes; but he deemed himself unequal to the task of rendering effectual relief to that fortress, before which the trenches were opened on the 14th of that month; and, towards the beginning of July, the besiegers were able to bring 200 pieces of heavy artillery to play upon it. Mines and counter-mines innumerable were formed also in the course of this siege, both by the assailants and the garrison; and many fierce subterranean conflicts were carried on with various success. On the night of the 25th of July, however, those under the glacis and horn-work of the fortress were sprung, on the part of the besiegers, with complete success, and the English and Austrians seized the favourable moment for attacking the covered way, of which they made themselves masters. On the next day, the place surrendered on honourable terms of capitulation, the Duke of York taking possession of it, in behalf of the Emperor of Germany. Nearly at the same time the garrison of Conde yielded themselves prisoners of war, after enduring all the rigours of famine; and Mentz submitted, not without a long and resolute resistance, to the arms of Prussia. On the 8th of August, the French were driven from the strong position they occupied behind the Scheldt, which was known by the name of Cæsar's Camp: after which a grand council of war was held, wherein it was determined that the British, Hanoverians, Dutch, and Hessians, should separate from the Austrians, and form a distinct army, not dependent upon the co-operation of the Austrians. This was strongly opposed by the Prince of Cobourg, and General Clairfait.

The

The British army, however, conducted by the Duke of York, immediately decamped; and, on the 18th of August, arrived in the vicinity of Menin, where some severe contests took place, and the post of Lincelles, lost by the Dutch, was recovered at the point of the bayonet, with a signal display of spirit and intrepidity, by the English, though very inferior in force, led on by General Sir John Lake. Moving, with little resistance, towards Dunkirk, the trenches were opened before that fortress on the 24th; and the Duke of York, having entertained a secret correspondence with the Governor-General, O'Moran, flattered himself with obtaining speedy possession of the place. On the other side, General Clairfait invested the town of Quesnoy; and the Prince of Cobourg, who commanded the covering army, having defeated a body of troops which had been sent for its relief, the place surrendered on the 11th of September. The Austrians then laid siege to Maubeuge; but the French, under General Jourdan, attacked them in their trenches, on the 15th of October, and after sustaining a great loss, forced them to raise the siege. Various incursions were afterwards made by the French into Maritime Flanders, but, unable to establish a footing there, they were compelled, once more, reluctantly, to retire within their own frontier. In the course of the year, Pondicherry, and all the French settlements in the east, were reduced by the British arms; and the island of Tobago, in the West Indies, besides some other possessions of less importance, were likewise wrested from their power.

* The trial of Mr. Hastings was resumed on the 15th of February, and during the session, the court sat twenty-two days, in which time the counsel for the prisoner completed the defence set up by them on the three last articles, viz. begums, presents, and contracts; after which Mr. Hastings addressed the court, praying, "That he might obtain from their Lordships this only grace; that they would order the trial, now past its legal process, to continue to its final conclusion during the present session." The farther proceedings, however, were adjourned till the ensuing session.

† On the 10th of January, the Parliament of Ireland was convened at Dublin by the Earl of Westmoreland, Lord Lieutenant of that kingdom. The English cabinet, conceiving that some measures of redress must now be adopted in relation to the Catholics, instructed Lord Westmoreland, in the course of his speech to the two Houses at the opening of the present session, thus to express himself:—"I have it in particular command from his Majesty to recommend it to you to apply yourselves to the consideration of such measures as may be the most likely to strengthen and cement a general union of sentiment among all classes and descriptions of his Majesty's Catholic subjects in support of the established constitution. With this view his Majesty trusts that the situation of his Majesty's Catholic subjects will engage your serious attention, and in the consideration of this subject he relies on the wisdom and liberality of his Parliament." Early in March the Bill of Relief was brought into the House of Commons by Mr. Secretary Hobart. Its chief enacting clause enabled the Catholics to exercise and enjoy all civil and military offices and places of trust or profit under the crown, under certain restrictions,—that it should not be construed to extend to enable any Roman Catholic to sit or vote in either House of Parliament, or to fill the office of Lord Lieutenant or Lord Chancellor, or Judge in either of the three courts of Record or Admiralty, or keeper of the privy-seal, secretary of state, lieutenant or custos rotulorum of counties, or privy-counsellor, or master in Chancery, or a general on the staff, or sheriff or sub-sheriff of any county, &c. The bill at length, passed with few dissentient voices into a law: and though it stopped short of full emancipation, it was supposed to be all that the executive government could, at this time, without too violent an exertion, effect; and upon this account it was received with gratitude and satisfaction. As a farther concession to Ireland, a Libel Bill passed, similar to that of Mr. Fox in England; the power of the crown to grant pensions on the Irish establishment was limited to the sum of 80,000*l.* and certain descriptions of placemen and pensioners were excluded from the privilege of sitting in the House of Commons. Also the King declared his acceptance of a limited sum fixed at 225,000*l.* for the expences of his civil list, in lieu of the hereditary revenues of the crown.

The English revolutionary societies were at this time extremely active, throughout the kingdom. In Edinburgh, the seditious had proceeded to reduce their principles to practice, and had actually, in October, holden that kind of convention which the President of the French Convention had anticipated in his answer to one of the English addresses. This meeting was attended by delegates from the London Corresponding Society, and from other societies of the same description in different parts of England and Ireland. The London Corresponding Society restricted its delegates to its original avowed object, the obtaining, by lawful means, universal suffrage and annual Parliaments; but it instructed them, at the same time, to enforce the duty of the people, to resist any act of the Legislature repugnant to the original principles of the constitution, as every attempt would be to prohibit associations for the purpose of reform. The Edinburgh convention adopted all the forms, names, and proceedings of the French Jacobin clubs, with such difference and omissions only as their peculiar circumstances rendered necessary. The members hailed each other by the republican denomination of citizen; they divided themselves into sections; appointed committees of organization, of instruction, of finance, of secrecy, and of emergency; called their meetings sittings; granted honours of sittings, and dated their proceedings in the first year of the British convention, one and indivisible. They, at first, assumed the distinctive appellation of the General Convention of the Friends of the People, but they afterwards took the name of the British Convention of the Delegates of the People, associated to obtain universal suffrage, and annual Parliaments. They adopted means for assembling the delegates, at any time, when it should be deemed necessary, in consequence of any measures of precaution or coercion which the government might adopt, for the societies to act, and they were fully prepared to carry their doctrine of resistance into effect. When they were thus emboldened, by their increased numbers, openly to avow their designs, the government thought it time to interrupt their proceedings. On the fifth and sixth of December, the magistrates of Edinburgh repaired to two of their places of meeting, where they seized the papers, and took the secretary, and some of the leading members into custody. Three of these were afterwards brought to trial, William Skirving, the secretary, and two of the delegates from the London Corresponding Society, Maurice Margarot, and Joseph Gerald, before the High Court of Justiciary in Scotland, and, being all found guilty, they were sentenced to be transported for fourteen years.*

We must now briefly advert to the affairs of France.—Whilst that country appeared in such imminent danger from enemies, she was also exposed to all the horrors of intestine war. To effect the complete subversion of the foreign republican government in France it was proposed, to excite, by a bold and simultaneous effort of the royalist party, who lay concealed in different parts of the country, but chiefly in the ancient provinces of Britanny and Poicton, now termed La Vendée, and La Loire. Notwithstanding the severe decrees of the convention, immense numbers of emigrants had secretly repaired thither in the winter of 1792, and the vicinity of these departments to the sea, afforded every facility for receiving supplies of men and military stores, as well as admitted of the co-operation of the naval powers. The first disturbances in these departments were considered, by the convention, as a mere momentary effervescence, from the dislike of the populace to the new mode which had been adopted for filling the ranks of the army; but before the latter end of March the insurgents had assumed a more formidable apearance, as to numbers, and their proceedings appeared to be the result of previous arrangement. They professed to act by the authority of Monsieur, the brother of the King, who had assumed the title of Regent: on the 23d of March, the convention was informed, that the insurgents had made themselves masters of the districts of Cholet, Montaigne, and Clisson, and had defeated General Marce, who had been sent to quell them. The city of Nantz was besieged by them, and the number of royalists encamped before that city, was estimated at not less than 40,000. In the beginning of April General Berruyere was appointed to command against the insurgents, but notwithstanding all the exertions which the French revolutionary government could make, the insurgents, before the end of April, possessed themselves of more than fifty leagues of the country, had defeated the republicans in two engagements, and taken a great number of prisoners, with an immense quantity of artillery and military stores.

Ever since the deposition of the King, two powerful parties, the Gironde, and the Mountain, had divided the convention. Brissot, Petion, Vergniaux, and their associates, almost all distinguished by their talents, formed the party of the Gironde. Republicans in principle, they had contributed to weaken the constitutional throne, but they had taken no active part in the conspiracy, by which it was overturned. The revolutionists of the 10th of August, Danton, Robespierre, Chabot, Barbaroux, Fabre d'Eglantine, Couthon, and Collot d'Herbois, assumed the name of the Mountain. These aspired to reap the fruits of their treason, and to govern the republic which they had founded on the ruins of the throne. In the month of March, that infamous court, the revolutionary tribunal, was established. The office of this tribunal was to take cognizance of all offences against the safety of the state: it was to be fixed at Paris. The Judges were to be chosen by the convention, and the Jury from the commune of Paris. From its decision there was no appeal; and on the 7th of April, a committee of Public Safety was instituted by the convention, invested with almost unlimited power, a power which was soon abused to the worst of purposes, and laid the foundation of a tyranny the most sanguinary and atrocious the world had ever witnessed. The defection of Dumouriez contributed in no small degree to the overthrow of the Gironde party, and the destruction of the members of the Bourbon family, remaining in the power of the republicans. On the 7th of April, it was decreed by the convention, that all the members of the Bourbon family should be detained as hostages for the safety of the arrested deputies, and that all the members of that family not already in the temple should be removed to Marseilles: the ci-devant Duke of Orleans, though a member of the convention, was included in this decree. A considerable part of the month of April was spent in discussing and digesting the declaration of rights which was to serve as a preface to the new constitution. On the 10th of May the convention took possession of their new hall in the Thuilleries, and on that day decreed the first article of the new constitution; viz. "the French republic is one and indivisible." In the mean time, the divisions which had so long subsisted between these two parties, approached rapidly to open and avowed hostility. The Mountain party had secured the attachment of the populace of Paris, and the jacobin club had become devoted to this faction. Even the virtues of the Girondists tended to accelerate their ruin: their humane attempt to save the life of the devoted Louis, was urged against them as an unpardonable crime, and as manifesting a culpable indifference to the cause of freedom. To these causes may be added the manifest incapacity they evinced in the conduct of public affairs; the neglect of the army, and their tardiness in presenting the nation with a constitution. On the 15th of April, a petition was presented to the communes of the 48 sections of Paris, at the bar of the convention, demanding, that twenty-two of the deputies of the Gi-

Alien and Traiterous Correspondence Bills, analogous to those of England, were also passed; as was a bill "To prevent the election or appointment of assemblies, purporting to represent the people, or any description or number of the people, under pretence of preparing or presenting petitions, &c. to the King, or either House of Parliament, for alteration of matters established by law, or redress of alledged grievances in church or state."

ronde party should be impeached. This party, however, continued to have a preponderance in the convention, and Marat, a furious and fanatic leader of the Mountain party, was accused by the convention, and committed to the abbey prison, but in a few days he was acquitted by a jury, and returned to the hall of the convention in triumph. An explosion at length took place. The Mountain party, alarmed at a proposal which had been made to remove the convention to Bourges, and surround it with a guard from the departments, aroused the populace of Paris to a state of insurrection. At four o'clock in the morning of the 31st of May, the tocsin was sounded, and the alarm gun was fired; the barriers were shut, and the commotion every-where visible throughout the capital, denoted an approaching crisis. Henriot, the commander of the national guard, a man entirely devoted to Robespierre, instead of taking the proper measures for the protection of the convention, was a party in the plot against it. Surrounded without by an outrageous multitude, and assailed within by a party of the Mountain, many of the representatives were alarmed for their own safety. At length, after the tumult had continued a considerable time, a deputation from the revolutionary committees appeared at the bar, and demanded the immediate suppression of the commission of twelve, which had been nominated on purpose to restrain anarchy; a revolutionary army of sans-culottes; a decree of accusation against twenty-two legislators; and a diminution in the price of bread. They also insisted that certain deputies should be dispatched to the south, on purpose to put a stop to the counter-revolution that prevailed there; and they at the same time suggested the arrest of Claviere, the minister of public contributions, and Le Brun, the minister for foreign affairs. The enmity, however, was chiefly directed against the principal members of the Gironde, whom they termed the accomplices of Dumouriez and the coalesced powers; they attributed to them the intention of dividing the nation into federate republics; and, with an incongruity of malice that would have appeared contemptible at any other period, they at the same time denounced them as having entered into a plot to place the Duke of Orleans on the throne. But notwithstanding the entreaties and even threats of factious committees, supported by the municipality, the administrators of the departments, the populace of the suburbs, the seditious vociferations of the spectators, and the tumultuous cries of the Mountain, the convention still refused to sacrifice the victims demanded by the conspirators. This, however, was the last effort; for two days afterwards, the legislature, finding itself besieged and imprisoned in its own hall, was at length intimidated into compliance, and not only decreed the arrest of all the obnoxious deputies (36 in number) but proscribed those who endeavoured to avoid death by flight. The vanquished party had wished for a republican form of government, founded on the immutable basis of virtue. The triumphant faction, on the contrary, conceding to popular opinions, still maintained all the forms of a commonwealth, but, under the veil of liberty, introduced the most terrible despotism; and although they immediately drew up a new and seductive constitution, they contrived to suspend all its benefits until the return of peace.

Several of the departments in the mean time took the alarm, and determined to avenge the outrages committed against their deputies. The city of Caen resolved not to acknowledge the convention, or receive any of its decrees, until the imprisoned members were restored to their functions. This body at the same time received notice, that no sooner had an account of their late proceedings reached Bourdeaux, than cries of indignation resounded from every quarter; and the president of the administration of Isle and Valaine transmitted a letter, in the name of the constituted authorities, to announce their resolution "to send an armed force to Paris, on purpose to rescue the legislature from the state of oppression in which it languished, under the dominion of a handful of anarchists." The departments of Calvadoes, the Rhone, and the Loire, also publicly avowed their determination to disown the convention; and the first of these actually imprisoned three of the jacobin deputies, who had been sent thither with a view of propagating their tenets, and supporting their cause. At this critical moment too, a complete counter-revolution took place at Lyons; Marseilles was threatened with commotions; Toulon exhibited manifest symptoms of disaffection; and the cause of the Mountain for a moment appeared desperate. Several of the proscribed deputies, having escaped from their confinement, now sought an asylum at Nantes, Rennes, Bourdeaux, Caen, and Evreux. Others, abandoning an assembly, in which cruelty and injustice preponderated, fled from Paris and joined them. Considered as the martyrs of liberty, they were every-where received with the most lively transports of joy, and a general insurrection of the provinces against the capital was immediately agreed upon. Many of the cities nominated commissioners for the purpose of concerting with the deputies from the districts, relative to the measures which the present critical state of affairs seemed to render necessary. Succours of men and of money were promised by all; and the archives of the capital of the Gironde, in which the most zealous of their partizans resided, are said to have contained decrees of adhesion and support on the part of no fewer than seventy-two departments. But this plan, alike destitute of uniformity and foresight, while it added to, and seemed to countenance, the ferocity of the jacobins, distracted and nearly proved fatal to the republic. After the passions of the people were permitted to subside, few could be prevailed upon to embark in so desperate a cause, and a civil war soon began to appear odious to all, and peculiarly impolitic at such a critical period.

Notwithstanding many of the departments declined to declare openly, yet commissioners from the Gironde, Isle, Vilaine, and Finisterre, assembled, and resolved to march to Paris with their fellow-citizens, to restore the proscribed members, ensure the liberty of the convention, and obtain the punishment of the guilty. No sooner did the indignant provinces begin to think of avenging the common cause, than a number of the accused deputies assembled for the purpose of directing their movements. Buzot and Gorsas, who had not been seized, and Barbaroux and Petion, who escaped from arrest, were already at Caen, and headed the insurrection of the west. Louvet, who had distinguished himself by the energy of his writings and his speeches, flying from Paris, rejoined his friends, and found that eight coalesced departments had already nominated their commissioners; that Wimpffen, the gallant defender of Thionville, had been chosen as their leader, while De Puisaye was appointed by him to act as Adjutant-General. Conscious that the success of their plan depended chiefly on the celerity of their motions, the Girondists wished the troops to begin their march immediately, and even proposed to advance to the capital, where they knew that their friends were both numerous and formidable, at the head of the Bretons and Normans alone. But the General insisted on organizing his army, and pointed out the advantages likely to ensue from a delay that would enable him to increase the number of their partisans, by the junction of the troops expected from the south, and thus render success inevitable. He accordingly contented himself with dispersing proclamations; and on being summoned to give an account of his conduct by the faction that had assumed the reins of government, he replied, that "he would disclose his motives and intentions at the head of sixty thousand men."

The proscribed deputies began to suspect that Wimpffen and De Puisaye were not only royalists, but secretly attached to the interests of a neighbouring nation, by means of which they wished to place one of the Bourbons on the throne of their ancestors. The former of these at last disclosed his mind freely, and proposed a junction with the army of La Vendée. On being pressed to advance directly to Paris without waiting for the arrival of the departmental forces, Wimpffen at length marched towards Vernon, at the head of a small body of troops. The jacobins, who had assembled some forces in that town, immediately sallied forth, and received them with a discharge of artillery. On this, the whole of the insurgents betook themselves to flight, except a single battalion of four hundred men from Finisterre: which, on seeing itself abandoned, retired in good order to Evreux, where the fugitives at length rallied. After this they were all re-conducted to Caen, which the General now proposed to fortify, that they might there wait for the quotas of troops promised by the neighbouring departments. But the exiled deputies, disgusted with his conduct, and seeing no prospect of success, refused their assent. The armed citizens, actuated by the same motives, marched towards their respective districts: Wimpffen and De Puisaye concealed themselves; the forlorn representatives betook themselves to flight; some perished by the guillotine; others by fatigue and famine; while the victorious party stained their triumph by a series of cruelty, injustice, and bloodshed.

Early in the month of July an insurrection broke out at Lyons. A congress of the department was convoked at that city, in which it was resolved to march a considerable force for the reduction of Paris: the Mountain party was declared to be outlawed; and the provisions destined for the armies were intercepted. The cities of Marseilles and Toulon followed the example of Lyons, and entered into that famous confederacy for dissolving the convention, which has since been distinguished by the name of Federalism. On the 12th of July, the Marseillois issued a manifesto to the French nation, in which they declared that the situation of Paris was equivalent to the declaration of war against the whole republic, and they urged the people to join their standard, and assist in reducing the faction, which had usurped the powers of the republic. On the 8th of July, the committee of public safety produced its report concerning the imprisoned deputies of the convention. It charged Brissot, Petion, and some others, with being the constant favourers of royalty. It alledged that they had conspired to place a new monarch on the throne, some of them in the person of Louis Capet, and others in that of the Duke of York. Petion was accused of having signed the order on the 10th of August, to fire on the people from the Thuilleries; and Roland was accused in general terms of persecuting the republicans. On these charges, the convention declared those who had fled from the decree of arrest, traitors to their country, and they were put out of the protection of the law. These outrageous proceedings on the part of the Mountain junto, necessarily produced a considerable re-action, which, in one memorable instance, was fatal to one of the most violent of these incendiaries. A female, of the name of Charlotte Corday, enthusiastically attached to the Gironde party, in the beginning of July proceeded from Caen, in Normandy, to devote her life to what she considered as the cause of liberty and her country. Her object was the death of Marat, which, without much difficulty, she effected, though at the expense of her own life.* The leaders of the faction, who thought every measure good that could be made subservient to their purpose, found this event too replete with favourable circumstances to be neglected.—Marat, whom they had thrown aside to die at leisure, was now restored to more than his ancient honours, was proclaimed a martyr, and his death ordered to be lamented as an irreparable loss to the republic. The conspirators declared that no farther doubt of the federalism of the departments remained. The death of Marat was the point of conviction.—Every member of the Mountain was to be assassinated in his turn, and the traitors of the departments had their accomplices in Paris, who had whetted their poniards to involve the city in destruction.

The formidable union which had taken place between the cities of Marseilles, Lyons, and Toulon, still subsisted, and threatened the speedy overthrow of the ruling tyranny.—This expectation proved fallacious. A considerable force was dispatched against those insurgents, under General Carteaux, in the latter end of July; and in the beginning of August, the Marseillois were driven from the department of Vaucluse, which they had previously occupied. On the 24th of August, the republicans attacked and took the town of Aix; and immediately upon this success, the Marseillois opened their gates and submitted. But the people of Toulon, and the French Vice-Admiral Trugoff, entered into a negociation with the English Admiral, Hood, who was then cruizing in the Mediterranean, for the delivery of the port and fleet into the hands of the English in trust for Louis the XVIIth. a negociation which after some difficulties was completed and carried into effect, and on the 23d of August, fifteen hundred men were landed from the English fleet, who immediately took possession of fort Malgue, by means of a detachment under Captain Elphinstone, as well as of the batteries at the mouth of the harbour. On this the French ships were warped into the inner road according to agreement, and the Spanish Admiral having joined next day, the combined squadrons anchored in the outer road; after which one thousand Spaniards were sent on shore to augment the English garrison; Rear-Admiral Goodall was declared governor, and Rear-Admiral Gravina command-

* Charlotte Anne Marie Corday was a native of St. Saturnin, in the department of the Orne. She appears to have lived in a state of literary retirement with her father, and by the study of ancient and modern historians to have imbibed a strong attachment to liberty. She had been accustomed to assimilate certain periods of ancient history with the events that were passing before her, and was probably excited by the examples of antiquity to the commission of a deed, which she believed would deliver and save her country. Being at Caen when the citizens of the department were enrolling themselves to march to the relief of the convention, the animation with which she saw them devoting their lives to their country, led her to execute, without delay, the project she had formed. Under pretence of going home, she came to Paris, and the third day after her arrival obtained admission to Marat. She had invented a story to deceive him; and when he promised her that all the promoters of the insurrection in the departments should be sent to the guillotine, she drew out a knife which she had purchased for the occasion, and plunged it into his breast. She was immediately apprehended, and conducted to the abbey prison, from which she was transferred to the Conciergerie, and brought before the revolutionary tribunal. This intrepid female acknowledged the deed, and justified it by asserting that it was a duty she owed her country to rid the world of a monster whose sanguinary doctrines were framed to involve the country in anarchy and civil war, and asserted her right to put Marat to death, as a convict already condemned by the public opinion.—She trusted that her example would inspire the people with that energy which had been at all times the distinguished characteristic of republicans; and which she defined to be that devotedness to our country which renders life of little comparitive estimation. Her deportment during the trial was modest and dignified. There was so engaging a softness in her countenance, that it was difficult to conceive how she could have armed herself with sufficient intrepidity to execute the deed. Her answers to the interrogatories of the court were full of point and energy. She sometimes surprised the audience by her wit, and excited their admiration by her eloquence. Her face sometimes beamed with sublimity, and was sometimes covered with smiles. At the close of her trial she took three letters from her bosom, presented them to the judges, and requested they might be forwarded to the persons to whom they were addressed. Two were written to Barbaroux, in which with great ease and spirit she related her adventures from her leaving Caen to the morning of her trial. The other was an affectionate and solemn adieu to her father. She retired while the jury deliberated on their verdict; and when she again entered the tribunal, there was a majestic solemnity in her demeanor which perfectly became her situation. She heard her sentence with attention and composure; and after conversing for a few minutes with her counsel, and a friend who had sat near her during the trial, and whom she requested to discharge some trifling debts she had incurred in the prison, she left the court with the same serenity, and prepared herself for the last scene. She had concluded her letter to her father with this verse of Corneille:

"C'est la crime qui fait la honte, et non pas l'échafaud."

It would be difficult to conceive the heroism which she displayed in the way to execution.—The women who were called furies of the guillotine, and who had assembled to insult her on leaving the prison, were awed into silence by her demeanor, while some of the spectators uncovered their heads before her, and others gave tokens of applause. There was such an air of chastened exultation thrown over her countenance, that she inspired sentiments of love rather than sensations of pity. She ascended the scaffold with undaunted firmness, and, knowing that she had only to die, was resolved to die with dignity. She had learned from her jailor the mode of punishment, but was not instructed in the detail; and when the executioner attempted to tie her feet to the plank, she resisted, from an apprehension that he had been ordered to insult her; but, on his explaining himself, she submitted with a smile. When he took off her handkerchief, the moment she bent under the fatal stroke, she blushed deeply; and her head, which was held up to the multitude the moment after, exhibited this last impression of offended modesty.

ant of the troops. The condition on which this valuable arsenal was put into the hands of a British admiral was, that it was only to be considered as a deposit to be preserved for the use of the French King, Louis XVII. the inhabitants of Toulon declaring their intention of rejecting the constitution recently completed by the convention, and of adhering to that decreed by the constituent assembly of 1789. It was further stipulated that when peace should be re-established in France, "The ships and forts which should be put into the hands of the English, should be restored to the French nation in the same state they were in when the inventory was delivered." The English immediately adopted the most efficient means for placing Toulon in a state of complete defence. Finding that the forts Faron, Balaguier, La Malgue, and L'Equillete, were overlooked, and commanded by the adjacent hills, these heights were crowned with redoubts, the cross-fire from which seemed to interdict all approach. A new fort was also constructed at Malbousquet; encampments were formed at St. Roch, at Equillete, and at Balaguier; the last of which was termed the grand camp by the English, and Little Gibraltar by the French. The redoubts were all defended by heavy artillery, taken from the lower decks of the French line of battle ships; a body of infantry from the Spanish army in the Rouissillon entered the place at this period, while two thousand of his Sicilian majesty's best troops, under the command of Brigadier-General Pignatelli, arrived on board a small squadron, and more were expected daily; a considerable detachment from the army of the King of Sardinia, consisting entirely of grenadiers and chasseurs, was also sent to the succour of the garrison at the same time.

The surrender of this important sea-port induced the national commissioners to press the siege of Lyons with redoubled vigour. After a most obstinate and gallant resistance that city was obliged to surrender, having sustained a siege of fifty-four days, and suffered almost as much from famine as the sword.

Collot d'Herbois, Couthon, Maignet, and Chateauneuf-Randon, having refused to grant any terms until the leaders of the insurrection had been delivered up, the chiefs, both civil and military, several of the principal inhabitants, and all those who considered themselves as proscribed by the jacobins, to the amount of about ten thousand, sallied forth from the city, to seek an asylum in a foreign land. A few waggons, containing the remnant of their scanty fortunes, and some four-pounders, followed this little army of fugitives, in the midst of which was to be seen a great number of females, determined not to abandon their husbands, and who, with their children in their arms, resolved to share their fate. Scarcely, however, had they entered the defiles of St. Cyr and St. Germain, when they found themselves surrounded by nearly fifty thousand men; and although they exhibited prodigies of valour upon this occasion, all resistance became vain. The greater part perished with arms in their hands; about five hundred men and women, chiefly covered with wounds, experienced a worse fate by falling alive into the hands of their enemies; for they were transferred from dungeon to dungeon, and ended their days by different kinds of punishment; about sixty only escaped, and found an asylum among the neighbouring peasants.

Nor was the fate of a great number of the inhabitants, who trusted to the mercy of the conquerors, more tolerable. One-fourth of the buildings had already been destroyed by the besiegers. The still more ferocious commissioners, not content with this, ordered the demolition of all the principal edifices; measures were actually taken to transport a large portion of the population to another place; and a decree enjoined that the miserable remnant of this ancient city, hitherto so famous throughout all Europe on account of its rich manufactures, was no longer to be recognized by its former name, but received that of Commune Affranchie. In addition to this, orders were given to erect a column with the following inscription, to perpetuate the resistance and disgrace of Lyons, as well as the vengeance of its enemies:—"Lyons made war upon the republic: Lyons is no more!"

The rage of the victors was not confined to the destruction of houses and temples. The deputy Freron, on entering the devoted town, ordered a number of guillotines to be erected, and announced "that terror was the order of the day." But he was surpassed in cruelty and ferocity by Collot d'Herbois. His proconsulship in the south was one continued series of bloodshed. A chosen band of Parisian jacobins, and a column of the revolutionary army, marched into Lyons, as the precursors of his fury. The process of the axe was deemed too slow for his insatiable vengeance; sometimes the bayonets of the infantry, and sometimes the sabres of the cavalry, were employed as more conformable to the celerity of his vengeance; but at length grape-shot and artillery were recurred to, and the principal square, the theatre of his sanguinary exploits, was strewed with the dying and the dead, and became deluged with the blood of his victims.

The siege of Toulon was carried on after the reduction of Lyons, with increased vigour. On the 14th of October, an action took place between the garrison, who had marched out to the defence of the redoubt of Malbousquet, and the army of General Cartaux, in which the English and their allies lost about forty men, and the French about thirty. No return was made of the Toulonese who fell in the action. In the beginning of November, General Cartaux was ordered to the command of the army in Italy, and General Dugommier was appointed commander-in-chief, and as the speedy capture of this great naval arsenal greatly depended on the judicious management of the immense artillery employed against it, great pains were taken by the commander to find an engineer of ability, and unfortunately for Europe and the world, he fixed on Napoleon Buonaparte, a native of Corsica, then a subaltern in the artillery, and who by his able conduct in the siege, laid the foundation of that military fame which afterwards enabled him to trample on the liberties of his country, and to give the law to continental Europe. About this period, General O'Hara arrived from Gibraltar at Toulon, having been appointed governor and commander-in-chief.

The new engineer, aware that the possession of Malbousquet, one of the principal outposts of Toulon, would enable him to bombard the town and arsenal, immediately opened a strong battery of heavy cannon and mortars on the heights of Arenes, which annoyed that position exceedingly, by means of an incessant fire of shot and shells. As it became necessary to take immediate and effectual measures for the security of so important a post, Governor O'Hara determined to destroy the new works, termed the convention-battery, and bring off the artillery. Having accordingly obtained a reinforcement of seamen from the fleet, to defend some redoubts whence he proposed to withdraw the soldiers, at five o'clock in the morning of the 30th of November, he sent a detachment consisting of four hundred British, three hundred Sardinians, six hundred Neapolitans, six hundred Spaniards, and four hundred French, under the command of Major-General David Dundas. Notwithstanding these different bodies were all obliged to cross a river on a single bridge, to divide afterwards into four columns, to march across olive grounds, and to ascend a very considerable height cut into vine terrasses, they were fortunate enough to surprise the redoubt. Not content with this success, by which they had fully effected all the objects of the expedition, the troops, flushed with victory, and trusting to their good fortune, rushed forward, and descended the hill after a flying enemy. This unlucky incident was not overlooked by the French generals, who immediately advanced with a considerable body of troops, attacked the assailants, now in disorder by the rapidity of their pursuit, and the unevenness of the country, and obliged them in their turn to retire with precipitation. The gallant Lieutenant-General O'Hara, on this occasion, received a wound in the arm, and being rendered faint by the loss of blood, was obliged to sit down under a wall, where he was taken prisoner; prisoner; several other officers also fell into the hands of the French. The events of this day, added to the capture of the brave officer, who had acted both in the capacity of governor, and military commander, contributed not a little to raise the expectations of the besiegers; they now began to make nearer approaches to the place, and, by means of their batteries, not only attacked the posts of Malbousquet, Le Brun, and Fort Mulgrave, on the heights of Balaguier, at the same time, but threatened a general assault. Nor were these events to be despised. The garrison at this period was reduced to the most alarming situation; and the enemy, whose force was constantly increasing, amounted to nearly forty thousand men, commanded by an able general, while the batteries were managed under the direction of one of the best engineers of his age. On the other hand, the allied troops, composed of five different nations and languages, never exceeded twelve thousand rank and file. With these, now greatly diminished by death and disease, a circumference of fifteen miles, for the defence of the town and harbour, was to be occupied and defended, by means of eight principal and several intermediate posts, which alone required nearly nine thousand men. The French being determined to push on the siege with increased vigour, relieved such of their troops as were fatigued, by fresh ones, and at two o'clock in the morning, opened two new batteries on Fort Mulgrave, and from these and the three former ones continued a very heavy cannonade and bombardment, which killed many of the troops, and destroyed the works. As the weather proved rainy, they afterwards found means to assemble a large body of forces secretly, with which they stormed the fortification, and entered with screwed bayonets by that side defended by the Spaniards. On this the British, and such of the other troops as had not been killed during the assault, were obliged to retire towards the shore of Balaguier. At day-break, another attack took place on all the posts occupied by the garrison on the mountain of Faron. They were repulsed however on the east side, by about seven hundred men commanded by Colonel Le Jermagnan, a Piedmontese officer, who perished upon this occasion; but they found means to penetrate by the back of the mountain, although eighteen hundred feet high, and deemed inaccessible, so as to occupy the side, which overlooks Toulon. In the course of this day's fight, all the English troops conducted themselves with great bravery; while the French, invigorated by zeal, and trusting to their numbers, charged with unusual intrepidity and success.

A council of flag and general officers now assembled; and as it was deemed impracticable to regain the posts that had been taken, and the town was not tenable while they remained in possession of the enemy, it was determined to evacuate Toulon. The troops were accordingly withdrawn, and in the course of that evening the combined fleet occupied a new station in the outer road. Early next morning, the sick, wounded, and British field artillery, were sent off; the Neapolitans, after abandoning the port of Micissey without orders, embarked at noon, and measures were taken to withdraw the British, Piedmontese, and Spaniards, amounting to about seven thousand men, during the night. As the enemy now commanded the town as well as some of the ships by their shot and shells, it became necessary that the retreat should take place as speedily as possible. Lord Hood accordingly gave orders for the boats of the fleet to assemble by eleven o'clock near Fort Malgue for that purpose. He had also settled a plan for destroying all the French men of war and the arsenal, but was prevented, by the sudden and unexpected evacuation that took place, from carrying his intentions fully into execution. Having entrusted that service to Sir Sydney Smith, the latter on entering the dock-yard found that the artificers had already substituted the three coloured cockade for the white one, while about six hundred galley slaves, who had broken their fetters, were jealous of his operations, and would have exhibited a determined resistance, had he not pointed the guns of two vessels, on purpose to keep them in awe. After this, he set fire to ten ships of the line and the arsenal, as well as to the mast-house, the great storehouse, and other buildings; but the calmness of the evening prevented much of the effect expected from the conflagration. In the mean time, the Spaniards, instead of scuttling and sinking, set fire to the powder ships, and they as well as the English were foiled in the attempt of cutting the boom, and destroying the men of war in the bason, in consequence of repeated volleys of musquetry from the flag-ship, and the wall of the royal battery. The Hero and Themistocles were however set on fire, and the party left for this purpose, after a most desperate service, effected their retreat; by day-light next morning all the British, Spanish, and Sicilian ships, crowded with the unfortunate inhabitants, were out of the reach of the enemy's vengeance. Rear-Admiral Trogroff, on board the Commerce de Marseilles, with the Puissant and Pompée, two other ships of the line, and the Pearl, Arethusa, and Topaze, frigates, with several corvettes, formed part of the English fleet, with which Lord Hood proceeded to Hieres bay, and soon after landed the men, women, and children, with which his decks were encumbered. Of thirty-one ships of the line which the English found at Toulon, thirteen were left behind, nine were burnt at Toulon, and one at Leghorn; and four Lord Hood had previously sent away to the French ports of Brest and Rochfort, with 5000 republican seamen, whom he was afraid to trust. Britain therefore obtained only three ships of the line and five frigates, which were all that the admiral was able to take off.

Thus, after a siege of about three months, and an incessant assault of five successive days and nights, Toulon was restored to France; the besieging army, which had provided four thousand ladders for an assault, having entered it at seven o'clock in the morning subsequent to the evacuation. Of the inhabitants who had borne arms against their country, or favoured the cause of the allies, some still remained, and these either put an end to their existence by a voluntary death, or perished by the guillotine or the musquet. Here, as well as at Marseilles and Lyons, the most cruel punishments were inflicted on the royalists; and the conquerors not only sullied their victory, but disgraced themselves, by a terrible and indiscriminate carnage; workmen were actually invited from all the neighbouring departments to destroy the principal houses; the population became visibly decreased by the daily butchery that took place; the name of Port de la Montagne, was substituted for that of Toulon, and a grand festival decreed in honour of the French army.*

The Mountain party were now become the sole rulers of France. This dreadful despotism was composed of * Buonaparte, who, in conformity with the republican fashion, had adopted a new prefix to his name, particularly distinguished himself at this period. By a deceitful proclamation, all the inhabitants who had employment under the English, during their occupation of Toulon, who had served or lodged any Englishman, or who had been suspected to have favoured their entry and the capitulation of that city, either directly or indirectly, were ordered, under pain of death, to meet in the grand square, called Le Champ de Mars, on a fixed day and hour. Upwards of fifteen hundred men, women, and children assembled there in consequence of this proclamation. Buonaparte then desired all those who wished to escape punishment and death, to cry out 'Vive la Republique.' With one voice the unfortunate persons called out "the Republic for ever!" This was the signal for their destruction. Cannons loaded with grape-shot killed some and maimed and wounded others, who were dispatched with swords and bayonets. The official report of this ferocious performance is contained in the following letter from Buonaparte, addressed to Barras, Freron, and Robespierre the younger, representatives of the people, dated Toulon, the 29th Fremaire, year 2, (December 24th, 1793).

Toulon, December 1793.

"Citizens Representatives. Upon the field of glory, my feet inundated with the blood of traitors, I announce to you, with a heart beating with joy, that your orders are executed, and France revenged. Neither sex nor age has been spared; those who escaped, or were only mutilated by the discharge of our republican cannon, were dispatched by the swords of liberty and the bayonets of equality.

"Health and admiration, two councils, one of which was denominated the "committee of public safety," the other the "committee of general safety." The members ought to have been renewed every month; but the convention, intimidated by an armed mob, had entrusted these committees with the fatal power of imprisoning and judging its members: any deputy therefore who should have been hardy enough to propose any change in these committees would have been denounced as a traitor, and sent to the revolutionary tribunal, which was the antichamber of death, and the very threshold of the grave.

The reigning party now proceeded to atrocities of which no former despotism afforded an example. Its object appeared to be the extermination of all that was great and valuable in society. It attempted to reduce the community to one level, to degrade, that it might the more severely tyrannize over its victims. Even moderation itself became a crime, to be expiated only by death, and virtue received the reward due to atrocious crimes. If the father afforded any support to his exiled son; if the daughter wrote to her mother from her dungeon, the revolutionary tribunal doomed them to the scaffold. The external profession of the Christian religion was abolished by public decree, and an attempt was made to substitute for Christianity, a sort of metaphysical Paganism. The reason, which they had so grossly abused, and the liberty, which they had so dreadfully outraged, were exalted as ideal deities for the maddened populace to worship. Those ecclesiastics, who had seats in the convention, publicly abjured their creed, and were not ashamed to declare, that they had hitherto deceived the world. The archbishop and clergy of Paris renounced the Christian religion, declaring that they owned no temple but the sanctuary of the laws; no God but liberty, no gospel but the constitution. The revolutionary tribunal condemned without distinction, and without inquiry, all the victims whom the tyrants marked out for destruction. Proscriptions daily increased, and France was filled with accusers, prisons, and executioners. The number of persons who perished during this "reign of terror," cannot be ascertained by any authentic documents; but the prisons were filled and emptied with a horrid rapidity, and the scaffolds flowed daily with blood. The victim first in rank, if not in time, was the ill-fated consort of Louis XVI. Queen Marie Antoinette; her trial had been immediately preceded by that of General Custine, who was charged with maintaining a secret correspondence with the enemy, and with leaving the garrison of Mentz unprovided with necessaries; with having disobeyed the orders of the convention, and with not having exerted himself to prevent Valenciennes from falling into the hands of the allies. On these charges he was found guilty, and received sentence of death, which was carried into effect within twenty-four hours. Having brought their Queen to the scaffold,* they pursued their bloody work, and on the 24th of October, the accused deputies of the Gironde party were brought before the revolutionary tribunal, and after a trial in which both the principles and the forms of law were equally violated, were declared guilty of a conspiracy against the unity and indivisibility of the republic, and condemned to the guillotine. One of the deputies, Valazé, after hearing his sentence, stabbed himself at the bar of the tribunal. On the 30th of October, twenty-one of these deputies, viz. Brissot, Vergniaud, Gensonne, Duprat, Lehardi, Ducos, Fonfrede, Boileau, Gardien, Duchalet, Sillery, Fauchet, Dufriche, Duperel, La Source, Carra, Beauvais, Mainville, Antiboul, Vigée, and Lacaze, were conveyed to the Place de la Revolution, and executed. Among these names, were several of those who were most active in dethroning the King, and establishing a republic. Valazé, who stabbed himself at the bar of the tribunal, was the member who prepared the charges against the unfortunate Louis. Manuel, who had been so active in the dethroning of the King, on the 10th of August, and afterwards evinced so much solicitude to preserve his life, was soon after brought to trial, and executed.—The trial of General Houchard immediately succeeded that of Manuel; he was accused of not cutting off the retreat of the British forces from West Flanders. With the revolutionary tribunal, accusation was synonimous with condemnation, and he also suffered by the guillotine. The veteran General Lucner, Bailly, the first mayor of Paris after the revolution, the accomplished Barnave, and Rabaut St. Etienne, also perished.

The condemnation of the Duke of Orleans, who had assumed the fantastical name of Philip E'galité, appears to have produced no sensations either of horror, or of commiseration, in any party; so completely does a profligate life extinguish the respect, and excite the indignation of mankind. This wretched and unworthy member of the Bourbon family was executed on the evening of the 6th of November, and bore, with a magnanimity which would have done honour to a better character, the insults and reproaches of the populace. The celebrated Madame Roland was brought to the scaffold two days after the execution of the Duke of Orleans. Her attachment to the party of the Gironde was the only crime alledged against her.†

* This ill-fated victim of the revolution was removed on the night of the 1st of August from the Temple, to a small and miserable apartment in the Conciergerie, where she remained until she was brought before the revolutionary tribunal. In this gloomy dungeon, a gend'arme watched her night and day, and she was sheltered only by a screen from the eye of the goaler, when she undressed herself to pass the night on a decayed flock bed. On the 3d of October, Billaud-Varennes sent orders to the revolutionary tribunal to take charge of the trial of the queen; about ten days after, Fouquier Tiville desired her to prepare for her trial; and on the 15th she appeared before the tribunal, to take her trial, or to speak more correctly, to hear her doom pronounced. The act of accusation consisted of several charges, the substance of which was—that she had contributed to the derangement of the national finances, by remitting from time to time considerable sums to her brother, the Emperor Joseph—that since the revolution, she had continued to hold a criminal correspondence with foreign powers—that in every instance she had directed her views to a counter-revolution, particularly in exciting the body guards, and others of the military, at Versailles, on the 1st of October, 1789—that, in concert with Louis Capet, she had distributed counter-revolutionary papers and writings—that in the beginning of October, 1789, by the agency of certain monopolists, she had created an artificial famine—that she was a principal agent and promoter of the flight of the royal family, in June, 1791—that she instituted private councils in the palace, at which the massacres, as they were termed, in the Champ de Mars, at Nancy, &c. were planned—that in consequence of these councils, she had persuaded her husband to interpose his veto against the decrees concerning the emigrants and the refractory priests—that she influenced him to form a body guard, composed of disaffected persons, and induced him to give employments to the refractory priests. One of the most singular charges was, that in conjunction with the Gironde faction, she induced the King and the assembly to declare war against Austria, contrary to every principle of sound policy, and the public welfare. The act proceeds to state, that she communicated to the enemy plans of the campaign, and other intelligence—that the affair of the 10th of August was the consequence of a horrible conspiracy against the nation formed by her intrigues—that she was also a principal agent in the internal war with which France had been distressed—The last charge was the most infamous, and the most incredible, viz. that, like Agrippina, she had held an incestuous commerce with her own son. The unfortunate Marie Antoinette heard the accusation with calmness, and the facts alledged against her by the several witnesses, particularly Lecourtre de Versailles and Hebert, who accused her of having lavished incestuous caresses on her son. As she continued silent, the president called upon her for a reply; with great dignity she answered, "I held my peace because nature forbids a mother to reply to such a charge: but since I am compelled to it, I appeal to all the mothers who hear me, whether it be possible."

After consulting for about an hour, the jury found her guilty of the charges. With an unchanged countenance, she heard the sentence of death pronounced, and left the hall without uttering a single word, without addressing herself either to her judges or the audience. On the 16th of October, at about 11 o'clock, she was taken to execution in the same manner as the other victims of this dreadful tribunal, on a cart, with her hands bound, accompanied by a constitutional priest in a lay habit, and escorted by numerous detachments of military. She had on an undress of white quilting. When the procession reached the Place de la Revolution, the spot where the unfortunate Louis had so recently suffered, her eyes were directed towards the Thuilleries, and for a moment she appeared strongly agitated, but she soon regained her composure, and ascended the scaffold with a firm and unhesitating step, and her behaviour at the awful moment of dissolution was decent and composed. The executioner, seizing the head by the hair, exhibited it to the multitude, exclaiming, "Long live the republic," and the cry was echoed by the furies who surrounded the scaffold. Thus perished, by the hands of the executioner, Marie Antoinette, the sister of an emperor, and the wife of a King!

† This celebrated female suffered death with a heroism which extorted the admiration even of her ferocious and unmanly enemies.

The convention at this time decreed a new calendar, which was afterwards abolished by Buonaparte. The year was divided into twelve months, of thirty days each, with five intercalary days, which were dedicated to national festivities. Each month was divided into decades, and the day of rest was appointed for every tenth day, instead of every seventh.

In consequence of a report from the committee of public safety, all Frenchmen were now declared, by a solemn decree of the convention, to be at the service of their country, until its enemies should be chased from the territories of the republic. "The young men shall march to the combat; (said this decree), the married ones shall forge arms and transport the provisions; the women shall fabricate tents and clothes, and attend the military hospitals; the children shall make lint to serve as dressings for the wounds of the patriots; while the old men shall cause themselves to be carried to the public squares to excite the courage of the warriors, to preach the unity of the republic, and inspire hatred against Kings." To supply the wants of the immense armies now about to be collected from all quarters, measures of a new and extraordinary kind were adopted. Assignats were not only fabricated and expended in immense quantities, but their value was maintained for some time at a rate nearly equivalent to that of gold; and when this resource began to fail, revolutionary taxes were imposed. The system of requisition was at length recurred to, and all the necessaries of life appertaining to citizens in easy circumstances, were seized upon in the name of the republic, and for the support of its troops, while the great cities were crowded with manufactures of salt-petre, the towns were converted into founderies, and the ancient palaces metamorphosed into arsenals to supply the elements of destruction. At the very moment that the idea of a nation's rising en masse was ridiculed throughout Europe, the convention, on the proposition of the committee of public safety, had either augmented or created eleven distinct armies, which seemed to form a chain round the frontiers of France. All the unmarried males, from eighteen to forty years of age, were put in permanent requisition, and a draught of three hundred thousand made at one time. These immense resources enabled them to strengthen and new model the army of the north, extending from Dunkirk to Maubege; that of the Ardennes, reaching from Maubege to Longwy; that of the Moselle, from Longwy to Bitche: that of the Rhine, from Bitche to Porentrui; that of the Alps, from the Aisne to the borders of the Var; that of Italy, from the Maritime Alps to the mouth of the Rhone; the army of the Oriental Pyrenees, from the mouth of the Rhone to the Garonne; the army of the Western Pyrenees, from the department of the Upper Pyrenees to the mouth of the Gironde; the army of the coasts of Rochelle, from the mouth of the Gironde to that of the Loire; the army of the coasts of Brest, from the mouth of the Loire to St. Maloes; and lastly, that of the coasts of Cherbourg, from St. Maloes to the northern department.

A. D. 1794.] Parliament assembled on the 21st of January; and never did it meet at a more interesting period; at a time when more subjects of great importance pressed upon its attention. The King, in his opening speech, observed, that he and his subjects were engaged in a momentous contest, on the issue of which depended the maintenance of the constitution, laws, and religion of the country, and the security of all civil society. Having mentioned the advantages obtained by the arms of the confederate powers, he added, that the circumstances by which their farther progress had been impeded, not only proved the necessity of vigour and perseverance, but confirmed the expectation of ultimate success. Their enemies, his Majesty observed, had derived the means of temporary exertion from a system which had enabled them to dispose arbitrarily of the lives and property of a numerous people; but these efforts, productive as they had been of internal discontent and confusion, tended rapidly to exhaust the national and real strength of the country. He regretted the necessity of continuing the war; but he thought he should ill consult the essential interests of his people, if he desired peace on any grounds exclusive of a due provision for their permanent safety, and for the independence and security of Europe. Referring to the "true grounds of the war," he begged Parliament to recollect, that an attack had been made on him and his allies, founded on principles tending to the destruction of all property, to the subversion of the laws and religion of every civilized nation, and to the general introduction of a horrible system of rapine, anarchy, and impiety. The address was warmly supported by Lord Auckland. The Earl of Guildford wished for a speedy negociation, as we had rushed into the war without necessity; and he proposed an amendment for that purpose. The Duke of Portland justified the war as strictly defensive, and as necessary for the preservation of the Christian religion, political and civil liberty, law and order. Earl Spencer, and the Earl of Coventry, pursued the same line of argument. The Duke of Norfolk asserted, that he had as strong a zeal for the support of our constitution as any Peer of the realm, but he was not impelled by that zeal to an encouragement of the war, as he did not conceive that our happy establishments were endangered by the proceedings of the French. Lord Grenville endeavoured to show, from the convulsed state of that country, the fallacy of all hopes of a successful negociation. On a division, the address was carried, by 97 against 12. In the Commons, the address was moved by Lord Clifden, and supported in a very luminous speech by Lord Mornington, who was followed by Mr. Windham, Mr. Dundas, and Mr. Pitt. It was carried by 277 against 59.

On the 29th of January, Lord Arden brought forward a motion for a supply of 85,000 seamen, including 12,115 marines, for the service of the present year, and on the 3d of the following month, he further moved that the land forces should consist of 60,244 men, including 3382 invalids, both of which motions were carried.

On the 17th of February, the Marquis of Lansdowne moved an address, "to represent to his Majesty the extreme improbability of conquering France; that the dismemberment of France, if attainable, would augment the strength of the powers most to be dreaded; that opinions cannot be controlled by arms; that experience has demonstrated the futility of every attempt to interfere in the internal government of France, even if the justice were problematical; and that we must incur the keenest reproaches, if we encouraged farther revolts in a country where we had been unable to save those who put confidence in us from extermination and ruin—therefore to implore his Majesty to declare, without delay, his disposition to make peace upon such just, disinterested, and liberal terms, as were calculated to render the peace lasting; and that he would signify this intention to his allies, that a stop might be put to the effusion of human blood." The Duke of Grafton seconded the motion; but it was strenuously opposed by Lord Grenville, and ultimately negatived, by 103 against 13.

A royal message, essentially connected with the interests of this country, was some time afterwards delivered. It referred to the seditious practices of demo-

On her way to the scaffold she was not only composed, but occasionally assumed an air of gaiety, in order to encourage a person who was condemned to die at the same time, but who was not armed with the same fortitude. To be the first victim on these melancholy occasions was considered as a privilege, and had been allowed to Madame Roland as a female, but when she observed the dismay of her companion, she said to him, "Go first, let me at least spare you the pain of seeing my blood shed." She then turned to the executioner, and begged that this sad indulgence might be granted to her fellow sufferer. The executioner told her that he had received orders that she should perish first; "But you cannot, I am sure," said she with a smile, "refuse the last request of a lady." The officer of death complied with her demand. When she mounted the scaffold, and was tied to the fatal plank, she lifted up her eyes to the statute of liberty, near which the guillotine was placed, and exclaimed, "Ah liberty, how thou hast been sported with!" Her husband, the late minister of the interior, was shortly after found lifeless in a wood, near the high-road between Paris and Rouen; unable to bear the sad reflections which crowded upon him, he had put a period to his existence.

cratic societies, and intimated the necessity of taking measures for baffling their dangerous designs. The papers belonging to these clubs were examined by a committee; and in a report subsequently presented by Mr. Pitt, it was affirmed, as the result of the inquiry, that the 'Society for Constitutional Information,' and the 'London Corresponding Society,' under the pretence of reform, aimed at the subversion of the government; that other associations, in different parts of the kingdom, pursued the same object; that they had endeavoured to promote a general convention of the people; that they had provided arms for the more effectual prosecution of their nefarious purposes; that meetings of popular delegates took place at Edinburgh, in 1792, and the following year; that their proceedings were regulated on the French model; and that, after the dispersion of this convention, the two leading societies exerted their efforts to procure a similar meeting in England, which should supersede the authority of Parliament. The minister, in consequence, proposed that the habeas corpus act should be suspended in cases of treason and sedition. Mr. Fox was of opinion, that this stretch of power was not justified by the evidence which had been adduced against the associations; and Mr. Sheridan deprecated, as unconstitutional and dangerous, the grant of an arbitrary power of imprisonment. Mr. Burke, however, felt convinced that the power in question would not be abused, and that it would be attended with salutary effects; and Mr. Windham advised the strongest measures of coercion. The bill of suspension was rapidly enacted; and after spirited debates, an address was voted, promising the strenuous co-operation of the two Houses with the executive power for the suppression of all seditious attempts, treasonable conspiracies, &c.

The state trials, pending at this crisis, heightened the alarm which universally prevailed. At the Lancaster spring assizes, this year, Mr. Thomas Walker, of Manchester, a strenuous advocate for Parliamentary reform, at whose house meetings for political purposes were occasionally held, was indicted for conspiring with nine other persons to overturn the constitution by force of arms, and to assist the French in case of invasion. To establish this charge, involving in its consequences, not only the character, but the life of the accused, the principal evidence adduced, was a person of the name of Dunn, whose testimony was so contradictory and absurd, that the prosecution was abandoned, by the counsel for the crown; and Mr. Walker was honourably acquitted, without being put upon his defence, while his accuser was committed to prison, to take his trial for perjury.

In the month of September, the trial of two persons at Edinburgh, who had been committed on a charge of high treason, took place under a special commission. On the 3d of that month, Robert Watt, a government spy, was tried and convicted of high treason. It appeared, that he had formed a romantic project for seizing by force, upon the castle of Edinburgh, as well as upon the persons of the principal judicial and municipal officers of that city, together with the bank and the excise-office. This intention he had communicated to several persons, who all refused to come into his plans, except David Downie, an illiterate mechanic. That Watt had conspired to levy war against the King, there could be no doubt, but as he had not actually levied it, it was contended that his offence did not come within the legal construction of the statute of Edward III. The prisoner, in his defence, asserted, and produced letters in court from Mr. Secretary Dundas, in support of that assertion, that he had been retained as a spy in the service of government, and had received money from them, for his services. The prisoner's counsel, therefore, contended, that what their client had done was with no other view than to arrive more completely at the knowledge of the secrets of those persons whose conduct he was to observe, and by appearing zealous in the same cause to cover his real intentions, of betraying these counsels, and bringing to punishment the enemies of their sovereign. The jury, however, pronounced the prisoner guilty, the judge passed the sentence of death upon him, and he was consequently executed. Downie was also convicted; but the jury recommended him to mercy, which he had the good fortune to obtain.

A dreadful rumour was at this time suddenly raised, of a design to assassinate the King. The persons implicated were Le Maitre, an apprentice to a watch-maker, in Denmark-street; William Higgins, apprentice to a chemist, in Fleet-street; and a man of the name of Smith, who kept a book stall in the vicinity of Lincoln's Inn. Their accuser was a young man of the name of Upton, an apprentice to a watch-maker. The conspirators were apprehended by a warrant from the Duke of Portland, on the 27th of September, and underwent several examinations before the privy council. The charge, resting on the evidence of Upton, was to the following effect. "An instrument was to have been constructed by the informer, Upton, in the form of a walking-stick, in which was to have been inserted a brass tube, of two feet long; through this tube a poisoned dart or arrow was to have been blown by the breath of the conspirator, Le Maitre, at his Majesty, either on the Terrace at Windsor, or in the play house. The poison prepared was to have been of so subtile a nature, that if the point but glanced upon the King, it was to have produced instantaneous death." This story for some time obtained credit, and the persons accused were committed for trial; but after a long and severe imprisonment, the evidence against them was found so inconsistent, absurd, and incredible, that the affair fell into contempt, under the popular designation of the "pop-gun-plot," and the men were liberated, without trial.

More important proceedings were now about to take place in the Sessions House, at Clerkenwell, on which the attention of the whole country was rivetted with intense anxiety. On the 25th of October, Thomas Hardy, a shoe-maker, in Piccadilly, who had acted as secretary to the London Corresponding Society; Daniel Adams, the secretary to the Society for Constitutional Information; John Horne Tooke, the philologist; the Rev. Jeremiah Joyce, preceptor to Lord Mahon; John Thelwall, the political lecturer; Thomas Holcroft, the dramatist; J. A. Bonney; Steward Kyd; John Richter; and John Baxter, were all arraigned at the Old Bailey, before the president of the Special Commission, Lord Chief Justice Eyre.

The indictment was of an uncommon length, and contained no less than nine overt acts of high treason, all resolving themselves into the general charge, that these persons did conspire to summon delegates to a national convention, with a view to subvert the government, to levy war against the existing authorities of the country, and to depose the King. The court, at the request of the prisoners, determined that they should be tried separately, and Mr. Hardy was the first of the number put upon his trial. The opening speech of Sir John Scott, the Attorney-General, occupied nine hours in the delivery, and consisted chiefly of a recapitulation of the facts set forth in the reports of the secret committee of the House of Commons. The written evidence consisted principally of advertisements, addresses, &c. published in the news papers, and of several private letters, which had been seized among the papers of the prisoners. Many of these papers were written in an intemperate and even inflammatory style, with respect to ministers and other persons in authority, but none of them could by fairness of construction be construed into high treason. On the parole evidence, the Attorney-General drew a very candid, and necessary distinction. —"Some of the witnesses (he observed) were above all exception; and some were persons employed by the government to watch over the proceedings of these societies." The grand object at which these associations ostensibly aimed, was a reform in Parliament, upon the principles of the Duke of Richmond—universal suffrage and annual elections; and as these societies contained a large portion of converts to the doctrines of Paine, many of the members, in the height of their enthusiasm, contemplated the establishment of a democratic government.

An attempt was made, on the part of the crown-lawyers, to show that the associations in question had armed themselves against the government; but in this they did not succeed. The defence of Mr. Hardy, by Mr. Erskine, was considered as a model of forensic eloquence. After a number of witnesses had been called by the prisoner's counsel, principally for the purpose of proving that the prisoner was of irreproachable character, and that he was a peaceable and inoffensive man; the defence was concluded very ably by Mr. Gibbs. The trial was protracted to the length of seven days, and the evidence being closed, the jury after a short deliberation returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

Eleven days afterwards, Mr. John Horne Tooke, formerly and for many years a clergyman of the Established Church, a man possessed of extraordinary intellectual talents, but of a peculiar kind, and mixed with a considerable alloy of eccentricity, was brought to the bar. On the trial it appeared, to the general surprise of the court, that Mr. Tooke had been a remarkably guarded and temperate advocate of reform—that he very rarely attended the meetings of the societies—and had even incurred their suspicion and dislike on that account. He had frequently declared his attachment to the House of Peers, as an useful and necessary branch of the constitution; and had uniformly reprobated the Duke of Richmond's plan of reform; in proof of which it appeared, that in a conversation with Major Cartwright on the subject of reform, he made use of the following familiar, but expressive illustration: "You would go to Windsor, but I should chuse to stop at Hounslow." Some difficulty having arisen in the course of the trial concerning the identity of the prisoner's hand writing, Mr. Tooke offered himself to identify it whenever it appeared, adding:—"I protest I never have done an act—I protest I have never had a sentiment—I protest I have never had a thought of any political nature, which taken fairly, I have the smallest degree of disposition not now to admit. I am anxious that my life and character should go together, and I wish to admit all that I have said, done, or written." In the course of Mr. Tooke's trial, Mr. Pitt was examined on the part of the prisoner, in order to prove that the meeting at the Thatched House Tavern, in 1782, of which he was a member, had the same objects in view as the seditious societies of the present time. His evidence, however, totally failed to establish this laboured point. Mr. Pitt recollected that Mr. Tooke had been present at one of those meetings, the sense of which was to use means to recommend a petition to Parliament, in order to procure a reform, but there was no such idea as a convention of the people, or affiliated societies; and he did not consider that as a meeting of persons authorized to act for any but themselves. The evidence having been closed, on the 22d of November, the jury retired, and in a few minutes returned a verdict of Not Guilty. An involuntary burst of acclamation instantly filled the court, and was re-echoed by the populace without, who, as on the former occasion, escorted the counsel, Messrs. Erskine and Gibbs, to their chambers. The prosecution of the members of the Constitutional Society ended with the trial of Mr. Tooke; and on Monday, the 1st of December, a jury being empannelled pro forma, Messrs. Bonney, Joyce, Kyd, and Holcroft, were acquitted and discharged. The trial of Mr. Thelwall commenced on the same day, and terminated in the same manner as the other state trials. No new evidence was adduced against him, except some intemperate expressions, which he was said to have used at a meeting at Chalk Farm, and in his lecture room, but the evidence of these expressions resting on the authority of Lynam and Taylor, reputed spies, whose testimony was rendered nugatory by that of two other witnesses, he was acquitted. All the other prosecutions were then abandoned by the crown lawyers, and those who had been indicted were liberated from confinement.

That the jury acted most conscientiously in acquitting the prisoners of the charge of high treason there can be no doubt; but the result of the investigation, by the Grand Jury, who found true bills against the prisoners, was a sufficient justification of the prosecutions. Whoever is acquainted with the nature of the evidence required to convict a British subject of so heinous a crime, will be slow to draw the hasty inference that the prisoners were all perfectly innocent. It is impossible to read the printed account of the trials without being impressed with a conviction of the existence of a treasonable conspiracy, which had for its object the utter subversion of the constitution and government. The Jury, indeed, were fully satisfied of the existence of such a conspiracy; and had the parties been tried for a misdemeanour, there cannot be a doubt that they would have been convicted. There is reason to believe, that there existed a difference of opinion amongst the friends of ministers, if not amongst the ministers themselves, as to the nature of the charge, on which they should be tried. Their acquittal raised the spirits of the disaffected, who openly triumphed in the victory which they had obtained, not perceiving that this victory was the highest eulogy that could be pronounced on the British laws; and when the proceedings against persons charged with political crimes in France, were compared with these trials, the comparison could not fail to excite, in the breast of every honest Briton, the proudest feelings of exultation.

The trials which had taken place in Scotland, particularly those of Mr. Muir, and the Reverend Fysche Palmer, the former a Scotch barister, and the latter a Unitarian preacher at Dundee, who had been convicted of sedition in the autumn of 1793, and sentenced to transportation, excited considerable alarm among their friends and associates in England, and attracted the attention even of some members of the British senate, who professsed to condemn their conduct while they deplored their fate. Mr. Adam, a barrister of some eminence, had given notice early in the session, of his intention to move for permission to bring in a bill for subjecting the sentences of the Scotch judges, in criminal cases, to an appeal to the British House of Lords. He accordingly brought forward his motion, on the 4th of February; but it was negatived, by 126 against 31.—It was next treated as a matter of doubt, whether the Court of Justiciary had not exceeded the limits of their power in substituting the punishment of transportation for that of banishment, imposed by the act of Queen Anne, for the offence charged upon the above-named persons, whose characters in private life, however mistaken in their public opinions and conduct, were admitted to be in the highest degree respectable. Mr. Adam therefore moved (March 10th), for a copy of the record to be laid before the House, upon the ground of which he meant to question the legality of the sentence; and if his arguments prevailed with the House, as no appeal could lie from the conviction, he should propose an address to his Majesty in favour of these unfortunate men. Mr. Pitt, however, insisted, that "no doubt could be entertained, either of the legality of the trials, or the propriety with which the Lords of Justiciary had exercised their discretion on that occasion;" and the question was lost, on a division, by 172 against 32 voices. On the 25th of March, Mr. Adam introduced a third motion, supported by a long chain of facts and reasonings, relative to the regulation of the justiciary courts of Scotland, purporting to bring their general practice nearer to that of the English courts. Mr. Secretary Dundas, however, contended, that the Scottish nation was very happy under its own laws; that the alterations proposed would be a violation of the articles of the union; and that the reform really wanting, was to assimilate the English law of sedition, in a certain degree, to that of Scotland.—The motion was negatived by 77 against 24.

Among the military plans in agitation at this time, was a projected expedition to the coast of France, with a view to co-operate with the loyalists in Britanny, and in the neighbouring districts, and a body of Hessian troops, in the pay of England, was destined for this service. As, however, the preparations were not in a sufficient state of forwardness when these troops arrived from from the continent, and sickness would be produced by detaining them on board the transports, till every thing was ready for carrying the plan into effect, it was deemed proper to land them, and to put them into temporary quarters, at Portsmouth, in the Isle of Wight, and in other convenient places, near the coast. This circumstance was communicated to Parliament, in a message from his Majesty, on the 27th of March. As many similar cases had occurred at different periods, and as the cause and necessity of the measure were so perfectly obvious, it was concluded, that the usual communication of the fact to Parliament would be satisfactory. The opposition, however, contended, that the minister ought to have moved for a bill of indemnity; and he was charged with having violated the Bill of Rights, and the Act of Settlement. Mr. Grey, on the 10th of February, moved, as a resolution of the House, "that to employ foreigners in any situation of military trust, or to bring foreign troops into the kingdom, without the consent of Parliament first had and obtained, is contrary to law." This motion was negatived, by 134 against 35. The subject was afterwards renewed, in both Houses, but with no better success.

Mr. Wilberforce's Bill for abolishing that part of the slave-trade which related to the supply of foreign plantations, passed the House of Commons, under the patronage of Mr. Pitt, but was thrown out in the Lords, in consequence of the avowed disapprobation of Lord Grenville, who considered it to be ill-timed, pending the inquiry instituted in that House respecting the general question.

A message was delivered from the King, purporting, that the avowed intentions of the enemy to invade this country made an increase of the land-forces necessary; and an address was voted by the House, assuring his Majesty "of their zealous concurrence in every exertion which became a brave and loyal people in the prosecution of this just and necessary war." A great augmentation of the militia, and an addition of volunteer fencible corps, were accordingly voted, and the expedient of soliciting voluntary contributions, by a formal letter written by the Secretary of State to the Lords-Lieutenants of the several counties of the kingdom, was successfully resorted to.

Mr. Whitbread moved (March 6) an address to the King, strongly expressive of disapprobation of the conduct of ministers, and of those measures which had preceded and succeeded the declaration of war;—lamenting that his Majesty should have been advised to make a common cause with powers whose objects were undefined, but who, as there was much ground to fear, prosecuted the war with views, and for purposes, solemnly disavowed by his Majesty, and abhorrent to the principles of a free nation; and requesting his Majesty to extricate himself from his present engagements, as they prevented his concluding a separate peace. This motion was negatived by a great majority; as was a similar motion made by the Earl of Guildford, in the House of Lords.

The situation of General La Fayette and his companions, La Tour Maubourg and Bureaux de Pusy, already stated, exciting the compassion of many respectable persons, General Fitzpatrick moved in the House of Commons, on the 17th of March, for an address to the throne, beseeching his Majesty to intercede with the court of Berlin in their favour. It appeared that the King of Prussia being applied to for the release of La Fayette, had answered, that he was not his prisoner alone, but that of the Confederate Powers jointly, and that he could be set at liberty only by the consent of all. Mr. Pitt opposed the motion, as equally improper and unnecessary, and denied that M. la Fayette's conduct had ever been friendly to the genuine cause of liberty. He affirmed, that the interference required would be setting up ourselves as guardians of the consciences of foreign states. The motion was negatived, by a large majority.

On the 10th of April, Major Maitland, brother to the Earl of Lauderdale, moved for a committee of the whole House to inquire into the causes of the failure at Dunkirk, and the evacuation of Toulon, which he enforced by a speech containing severe animadversions on the conduct and policy of administration. Mr. Pitt objected to the motion, on account of the great inconveniences of inquiry, which he affirmed to be of such magnitude that they ought never to be hazarded except when the failures were of a nature to attach incapacity to the character of ministers, or to occasion distrust of the general system which they had adopted: but the failures which had taken place, he submitted to the House, were far from amounting to this. The motion was negatived.

About this time, Mr. Harrison brought forward a motion respecting sinecure places and pensions, all of which above two hundred pounds per annum he proposed to tax, during the continuance of the war, in a certain specified and gradual scale of proportion. Mr. Burke treated this proposition with great disdain, and compared the measure to those which had occasioned the ruin of France. As a measure of resource, he said, it was trifling and inadequate; as a measure of policy, mistaken. The motion was negatived by 119 against 50.

A bill, the object of which was to enable Frenchmen to enlist in his Majesty's service on the continent, or, in other words, for employing the French emigrants in a military capacity, occasioned, at this period of the session, much and sharp discussion; but the measure was carried by a large majority.*

On the 28th of April, Mr. Dundas delivered a message from the King, announcing a treaty of subsidy with the King of Prussia, and a convention with the States General. Mr. Pitt stated the terms to be as follows: "That his Prussian Majesty had agreed to furnish 62,000 troops, for which his Britannic Majesty had agreed to pay him 50,000*l.* per month; 100,000*l.* per month for forage, 400,000*l.* to put the army in motion, and 100,000*l.* on their return; of the aggregate of which sums the States General were to pay 400,000*l.* as their proportion." Over the troops subsidized at this expence, the direction and command were still vested in the King of Prussia. The motion of Mr. Pitt for the sum of 2,500,000*l.* to be raised by way of loan on exchequer bills, in addition to the supplies of the current year, for the purpose of making good this engagement, after being warmly opposed in every stage, ultimately passed by a great majority, as usual.

In consequence of the provision which had been made in the course of the session for embodying a numerous corps of French emigrants, Mr. Sheridan moved for leave to bring in a bill for a new military test, containing merely a declaration of allegiance, such as might admit the whole body of English Dissenters, Catholic and Protestant, to serve their country in a military capacity; to which he said that he presumed the House would allow them to be at least as competent as an army of French Papists. Mr. Sheridan objected to all the tests and disqualifying laws; but, confining himself on the present occasion to what he thought might probably be granted, he extended his motion only to military and naval tests, leaving all civil employments to remain as they were. The previous question, however, was moved by Mr. Dundas, and carried without a division.

Shortly afterwards (May 30) the Duke of Bedford, who had already distinguished himself as a speaker, called for the attention of the Peers on the important subject of peace. His grace submitted a series of propositions, fourteen in number. With respect to the question, how a "permanent" peace was to be made with France, his grace professed himself at a loss to comprehend the force of the epithet. As applied to treaties between nations, no peace had ever been, or could ever be permanent, which it suited the interest or

* The debate upon this question was remarkable for being the last in which Mr. Burke, who soon afterwards vacated his seat in Parliament, took any active part, and in which he discovered no diminution of those extraordinary powers which had so long excited the admiration of the world.

inclinations

inclinations of either party to break; and a peace concluded at the present time was as likely to be permanent as at any other.

Lord Hawkesbury opposed the motion upon the ground of its being an improper interference with the royal prerogative. There were, he said, no hopes of a permanent peace with the French; the speediest method of obtaining it would be by a change in that government. We were justified in our endeavours to effect this object in every practicable way; and their making war upon us unprovoked, undoubtedly gave us new rights; and this, none who understood the law of nations, could possibly call in question. The resolutions were disposed of, by a motion of adjournment, which was carried.

Mr. Fox, on the same day, introduced into the House of Commons a series of resolutions precisely similar to those moved by the Duke of Bedford in the House of Lords; but the motion was lost, in favour of the previous question, by 110 against 57.

Parliament was prorogued on the 11th of July,* by a speech from the throne, in which the King urged his two Houses of Parliament to persevere with increased vigour and exertion, in the present arduous contest, against a power irreconcileably hostile in its principles and spirit to all regular and established governments.†

The system of terror, in France, had given to the rulers of that land, an absolute dominion over the persons of its inhabitants, and over every thing which it contained. Resolved to extend their sway over the neighbouring countries, to enlarge their own boundaries, and to obtain, by plunder, the means of supporting those gigantic efforts which they were thus enabled to make, they had armed, at the close of the year 1793, nearly one million of men, three hundred thousand of whom were employed on the northern frontier of the republic. To these the allies had not more than one hundred and forty thousand men to oppose. Besides the superiority of numbers, the French army had the advantage of being subject to the orders of one chief, as it were, while the allies, composed of different nations, were commanded by various leaders, who were very far from acting with that cordial spirit of co-operation which was so essentially necessary, not merely to ensure success, but to prevent defeat. As early as the 6th of January, the Duke of Brunswick addressed a remarkable letter to the King of Prussia, in which he announced the resignation of his command, stating, as his motive, "The unhappy experience that want of connection, distrust, egotism, and a spirit of cabal, had disconcerted the measures adopted during the two last campaigns." In a subsequent part of the letter, he says,—"When, instead of the prevalence of an unanimous sentiment and the same principle, each army acts separate and alone, of its own accord, without any fixed plan, without unanimity and without principles, the consequences are such as we have seen at Dunkirk, at Maubeuge, and Landau. Heaven preserve your Majesty from great misfortunes!"

It has been conjectured, that the King of Prussia, from the disappointment of various kinds which he had experienced, had already determined to withdraw himself from the confederacy. In the month of February, certain commissioners from the French republic arrived at Frankfort under the pretext of negotiating for an exchange of prisoners; but the marked distinction with which they were treated, indicated somewhat of different import and of higher moment.

Field-Marshal Mullendorf succeeded to the Duke of Brunswick in the command of the Prussian army; and an intimation to the Prince of Cobourg, that he had received orders from his court to march towards Cologne, was followed, on the 13th of March, by a proclamation addressed to the German empire, announcing his Prussian Majesty's actual secession from the grand confederacy. This ruse d'etat appears to have fully answered its intended purpose; as it was almost immediately followed by a treaty of subsidy, conformably to which, the sum of nearly two millions sterling was to be paid to the court of Berlin for the service of an army of 62,000 men, to be commanded by an officer of his Prussian Majesty's own appointment.

In March, a general council of war was convened, at Ath, when the projected arrangements of the campaign, on the part of the court of Vienna, were brought forward by General Haddick. A main article of this plan was, that General Clairfait, an officer of great ability and experience, should be appointed to the command of the auxiliary forces, and that the Duke of York should act under his orders—the Prince of Cobourg continuing at the head of the grand imperial army. This his royal highness refused with disdain; and the dispute was only settled by the determination, that the Emperor himself should take the field in person, and that in him should be vested the supreme command. On the 9th of April his imperial Majesty arrived at Brussels, where he was solemnly inaugurated Duke of Brabant. Thence he proceeded to Valenciennes, where his presence diffused great joy; and, on the 16th, the whole army was reviewed by him on the heights above Cateau. On the following day they marched in eight columns to invest Landreci. The French assembled in force at the camp of Cœsar, near Cambray, from which they were, on the 23d, driven by the confederates, and the investment of Landreci immediately took place. The next day the French made a general assault upon the different posts of the allies in this quarter. They were in most instances repulsed; but the post of Mou-

* During this session, the court sat thirty days on the trial of Mr. Hastings; and on the 14th of June, the 147th day of the trial, the replication of the Commons was closed. Mr. Burke, at the end of his concluding speech, the wonder of nine days, (so long did it last) declared, "that the Commons waited the issue of this cause with trembling solicitude. They felt the dearest interests of their country deeply involved in it. Your Lordships' justice," said this famous orator, "stands pre-eminent in the world; but it stands amidst vast heaps of ruins which surround it in every corner of Europe. I trust however that the noble fabric of this constitution will long exist unimpaired in reputation as well as in strength: and at the same time that it operates as a terror to tyrants, that it will never cease to afford protection to injured and oppressed nations." The final decision of the Peers was postponed till the ensuing session, when Mr. Hastings was honourably acquitted on every charge. It is not necessary to call in question the justice or the policy of his impeachment, though very much might be, and has been, urged against both, to support a charge of persecution—for persecuted a man must be, whatever his alledged or real guilt, over whose head the sword of the law is suspended for the long term of seven years! Such lengthened trials are repugnant to the genius and spirit of British jurisprudence. The cause of such unjustifiable delay in the administration of criminal justice, whatever it may be, ought to be removed. It subjects the innocent man to a punishment as severe as could be inflicted on the guilty. It keeps him, for a series of years, in a state of constraint, inactivity, and suspence, and subjects him to losses of various kinds more ruinous than any fine which the court could impose. The Commons threw the blame of the delay on the Lords, who had only devoted a few days in each session to the trial, but the Commons themselves were not wholly exempted from censure, since their managers were suffered to occupy several days in the delivery of a single speech, as if more intent on displaying their own powers of eloquence, than in promoting the ends of substantial justice. It requires, however, a radical change in the mode of conducting impeachments, before this most grievous evil can be removed. There ought to be a limited time between the period for preferring the charges before the high-court of Parliament, and the final delivery of the sentence, beyond which no trial should be protracted. At all events, no prorogation of the House of Lords ought to take place until the trial should be over. Another regulation, essential to the due administration of justice, is, that this court should be subjected to the same rules as other criminal courts: so far as respects the delivery of their verdict, they ought not to separate, after the defence is closed, until the verdict has been pronounced. The high character which Mr. Hastings bore; the eminent services which he had rendered to his country; his many virtues, both public and private; all combined to render his acquittal a source of satisfaction to a great majority of the people; while it heightened the public feeling at the oppression which he had endured by the unprecedented length of his trial.

† On the rising of Parliament, various alterations in the administration took place. Earl Fitzwilliam was declared president of the council, in the room of Earl Camden; Earl Spencer was appointed Lord Privy Seal; the Duke of Portland was made third Secretary of State; and Mr. Windham, Secretary at War. Before the close of the year, Lord Fitzwilliam was promoted to the Vice-Royalty of Ireland; and the Earl of Mansfield, late Lord Stormont, and nephew to the celebrated Chief-Justice Mansfield, lately deceased, succeeded to the presidency of the council. Lord Spencer was placed at the head of the Admiralty; and Lord Chatham, brother to the premier, who had for some years occupied that important department, was made Lord Privy Seal. Ten new Peers were also created, and the Duke of Portland's services were still farther rewarded with a blue ribbon, and the office of Chancellor of the University of Oxford.

cron, where Clairfait commanded, was attacked with a superior force by Pichegru in person, and carried, after a brave resistance. Courtray and Menin thus fell into the hands of the republicans. In return, the fortress of Landreci, which had repelled the utmost efforts of Prince Eugene in 1712, fell, after a short siege, into the hands of the Prince of Cobourg.

In the month of June, the French, under General Jourdain, who commanded on the side of the Moselle, passed the Sambre, for the third time in the space of fourteen days, and, after being twice repulsed, laid siege to the town of Charleroi. The Prince of Cobourg determined to make a grand effort for its relief. On the 21st he reached Ath, and on the 24th effected a junction with the hereditary Prince of Orange and General Beaulieu, who commanded in that quarter. The main body of the French army under General Jourdain, was strongly posted at this time in the vicinity of Fleurus, to cover the siege of Charleroi. Upon the morning of the 26th, the Prince of Cobourg hazarded a general attack on this force. The battle continued with unabating fury till near the close of the day, by which time the allied army was defeated in every part, and forced, with immense loss, to retreat to Halle, thirty miles from the scene of action. This was a great and decisive victory. Charleroi, to save which this bloody action was fought, had surrendered on the evening of the 25th, and Brussels fell, without further resistance, into the hands of the enemy. General Clairfait was equally unfortunate on the opposite side. Ypres, the key of Western Flanders, was besieged by 50,000 men, commanded by General Moreau. After a series of engagements, in which the French were almost uniformly victorious, the Austrians were compelled to fall back upon Ghent, and Ypres surrendered on the 17th of June. The Emperor, with his favourite, General Mack, in utter despair of success, left the army, after having in vain issued proclamation after proclamation, calling upon the inhabitants of the Low Countries to rise in a mass in order to repel the invaders.

The Duke of York at this time enjoyed the honour of a separate command at Tournay, a position which recent events made wholly untenable: it was therefore evacuated, and the Duke retreated in the direction of Antwerp. No sooner had the fate of the Netherlands been thus decided, than Lord Moira arrived from England with a reinforcement of 10,000 men at Ostend, the gallant remains of that army, which had been destined to re-establish royalty in Britany. His Lordship found his situation very critical, the French being in possession of the country on all sides of him. It was deemed necessary immediately to evacuate the town, and endeavour to force his way, without tents or baggage, through the enemy, to join the army of the allies, which, by great and skilful exertion, he accomplished on the 8th of July: the shipping in the harbour, amounting to 150 sail, with the ammunition, stores, &c. on board, took their departure for Flushing. Thus Ostend, and nearly at the same time, Tournay and Ghent, fell into the hands of the French. In the respective engagements which had taken place between Pichegru and the Prince of Cobourg since the battle of Fleurus, the former had greatly the advantage. Mons, Oudenarde, and Nieuport, places widely distant; and soon after, Mechlin, surrendered to the republican arms. Antwerp itself was no longer considered as a safe retreat. The Stadtholder consequently solicited the States General to make an extraordinary levy throughout the provinces, but without effect. A revolution in the government was apprehended; and the utmost alarm was every where felt.

General Kleber took possession of Louvain, about the middle of July, after defeating General Clairfait, who had possession of the famous camp of the Montagne-de-Fer. The last hope of the allies, that of forming a line of defence from Antwerp to Namur, was now relinquished—Namur being, on the night of the 16th, abandoned by General Beaulieu; and, on the 24th, the French took quiet possession of Antwerp, the allies having previously set fire to the immense magazines there deposited. Sluys made a brave resistance, but surrendered after a siege of six weeks, the garrison marching out with the honours of war. The strong towns still occupied by the allies, Landreci, Quesnoy, Conde, and Valenciennes, being now completely insulated, successively reverted, almost without resistance, to the French.

At the beginning of August, the army under the Duke of York was stationed at Breda, whence, for greater security, it retreated towards Bois-le-Duc. The French forces, re-collected under Pichegru, advancing rapidly upon them, to the number of 80,000 men, about the middle of September, the Duke crossed the Maese, and took a fresh position near Grave, and at the beginning of October, he encamped under the walls of Nimeguen. Towards the end of the month, his royal highness passed the Waal, leaving General Walmoden with a corps to cover the town of Nimeguen, which was evacuated in great confusion, and with much loss, on the 7th of November. Bois-le-Duc, Breda, and, after a resistance worthy of the best days of the republic, Grave, were successively reduced.

Whilst Pichegru was in Dutch Flanders, the Austrian General La Tour was totally defeated by General Jourdain near Liege, which city, and those of Aix-la-Chapelle and Juliers, were occupied by the French. The Prince of Cobourg was at this period suddenly dismissed from his high command; and his successor, General Clairfait, after the most gallant efforts, was compelled, early in October, to repass the Rhine at Cologne. The French pursued the imperial troops to the very margin of the river; and as the rear of the Austrian army embarked, the question was loudly and insultingly asked, if that was the road to Paris? About the end of September the siege of Maestricht was formally commenced, and lasted to the beginning of November, during which interval the attack and defence were conducted with heroic bravery. The atmosphere seemed filled with balls, bombs, and shells, and scarcely was a place of safety left in the whole circuit of the city. Two thousand buildings, public and private, were said to be destroyed, and a general storm was intended on the 4th of November, when the governor, moved by the situation of the inhabitants, and the entreaties of the magistrates, consented to articles of capitulation with General Kleber, who entered the place on the same day.

The frost set in with unusual rigour about the middle of December; in the course of a week the Maese and the Waal were frozen over; and on the 27th a strong column of French crossed the former of those rivers, while another corps made themselves masters of the Bommel. Pichegru did not make his grand movement till the 10th of January, 1795, when the main body of his forces crossed the Waal at different points, and made a general attack upon the lines of the allies, extending between Nimeguen and Arnheim, under the command of General Walmoden,—the Duke of York having returned to England. The allies were defeated in every quarter. A precipitate retreat was ordered towards Amersfort and Deventer. In this retreat, which differed little from a flight, the wretched fugitives were exposed to every species of distress. From the want of common necessaries in the allied army, a dreadful sickness and mortality prevailed, and the harassed and dispirited troops, exposed to the intense severity of the weather, the drifting snow, and heavy falls of sleet and rain, almost without clothing, frequently without sustenance, without medicines, without tents, littered down in cold and damp churches and other public buildings, expired daily and nightly by hundreds. This retreat was almost equivalent to a formal surrender of Holland into the hands of the French. Utrecht, Rotterdam, and Dort, surrendered to the French without resistance; and the Stadtholder with his family, made his escape in an open boat from Scheveling on the 19th of January. On the succeeding day, General Pichegru made his public entry into Amsterdam; and, by order of the States General, every other fortress in the republic opened its gates to the French. On the 27th of January, the the provisional representatives of the people of Holland assembled, and a decree immediately passed for the total abolition of the Stadtholderate, and for the establishment, under the protection of the republic of France, of a new provisional government for the United Provinces.*

Disastrous as this year's campaign had been to the British arms on the Continent, her success, wherever she acted alone and on her own element, was not less distinguished. Towards the end of the year 1793, the British government had prepared a formidable armament to act against the colonies of France in the West Indies. On the 3d of November in that year, this expedition sailed; the land forces, which consisted of about 6000 troops under the command of Sir Charles Grey; and the naval armament, consisting of four ships of war, nine frigates, a bomb ketch, and a few gunboats, and several store ships, under the command of Sir John Jervis. Having rendezvoused early in the year in Carlisle bay, Barbadoes, they sailed, on the 3d of February, to the attack of Martinico, which surrendered, after a resolute resistance of seven weeks. Fort Royal was carried by escalade with extraordinary exertions of valour, particularly on the part of Captain Faulkner of the Zebra, who entered the harbour through the fire of all the batteries, and laid his sloop alongside the walls. About the same period Cape Tiburon, and some other posts in St. Domingo, were reduced to submission by Colonel Whitelock and Commodore Ford. As soon as the reduction of Martinico had been effected, the troops were re-embarked, and landed on the island of St. Lucia, which capitulated on the 4th of April; and upon the 11th of the same month, the fleet and army arrived off Gaudaloupe, which, after a short but brave defence, surrendered, with its dependencies, on the 20th. After these glorious successes Sir Charles Grey returned to Martinico, leaving General Dundas, brother to the minister, to command at Guadaloupe. The General, unfortunately died of the fever incident to the climate, at Guadaloupe, after a few days illness, early in June. A French squadron appeared off the island, June the 5th, from which a body of troops landing under the command of a most daring and skilful leader, Victor Hugues, attacked Fort Fleur d'Epée, which they carried by storm; and the English retreated with considerable loss to Fort Louis. This also was soon evacuated; and the troops, shattered and disheartened, took refuge in Basse-terre. Sir Charles Grey, on the first intelligence of this attempt, sailed from St. Kitt's with all the force he could collect, and, landing on the island of Guadaloupe on the 19th of June, he made an attempt (July 2) on the post of Point-à-Petre. After great efforts of valour, however, he was repulsed, with the loss of 600 men. Upon this the forces were re-embarked; and Basse-terre, after a long and vigorous resistance, with the whole island and its dependencies, reverted to its former possessors.

In the course of the summer the conquest of Port au Prince, the chief of the French settlements on the western side of St. Domingo, was effected.

In the Mediterranean, the progress of the English arms subsequent to the evacuation of Toulon, was very flattering. Early in February, 1794, Lord Hood proceeded for Corsica, which was in a state of revolt against the Convention, the insurgents having been excited to this resistance by the English influence, under the conduct of their ancient and popular chief, Paschal Paoli, who had been some years since restored to his country with honour by the Constituent Assembly. Mortella, Tornelli, and St. Fiorenza, being successively surrendered or evacuated, the Corsicans who adhered to the French interest retreated to Bastia, which resisted the united efforts of the Anglo-Corsicans and English till the 24th of May, when it capitulated on honourable terms; and the whole island, excepting Calvi, which held out till August, submitted to the English. Letters of convocation were immediately issued for the Assembly of the General Consulta, to be held at Corte, the ancient capital of Corsica, on Sunday the 8th of June; General Paoli was elected President. The representatives of the Corsican nation immediately voted the union of Corsica with the British crown; a constitutional act was framed accordingly; and Sir Gilbert Elliot, representative of his Britannic Majesty, formally accepted this act on his part, and immediately assumed the title of Viceroy.

At home, as well as abroad, the navy of England was destined to be uniformly triumphant. The Channel fleet, which, during the last summer, had achieved nothing worthy the reputation of its veteran commander, put to sea in the spring in search of an enemy which had hitherto eluded pursuit. Lord Howe was particularly solicitous to vindicate the honour of his country, as well as to rescue his own character from unmerited reproach; and the powerful armament now under his command, left no doubt relative to the result of a contest. On reaching the Lizard, a signal was made for the East Indiamen to proceed on their voyage under convoy of six sail of the line and a frigate, which were not to separate from them until their arrival off Cape Finisterre. Having received information on the 19th of May, that the Brest fleet was at sea, Lord Howe deemed it proper to effect a junction with the squadron lately detached under Rear-Admiral Montague as soon as possible; but on hearing, two days after, that the enemy had been seen a few leagues further to the westward, he immediately altered his course, and steered towards them.

Great care had hitherto been taken to avoid any naval contest with the English; but on the present occasion orders were transmitted to Vice-Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse to protect the supplies from America at the risk of a battle. Jean Bon St. André, who had been employed at Brest to infuse a spirit of democracy into the seamen, acted on this occasion as a national commissioner, having embarked on board the flag ship, carrying one hundred and twenty guns, and designated La Montagne, after the ruling party in the convention. On the 28th of May, at eight o'clock in the morning, in north latitude 47° 33'. W. Long. 14° 10'. the rival fleets descried each other exactly at the same time; the wind blew strong from the south-west, accompanied by a very rough sea,

* The Prussian General, Mullendorf, who had been obliged to make some show of co-operation with the Austrians, surprised the French in their entrenchments at Keyserslautern, and defeated them with considerable loss. In July, the French, under General Desaix, attacked the Prussians, and carried the important posts occupied by Prince Hohenloe on the Platoberg, a high mountain in the territory of Deux-Ponts. Soon afterwards, they repeated their attack upon the whole chain of posts from Neustadt to the Rhine with splendid success, and both Austrians and Prussians were obliged to retreat with precipitation. The imperial army re-crossed the Rhine, and the Prussians retired towards Guntersbloom and Mentz. The recent acquisition of Keyserslautern was abandoned to the republicans, who again occupied the cities of Worms, Spire, and Treves. In Spain and Italy also the armies of the republic were successful. During the campaign of 1793, the Spaniards had entered France, and meeting with little opposition, had captured the city of Bellegarde, and obtained, in various engagements, some indecisive advantages: but the republicans, who were at first compelled to stand on the defensive, became at length the assailants. In November, they penetrated into the province of Catalonia, and in the beginning of February following, a battle was fought near St Jean de Luz, in which the French were conquerors. In the month of May another victory was gained near Ceret; and soon afterwards a third, of more importance than the former two, over the principal Spanish army posted in the vicinity of Collioure, by General Dugommier, the whole of the baggage and artillery falling into the hands of the French. A column was ordered by the Convention to be erected in memory of this exploit. The cities of Urgel, St. Elmo, and Bellegarde, so recently captured, surrendered to the armies of France, conducted by the heroic Dugommier. The Spaniards also, under their General, the Count de l'Union, fought with great bravery, but were overpowered by superior skill and numbers. Soon after the re-capture of Bellegarde, General Dugommier obtained another signal victory, but was, at the close of it, unfortunately killed by the bursting of a shell. His death was speedily avenged by the defeat and death of his gallant opponent, the Count de l'Union. On the western side great advantages were gained by General Moncey, and the towns of Fontarabia and St. Sebastian fell into the hands of the French; the city of Pampeluna itself was menaced with a siege, and a deep and dangerous impression made upon the whole extent of the Pyrenean frontier. In Italy, the Piedmontese had, at the command of the Sardinian monarch, risen in a mass; but, being destitute of the enthusiasm of liberty, they constituted a body without a soul. The French forced the famous pass of Mount Cenis, took possession of the city and territory of Oneglia, and made themselves masters of a great part of the open country of that district.

and the French possessed the weather-gage.—After the advanced frigates had given intimation of this event, Earl Howe continued his course, while Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse endeavoured as much as possible to assume a regular order of battle upon the starboard tack, a circumstance which greatly facilitated the approach of the English. As the conduct of the enemy, who had now hauled their wind, indicated an intention to avoid a close fight, the British commander, at fifty-five minutes past one o'clock, displayed the signal for a general chase, and to prevent their escape, he soon after detached Rear Admiral Pasley, with a flying squadron, consisting of the Bellerophon, Russell, Marlborough, and Thunderer, to make an impression on their rear. That officer accordingly, near the close of the day, came up with and attacked the Révolutionnaire, a three-decked ship of 110 guns, which happened to be the sternmost in the line; but his topmast being disabled during the action, Lord Hugh Seymour Conway, in the Leviathan, gallantly advanced, and received her fire, which was tremendous, and by the time it was dark, Captain Parker, of the Audacious, having arrived close to the rear ship, fought her also within the distance of half a cable's length, but without any decisive success on either side. The rival fleets, consisting of twenty-six sail of the line on one part, and twenty-five on the other, remained within sight of each other during the whole night on the starboard tack, and in a parallel direction, with the French still to windward, but next morning (the 29th of May,) Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, flushed with the hopes of a victory, wore from van to rear, and instead of flinching from the action, edged down in a line a-head to engage the van of the British fleet.

Taking advantage of so favourable an opportunity, Lord Howe renewed the signal for passing the enemy's line, and succeeded with some difficulty in obtaining the weather-gage, while the enemy were repulsed by the Barfleur and two other three-deckers, in an attempt to cut off the Queen and Royal George. At length Villaret-Joyeuse tacked again by signal, and after a distant cannonade, stood away in order of battle on the larboard tack, followed by the whole of the British fleet, which still retained the weather-gage. The second day's action proved equally indecisive as the former, and a thick fog that intervened during this night and the greater part of the succeeding day, prevented the renewal of the engagement. In the meantime Rear-Admiral Neilly joined the French commander-in-chief with a reinforcement of three sail of the line and two frigates, comprehending Le Sanspareil of 80 guns, and Le Trajan and Le Temeraire of 74 guns each, and La Semillante and La Tamise of 36 guns each; this accession of strength enabled him to detach his crippled ships, and the dawn of the succeeding day exhibited the two fleets drawn up in order of battle, and prepared to renew the contest. The British Admiral perceiving that there was time sufficient for the various ships' companies to take refreshment, made a signal for breakfast; an event which, by procrastinating the action, induced the enemy to believe that their antagonists wished to decline the engagement. But they were miserably disappointed, for in about half an hour, Lord Howe gave orders for steering the Royal Charlotte, on board of which was flying the signal for close action, alongside the French Admiral. This was effected at nine o'clock in the morning, and, by an extraordinary display of seamanship on the part of his master, Mr. Bowen, he was enabled to assume a most excellent position, so as to be able to contend with advantage against a vessel far superior in point of size; and while some of the English commanders penetrated the line of battle and engaged to leeward, others occupied such stations as allowed them to combat with their antagonists to windward. So close and severe was the contest, that the fate of this day depended but little either on the exertion of nautical knowledge, or the exhibition of that scientific skill which subjects the management of artillery to the rules of tactics. All was hard fighting. Such was the tremendous fire, and so decisive the advantage, on the part of the British, that in about fifty minutes after the action had commenced in the centre, Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse determined to relinquish the contest; for he now perceived several of his ships dismasted, and one of seventy-four guns about to sink; he at the same time found that six were captured: a great slaughter had also taken place on board his own vessel, in which his Captain, Bastile, and a multitude of the crew were killed, while the national commissioner, with most of his officers, was wounded. He accordingly crowded off with all the canvas he could spread, and was immediately followed by most of the ships in his van that were not completely crippled; two or three of these, although dismantled, also got away soon after, under a temporary sail hoisted on the occasion; for the enemy had, as usual, chiefly aimed at the rigging, and the victors were by this time disabled from pursuing the vanquished: the Queen Charlotte in particular, which but for an unlucky broadside from Le Jacobin would have captured her antagonist, was at this period nearly unmanageable, having lost her foretopmast in action; this was soon after followed by the maintopmast, which fell over the side; while the Brunswick, which had lost her mizen-mast, and the Queen, which was also disabled, drifted to leeward, and were exposed to considerable danger from the retreating fleet. Two eighty, and five seventy-four gun ships, however, still remained in possession of the victors, but one of the latter (Le Vengeur) went down soon after she was taken possession of. The slaughter on the part of the English was not so great as might have been expected.* Captain Montague, of the Montague, happened to be the only commander who fell during the engagement. Several officers of distinction, however, suffered in the course of the day: for Vice-Admiral Graves, the Honourable G. Berkeley, and Captain J. Harvey,† were among the wounded; and the Rear-Admirals Pasley and Bowyer, and Captain Hutt of the Queen, lost a leg each.

Admiral Montague, who had repaired to England, whence he was immediately dispatched to join Earl Howe, sailed for Brest, partly with a view to fall in with the commander-in-chief, and partly on purpose to pick up any crippled ships, which, in case of an action, might take shelter in that port; he accordingly encountered some of the retreating squadron, and chased them into the outer road. On the succeeding day he descried the main body under Villaret-Joyeuse; but, notwithstanding the late fatal conflict, that commander formed an admirable line of battle and gave chase; while the fleet from America, consisting of one hundred and sixty sail of merchantmen, supposed to be worth several millions sterling, but invaluable on account of the distressed state of France, arrived in safety on the 12th of June.

* The following is a comparative estimate of the killed and wounded:—

	Killed.	Wounded.	Total
On board the six French ships taken,	690	580	1270
On board six of the English ships that suffered most,	125	335	460
Surplus killed and wounded on the part of the French,	565	245	810

† Captain J. Harvey, of the Brunswick, who had conducted himself with distinguished bravery during the action, died a few days after his return to Portsmouth, of a fever accompanied by a delirium; Captain Hutt, of the Queen, also perished in a similar manner. These two gallant officers were thus prevented from receiving the rewards so justly due to their valour; but the Rear-Admirals Bowyer and Pasley were created Baronets, and received a pension of 1000*l.* each per annum. Admirals Graves and Sir Alexander Hood had the honours of the Peerage conferred upon them. Earl Howe was presented with a diamond-hilted sword of great value, by the King in person, on board the Queen Charlotte at Spithead; and also with a golden chain, to which was suspended a medal, with victory crowning Britannia on the obverse, and on the reverse a wreath of oak and laurel, encircling his Lordship's name, and the date of the action. In December, 1796, his Majesty was also pleased to transmit gold chains and medals to the following flag officers and Captains, who were reported by Lord Howe to have signalized themselves during the battle with the French fleet:—Vice-Admirals Sir A. Hood, T. Graves. Rear-Admirals A. Gardner, G. Bowyer, T. Pasley, Sir R. Curtis. Captains W. Hope, Elphinstone, Hon. T. Pakenham, J. T. Duckworth, Sir A. Douglas, H. Harvey, W. Domett, H. Nichols, J. W. Payne, and T. Pringle.

The

The British commander-in-chief now deemed it proper to conduct the six ships captured from the enemy into port, being unable to keep the sea, on account of the disabled state of his own squadron. He accordingly steered for England, arrived safe off Dunnose in the Isle of Wight, on the 13th of June, and in the course of the same day returned thanks for "The highly distinguished examples of resolution, spirit, and perseverance, which had been testified by every description of officers, seamen, and military corps, in the ships of the fleet, during the several actions with the enemy on the 28th and 29th of May, and the 1st of June."*

The British fleet after it had been refitted, again put to sea; but the enemy was so completely humbled, that the Brest fleet never ventured out until Lord Howe had returned to port, and instead of making captures, they actually lost five sail of the line.†

Amongst the miscellaneous events of the year, may be mentioned the arrival, at London, in the month of April, of Mr. Jay, Chief Justice of the United States of America, as Minister Plenipotentiary, to adjust the existing differences between that republic and the British government; and, in the autumn, the return to England of Lord Macartney, from his celebrated embassy, to China.‡ The British settlements, in India, at this period, enjoyed a season of tranquil repose, under the government of Sir John Shore the successor of Earl Cornwallis;§ the European States, and their dependencies, alone experiencing the horrors of war.

In the course of the summer, wonderful changes had taken place in the internal state and government of France. The virtuous and amiable Princess Elizabeth, sister of the late King, and his faithful companion under misfortune, had been sacrificed on the regicidal altar;‖ Robespierre, the great high priest of Moloch, had himself become a victim to the idol of his adoration; and the Jacobin Club, giving way, in its turn, to the remains of the Girondist party, the object of its bloody persecution, had been totally destroyed.¶

Sweden and Denmark still persevered in their determination

* Whilst the French convention, inflamed by the delusive eloquence of Barrère, and the exaggerated report of Jean Bon St. André, gave orders to hang up the model of the Vengeur, the crew of which had long contended hand to hand with an enemy's ship of the same rate, in the Pantheon, the English nation exhibited unbounded joy at a victory in some measure necessary to its independence. The metropolis, and many of the provincial cities and towns, were illuminated during three nights in succession; the Parliament passed a vote of thanks; large sums of money were subscribed for the benefit of the widows and children of those killed in action; and the king repaired to Spithead, on purpose to congratulate in person the gallant Admiral, officers and seamen, who had performed such brilliant achievements.

† The success of the British navy, in the course of this year, was nearly uniform, both in respect to squadrons and single ships. On the 23d of April, Sir John Borlase Warren had signalized himself by the defeat of a small French squadron in an engagement off Guernsey, in which after two hours fighting and some hours of close pursuit, four sail were captured from the enemy. In August he pursued five other French ships of war off Scilly, and driving two of them under the batteries of the Gamelle rocks, would have proceeded to burn them; but, with a generosity worthy of his courage, abstained from the last rigours of war against an unfortunate enemy, whose wounded must have perished had he set their vessels on fire. Several combats of single ships displayed the superiority of our seamen in a most brilliant light. Of these, the action of Captain Nagle of the Artois, with the Revolutionnaire, and others might be mentioned. Nor did the loss of the Alexander of 74 guns in the month of November, tarnish the reputation of the British arms, though the unusual spectacle of such a prize was resounded through France as an immortal atchievement. This vessel, which had parted from the division of Admiral Bligh, and could not rejoin it, was attacked off Brest by three French seventy-fours, which she engaged, and resisted for two hours, and it was not till her lower masts were on the point of going by the board that she reluctantly struck to this disparity of force.

‡ The grand object of Lord Macartney's mission was to conclude a commercial treaty with the government of China, and to obtain, if possible, an extension of privileges for the English merchants; more particularly to procure permission to land their commodities at some port nearer to the capital than Canton. Lord Macartney left England, at the latter end of September 1792, in the Lion man of war of 64 guns, and in the month of July following, he reached the north-eastern coast of China, whence he and his train were conveyed up the great river Tyensing to the city of the same name, in junks or barges, under the escort of a mandarin guard, who were watchful to prevent the least communication with the inhabitants, pitching their tents at night exactly opposite the spot where the junks lay at anchor. "On the 11th of August they arrived at Tyensing, where they received refreshments and presents, of no great value, on the part of the Emperor, the famous Kien Long, who had already governed that vast empire with uninterrupted success and reputation more than half a century. From Tyensing they still proceeded on their voyage, up the river to the city of Tong-tchew, within twelve miles of Pekin, the capital of China. After a short interval of rest at Tong-tchew, the ambassador and his secretary, Sir George Staunton, set out in palanquins provided for the purpose, which conveyed them to the metropolis—the train following in covered carriages. The Emperor being at this season of the year usually resident at Jehol, his summer palace in Tartary, beyond the great wall, orders were sent that the ambassador should proceed thither. On the 7th of September he arrived at Pehol; and on the 14th his excellency was honoured with his first audience of the Emperor, at five o'clock in the morning. The ambassador had brought with him from England the most splendid and costly presents which were ever offered by one monarch to the acceptance of another; but they were received with marked indifference, or rather haughtiness; and care had been taken to paint in large Chinese characters, upon the flags pendent from the yachts and land carriages, 'Ambassador bearing tribute from the country of England.' The Emperor himself behaved with decorum and politeness to the ambassador; but he would neither enter into any treaty, nor would he grant any new privileges. Early in the month of October, Kien Long and his court, attended by Lord Macartney and his train, returned to Pekin; within a very short time subsequently to which his excellency had his last audience of his imperial Majesty, who delivered to him a letter, in answer to that from the King of England, and also a poem of his own composing, inclosed in a roll covered with yellow silk. This was accompanied by several chests of presents; and the ambassador, who had made great preparations for passing the winter in Pekin, was officially apprized that this was the signal of departure. On the 9th of October his excellency and his suite left Pekin, and proceeded to Tong-tchew, whence they were conveyed in junks as before, through the interior of that immense empire, by a variety of rivers and canals from the northern to the southern extremity of China, reaching Canton in perfect safety, after a variety of amusing adventures, December 18, 1793, and in January following they embarked at Macao for Britain."

§ At Bengal, on the 27th of April, this year, died Sir William Jones, who had been appointed, March 1783, a judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature in India on the recall of Sir Elijah Impey. Sir William had long been celebrated, for the profundity and extent of his attainments. As a linguist he was equally familiar with the modern and the ancient, the occidental and the oriental, languages; and, as a writer and professor of juris-prudence, he was equally versed in the laws and usages of his native country, the Roman and Grecian, the Hindoo and Mahometan systems. At once a mathematician, a poet, and an historian; he also excelled in musical, chymical, and botanical pursuits; his attainments in each justifying the supposition that he had made the study of it the great object of his life. Yet he died at the age of forty-seven. To his great and unrivalled intellectual accomplishments he added the highest moral excellence; and no greater or juster eulogium could be pronounced upon him, than that his virtues were equal to his talents.

‖ The Princess Elizabeth was charged with having conspired to restore royalty, with persons, many of whom she had never even seen: not a witness was produced, nor a single attempt made to substantiate any one fact alledged against her. She was condemned to death, with twenty-four of her reputed accomplices; and she died, as she had lived, devout, tranquil, and resigned; considering the sentence which consigned her to the scaffold as a welcome passport to a better life.

At this time, though not less than forty persons of all ages, and of both sexes, were daily consigned to the guillotine, the prisons, replenished as soon as thinned, were almost constantly full. The rage of these monsters in human shape seems to have been more particularly directed against women; to deprave their morals, to prosecute their persons, and to forward their destruction, appeared to be equally the object of their study. Fourteen young ladies, from Verdun, who are described, by a person who was imprisoned with them, as being of unexampled modesty, and having the appearance of virgins dressed for a bridal feast, were led together to the scaffold, on a charge of having danced at a ball given by some Prussian officers, in 1792, while the place was in possession of the allies. Twenty females, from Poitou, mostly peasants, were also executed together. While they were lying in the yard of the prison, one of them had an infant at her breast, which was forcibly torn from her, as they were going to conduct her to the place of execution. Several of these unhappy females died on the way, but the savages guillotined their bodies. Many women in a state of pregnancy, died in the different prisons for want of that assistance which their situation required. And when Billaud Varennes was apprized of the fact, instead of giving such orders as would prevent a recurrence of the evil, he remarked, with true philosophical apathy, "'Tis so much trouble saved to the executioner." So dreadful was the state of the prisoners that many of them actually petitioned to be executed. To a woman, who applied for this purpose to him, Couthon said, "You have not been long enough in a situation which makes death desirable." A lady, in the last stage of pregnancy, was seized with the pains of labour at the moment when she was summoned to repair to the guillotine. Regardless of her situation she was compelled to descend to the yard, where two soldiers dragged her towards the cart, till her agonies rose to such a height that they were at length compelled to put her into the first room they could find, where she was immediately delivered alone, and without assistance.

¶ The proceedings of the convention, at the commencement of the year 1794, seem to indicate, that some secret advances had been made on the part of the allies, to establish a truce for two years between mination of observing a perfect impartiality during the present war; and in the course of this year (March 27) a convention was concluded between them, by which they agreed to protect the freedom of Commerce in the Baltic on the principles of the armed neutrality of 1780, equipping jointly a fleet of sixteen ships of the line, in equal proportions, for that service; and by the tenth article the Baltic was declared to be a neutral sea, absolutely and altogether inaccessible to the armed ships of the different and distant belligerent powers.

The British Parliament assembled on the 30th of December. In the speech from the throne, while the disasters of the late campaign were admitted, they were not allowed to supply any reasons for diminishing the vigour of exertion so necessary for the pursuit of the war. On the contrary, additional vigour, and additional efforts, were held out as the only possible means of bringing it to a successful issue. The Dutch government, indeed, dispirited by the reverses which the allies had experienced, had opened a negociation with the tween the belligerent powers. Such advances, however, if really made, were treated with contempt.

On the 3d of February, three deputies from the island of St. Domingo, one of whom was a negro, and the others men of colour, were received by the convention as the representatives of the colony. On the succeeding day one of the deputies gave an account of the troubles of the island; and he had no sooner concluded, than La Croix eagerly moved for the entire abolition of slavery within the dominions of France. The National Convention rose spontaneously to decree the proposition, and the men of colour were all adopted as French citizens. Hebert, Ronsin, Anarcharsis Clootz, styled the Apostle of Atheism, &c.—men who, to conciliate the populace, adopted the wildest theories, decried all religion, preached equality in the absurdest extent, and recommended publicly an agrarian law, were now at the head of the Cordeliers. In the beginning of March the table of the Rights of Man, in the hall of the Cordeliers, was covered with a black crape; and Herbert from the tribune of the society, affirmed that tyranny existed in the republic. This was sufficient to arouse the jealousy of Robespierre. Virtue and ferocity were declared in the Convention, by the wretch Couthon, to be the requisite order of the day. On the 25th of March, Hebert, Ronsin, Clootz, and many others, were arrested, and brought before the Revolutionary Tribunal, and of course condemned to the guillotine. These executions were followed by those of Fabre d'Eglantine, Chabot, Bazire, Julien of Toulouse, Herault Sechelles, and other popular deputies of the Convention, on pretence of their having engaged in counter-revolutionary projects. The arrest of Danton, Philippeaux, Camille Desmoulins, &c. took place on the 31st of March. It deserves notice, that St. Just, in the report presented on this occasion, makes the profession of atheism a principal charge against Fabre d'Eglantine. On the 2d of April, these persons and many others their pretended accomplices, fell under the fatal axe of the guillotine.(a) The execution of Danton and his fellow sufferers, was followed by that of General Arthur Dillon, who had formerly commanded that division of the French army, which in the campaign of 1792, had so gallantly repulsed the Prussians: the general had been accused, along with Madame Desmoulins, of a plot to overturn the government.

About this time, the Convention decreed that the remains of the celebrated Jean Jacques Rousseau should be deposited in the beautiful church of St. Genevieve, now styled the Pantheon. "That illustrious patriot" said the president "has left excellent lessons to mankind, to love liberty, morality, and the Divinity. These lessons will for ever confound those false philosophers who profess neither to believe in a Providence nor in a Supreme Being—the only consolation of mankind

(a) J. G. Danton, an advocate to the council, was born at Arcis-sur-Aube, on the 26th of October, 1759. His height was colossal, his make athletic, his features strongly marked, coarse and displeasing; his voice shook the domes of the hall, his elocution was vehement, and his images gigantic. He was successively the friend of Mirabeau, of Marat, and of Robespierre. In 1792, he was one of those who organized the sanguinary scenes of August 10th, by appearing on the 8th, at the bar of the assembly, to declare that if the King's deposition were not decreed, the section of Cordeliers would rise and trample on the government. Louis XVI. having been removed from the throne on the 10th, Danton became a member of the provisional executive council, obtained the appointment of administrator of justice, and accepted the nomination of agent to the army, and to the departments, which gave him opportunities of engaging many in his interest. He employed himself with great success in awakening a spirit of military enthusiasm. On the 3d of September, the entrance of the Prussians into Champagne, spread consternation through the metropolis, and disturbed the members of the government. All the ministers, the distinguished deputies, and Robespierre himself, who was then apprehensive of Brissot, assembled at the House of Danton, who alone retaining his courage, seized in a manner all power, dictated the measures of defence which were then taken, and prevented the assembly from removing to the other side of the Loire. At this time began that inveterate hatred which Robespierre nourished against him, who never forgave the ascendancy Danton had then exercised, and cunning at last triumphed over hardihood. The department of Paris having elected Danton to the Convention, he proposed at the very first meeting, that all property should be secured by a decree; he had a law passed, declaring all citizens admissible to the office of judge, and he reproached the old magistracy with its servility and attachment to monarchy.

On the 25th of September, the Girondins gave warning that the department of Paris, to which he belonged, was brooding on a scheme for a dictatorship. This accusation took its rise from the papers of Marat; the charge was repelled with vehemence by Danton, who condemned Marat, representing him as the would-be king of the republican party, and by his means, the punishment of death was awarded against all who should attempt to scatter dissention, or establish tyranny in France. About the end of October he became one of the revolutionary committee. On his return from a mission to in their last moments."—Religion was now again the order of the day in the National Convention.

On the 30th of May, Barrere brought forward the infamous decree for allowing no quarter to the English or Hanoverian troops: but the French officers and soldiery unanimously refused to carry this abominable mandate into execution; and the commander-in-chief of the British forces, on this occasion, to his lasting honour, declared, by a public proclamation, his unalterable resolution not to imitate this horrid barbarity.

A grand festival was, a few days afterwards (June 8,) observed in honour of the Supreme Being! The president of the Convention, from the midst of a spacious amphitheatre adorned with festoons and garlands, made an oration to the immense surrounding multitude, exhorting them to adore the great Author of Nature. During the performance of a solemn symphony, he descended from the tribune, armed with the torch of truth; and approached a hideous monster representing Atheism, which, on being touched by the torch, instantly vanished, and the resplendent figure of Wisdom occupied its place.

Scarcely had Robespierre reached the summit of power, when the basis on which it stood seemed to totter under him. On the 10th of June, Bourdon de l'Oise, a member of the Conventional Assembly, demanded that the decree which affirmed the inviolability of the national representatives should be again established; and that no member should be brought before the Revolutionary Tribunal but in consequence of a decree of accusation passed by the assembly itself, instead of an order from the Committee of Safety, where Robespierre, and the vile instruments of his horrible tyranny, Couthon and St. Just, bore absolute sway. This was carried before the tyrant could recover from his surprise. From this time the party formed against him rapidly increased, and even his celebrated colleague, Barrere, took a secret, though efficient, part in plotting his overthrow. That Robespierre meditated the speedy destruction of all those whom he now regarded as his enemies was manifest; and it was rumoured that he meant at the same time openly to assume the office of Dictator of the Republic. On the 25th of July, he delivered an oration in the Convention, in which he plainly indicated his future project. "What a terrible use (said he) have our enemies made of a word which at Rome was applied only to a public function." The speech was heard with symptoms of contempt; many things in it were contested; and it was evident that his influence in the Convention was lost. This was the critical moment. The armed force of Paris, under Henriot, was still at his devotion; but his resolution, and even his sagacity, seemed to fail him; his popularity was evidently declining, Holland, where he, with Lacroix, of Eure and Loi, had occasioned the most violent tumults, he voted for the king's death, brought on the war with Spain, and strove to appease the contentions of the Jacobins and Girondins. On the 25th of July, 1793, he was chosen president, and on the 1st of August, proposed to erect the committee of public safety into a provisional government; and in that capacity he obtained a decree ordaining public education and national establishments, where the children should be gratuitously taught, fed, and lodged. On the 26th of November, the festivals called those of Reason, at which the Hebertists presided, induced him to declaim against the unseasonable attacks made on the ministers of divine worship, and even proposed to consecrate a day to the Supreme Being; "for" said he, "we did not strive to annihilate superstition for the sake of establishing the reign of atheism." After the death of Hebert, the hatred which subsisted between Robespierre and Danton, was converted into open war. Danton was desirous of overturning that despotism which Robespierre exercised over the committee, and Robespierre, with more address, sought to destroy Danton, in order to free himself from his rival. At this trial before the revolutionary tribunal, when asked the usual question, respecting his name and residence, he replied, "My residence will soon be a nonentity, but my name will live for ever in the Pantheon of history!" To the president who reproached him with his boldness, he said, "Individual boldness, is doubtless reprehensible; but national boldness, of which I have given so many examples, is allowable and even necessary, and I glory in possessing it!" Conviction of course followed his trial, and on his return to the Conciergerie, he exclaimed, "It is the anniversary of the day on which I caused the institution of the revolutionary tribunal, for which I implore pardon of God and men! I leave every thing in dreadful confusion: there is not one among them that understands any thing of government. After all, they are all such brethren as Cain; Brissot would have had me guillotined, even as Robespierre has me guillotined." When somewhat recovered from his first paroxysms, he ascended the fatal cart with resolution, and without resistance. One thought, one feeling turned towards his family, and affected him for a moment. "Oh, my wife, my best beloved," cried he, "I shall see thee no more!" Suddenly breaking short, however, he exclaimed, "Danton, no weakness!" and immediately ascending the scaffold, met his fate.

the prevailing party in France. But the King expressed his conviction, that no established government, or independent state, could, under the present circumstances, derive real security from such negociations; and that they could not be attempted by this country, without sacrificing both her honour and her safety to an enemy, whose chief animosity was avowedly directed against her. The acquired sovereignty of Corsica, the treaty recently concluded with America,* and the approaching marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Princess Caroline of Brunswick, were the other objects recommended by his Majesty to the attention of Parliament.

In seconding the address, Earl Camden, in the Peers, drew a contrast between the situation of France and this country; urged the necessity of a vigorous prosecution of the war; and contended that the present was the most improper season for making peace that could possibly be chosen. The Earl of Guildford, in moving an amendment, urged "the impracticability of attaining what appeared to be the present object of the war,—the dictating of a government to France." The Marquis of Lansdowne declared that he could see no difficulty in treating with France at the present period, nor could he admit the objection that there was no power existing in that country to treat with. The amendment was rejected, by a majority of 107 to 12 voices. In the Commons, the address having been moved by Mr. Knatchbull, and seconded by Mr. Canning, Mr. Wilberforce, an intimate friend of the minister, objected, that the obvious tendency of the address was to pledge the House to a prosecution of the war till there should be a counter-revolution in France. "The confederacy against France," he observed, "was now dissolved, and her internal disorders were appeased; how then could we conquer a people who had resisted with such success, when assailed by the combined forces of Europe from without, and when distracted with insurrections from within?" He was aware of the impossibility of forcing a government upon France when that country was united in opinion and in act, and, though a friend to monarchy, he did not conceive a monarchy to and the applauses of the galleries attended the speeches of his opponents, who, on their part, perceived that they had already gone too far to recede. In the sitting of July 27, Billaud Varennes complained "that the armed force of Paris was entrusted to parricidal hands. Henriot (said he) was denounced as the accomplice of Hebert. One man alone had the audacity to support him. Need I name him?—Robespierre." He then proceeded to recount his acts of blood and oppression: and accused him, without reserve, of harbouring an infamous design of making himself dictator. "In order to effect his purpose he has resolved to mutilate the Convention, to leave there only men as vile as himself, and to inflict a fatal blow on the representatives of the people. I proclaim, I proclaim the tyranny of Robespierre." Bursts of applause resounded from all parts of the Hall. Robespierre, here reddening with fury, darted towards the tribune, while a number of voices exclaimed "Down with the tyrant! Down with the tyrant!" Loaded with universal imprecations, he was not suffered to speak in his own defence; and Tallien rose to congratulate the Convention that the veil was at length withdrawn, and the real conspirators unmasked. "I move," said he, "that Henriot and all his staff be arrested. I move that our sittings be permanent until the sword of the law has secured to us this revolution. I also move that Robespierre and his creatures be immediately arrested." These motions were passed amidst tumults of applause. Barrere was now called upon to speak in the name of the Committee of Public Safety, and after proposing that the national guard resume its original organization, and that the mayor of Paris be responsible for the safety of the national representation, he joined without reserve in the invectives against the fallen tyrant. Robespierre, lost in amazement and consternation, submitted, without farther resistance, to the decree of the Convention, and was guarded by the proper officers to the prison of the Luxembourg; the governor of which, being one of his creatures, refused to receive him; upon which he was conducted to the Hotel-de-Ville. In the interim, Henriot had found means to escape, and, with the activity inspired by desperation, rallied his adherents. Dividing his forces into three bodies, he attempted at once to attack the Hotel-de-Ville, the Committee of Public Safety, and the Convention. No sooner were the representatives of the people apprised of the state of things than they declared Robespierre and his accomplices outlaws and traitors. Barras was appointed commander-in-chief: and a proclamation was issued, exhorting the people to assert their liberty, and defend the National Convention. The sections of Paris came in succession to the bar, and took an oath to acknowledge no authority but that of the Convention. The president, Collot d'Herbois, in returning thanks to them in the name of the Assembly, expressed his hope that the sun would not go down before the heads of the traitors should fall. In consequence of these measures the troops of Henriot almost universally abandoned him; and he, himself, with the remainder, took possession of the Hotel-de-Ville. Here, at two hours after midnight, they were vigorously assaulted by a determined party of the Conventional guard, headed by Bourbon de l'Oise and other commissioners of the Convention, who rushed boldly forward into the hall of the commune. The insurgents, after a short and fruitless resistance, attempted in the last agonies of wild despair to turn their arms against themselves. Robespierre, already wounded in the side by a sabre, discharged a pistol in his mouth with no greater effect than to shatter and disfigure his countenance. Le Bas shot himself dead upon the spot, and Couthon stabbed himself with a poniard. Henriot, while haranguing the populace from an upper window, was thrown down by their desire, and shockingly wounded by the violence of the fall. At six in the morning the Convention suspended its sitting. The victory being now decided, Robespierre and the rest of the criminals outlawed by the Convention were immediately conveyed to the Revolutionary Tribunal, merely for the purpose of identifying their persons, and then re-conveyed to the Palace of Justice, and, on the evening of the same day (July 28), to the number of twenty-one, executed in the Place de Revolution, amid the loudest and most universal acclamations of joy ever known. The eyes of the spectators were chiefly fixed upon Robespierre, Couthon, and Henriot, who exhibited a ghastly picture of blood, mingled with dust, and covered with wounds. Robespierre was executed last, but remained on the scaffold wholly speechless, and petrified with horror."(a)

After the fall of this tyrant, a general alteration and melioration took place in the different branches of the provisional government of France. The Jacobin Club was entirely demolished; the remains of the Girondist party, were restored to their seats in the Convention; and Dumas, president of the Revolutionary Tribunal, Fouquier Tinville, the public accuser, Carriere, conventional commissioner, the destroyer of La Vendée, and various others of the same description, lost their lives most deservedly on the scaffold. At the same time hundreds were released from the different state prisons, who, but for the death of Robespierre, would probably have fallen miserable victims to his tyranny; and the infamous decree of the Convention, for refusing quarter to the English and Hanoverian soldiery, were formally annulled.

The royalists of La Vendée and La Loire had never been completely subdued, and thousands were still sheltered in the natural recesses of that romantic country, under their leaders Charette and Stofflet. A general amnesty, however, being now published, the greater part of them laid down their arms.

* A treaty of amity and commerce, between Great Britain and America, had been signed in the month of November:—In February, 1796, a treaty of defensive alliance was concluded with Russia.

(a) Maximilian Isidore Robespierre was born at Arras, in 1759. His father, a barrister in the superior council of Artois, having ruined himself by his prodigality, left France long before the revolution, established a school for the French at Cologne, and went into England, and thence to America, where he suffered his friends to be ignorant of his existence. His mother, the daughter of a brewer, soon died, leaving her son only nine years old; and a brother who shared his fate. The Bishop of Arras, M. De Conzie, contributed to send Robespierre to the college of Louis le Grand, where he got him admitted upon the foundation. The political troubles of 1788 heated his imagination; he was soon remarked in the revolutionary meetings in 1789, and the tiers état of the province of Artois afterwards appointed him one of their deputies to the states-general. In 1790, he continued to gain power with the clubs, while he was despised in the assembly. On the 30th of May, 1791, he declared in favour of the abolition of the punishment of death; and this man, who, but a few months afterwards, caused rivers of blood to flow, maintained that this punishment could have been invented only by tyrants. Having connected himself with Danton and Marat, he made use of the impetuosity of the latter, without fearing to find a rival in him; and though he dreaded the ascendancy of the former, he supported himself by his character and revolutionary forms, as long as he had other enemies to combat. On the 30th of November, 1792, he demanded that "the last tyrant of France (Louis XVI.) should be tried without delay, that the punishment due to his crimes might be adjudged to him;" and on the 10th of April, he moved that the Queen, the Duke of Orleans, Sillery, Guadet, Gensonne, and Brissot, should be sent before the revolutionary tribunal. Danton, whose energy had been so useful to him, had helped to sweep away the other factions before him: the two parties, of which they were the heads, then alone remained, and it was necessary that one or the other should sink. After having in a manner shared his power with him, he had taken care to deprive him of his popularity by sending him to enrich himself in Holland; and afterwards a week was sufficient to have Danton arrested, accused, and sent to the scaffold. A storm was however gradually gathering in silence. Whilst he was in the anti-chamber of the committee, a slight dressing was put upon his wound; when wishing to wipe away the blood, with which his mouth was filled, he was presented with a cloth already moist with blood; this he pushed away, on which one of his attendants addressing him, said, "It is blood, it is what thou likest." On requesting that pen and ink might be brought him, his goaler said, "What dost thou want with it? Is it to write to thy Maker? Thou wilt see him without delay!" On his way to execution, the mob stopped him before the house where he lived; some women danced before the cart, and one of them cried out to him, "Thy execution intoxicates me with joy! Descend to hell, with the curses of all wives and of all mothers!" The executioner, when about to put him to death, tore the dressing off his wound; he uttered a horrible cry; his under jaw separated from the upper; and his head presented a most hideous spectacle. He died at the age of 35. The following epitaph was written for him: "Passenger, lament not his fate, for, were he living, thou wouldst be dead."

be the fittest form of government for France, in present circumstances, as the current of prejudice set so strongly against it. He did not think this country would be at all debased by a declaration for peace: true magnanimity consisted in acting with propriety under every circumstance, resolutely determined to change the mode of conduct whenever it is required by an alteration in the state of affairs. Mr. Wilberforce concluded by moving an amendment to the address, embracing the principal topics contained in his speech. Several gentlemen having spoken in support of the amendment, Mr. Pitt rose under visible emotion, and expressed his astonishment at the language of those members who, after voting for the war, had now become the advocates of peace. Neither the speech nor the address, he affirmed, "pledged the House never to make peace with the republican government of France, though he had no idea of a secure peace till the return of the monarchy. The recent change which had taken place in France was a change merely in the name and not in substance, and the present government no more deserved the name of moderate than that under Brissot, which had provoked this country to war. Peace, could it be obtained, would not place us in a situation of confidence; we must, on the contrary, increase our precautions. Even if disposed to peace, the French rulers would be compelled by fear to give their troops new employment. If we dissolved the continental confederacy we could not again hope to see it restored, and we should then be exposed alone to the fury of France. In conclusion, Mr. Pitt entered into a variety of details, to shew that the French finances were in the very gulf of bankruptcy, and that the expenditure of the government, since the revolution, had amounted to three hundred and twenty millions. After an unusually long debate, the amendment was rejected, by 246 against 75.—This subject was frequently resumed during the session, on various motions by Earl Stanhope, Mr. Grey, the Duke of Bedford, and Mr. Wilberforce, all deprecating the idea of interfering in the government of other countries, and recommending the British government not to object to proposals for a general pacification, on account of the present circumstances of France; but these motions were in succession strenuously opposed by ministers, and ultimately lost by large majorities.

On the 5th of January, 1795, the Attorney-General moved for a renewal of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act. This occasioned a very warm debate, which was closed by a division of the House against the repeal; the numbers being 230 to 53. The bill for the renewal of the act, being transmitted to the House of Lords, passed that assembly also, but not without a protest against it, signed by the Dukes of Norfolk and Bedford, and the Earls of Lauderdale and Guildford.

On the 4th of February, Mr. Pitt delivered to the House of Commons a message from his Majesty, intimating that a loan to the amount of 4,600,000*l.* would be wanted to aid the exertions of the Emperor of Germany during the next campaign, on the credit of his hereditary dominions, which would probably require the guarantee of the British government. The address, in answer to this message, was agreed to, by a very large majority.

On the 23d of the same month, Mr. Pitt submitted his annual statement of supplies to the consideration of the House. The number of men voted for the service of the year was, one hundred and fifty thousand landmen, including militia; and one hundred thousand seamen; and the loan proposed was eighteen millions, being the largest sum ever voted by Parliament up to that period.

Mr. Fox, availing himself of the recent defection of Mr. Wilberforce, and a number of his friends, from the court party, moved, on the 24th of March, "that the House of Commons should resolve itself into a committee, to enquire into the state of the nation." This motion was rejected, by 219 against 63.

The affairs of Ireland formed one of the most important subjects that engaged the attention of the present Parliament. Earl Fitzwilliam, a nobleman distinguished for his mild and conciliatory conduct, had been placed at the head of the government. This appointment was peculiarly acceptable to the Irish nation. The Parliament of the sister kingdom assembled on the 22d of January, 1795, and after voting to the new viceroy an address, expressive of the general satisfaction, agreed, without hesitation, to the most ample supplies ever granted in that kingdom. The Lord-Lieutenant, finding it impracticable to defer deciding on the demands of the Catholics for the removal of the remaining disabilities under which they still continued to labour, employed, in his transactions with the leading members of that body, the celebrated Mr. Grattan, a statesman in whom the Catholics universally confided. A bill for the further relief of the Catholics was consequently introduced into the Irish Parliament, and the utmost joy was diffused through the country, in the expectation of this enlarged toleration; but, two days after the favourable reception of Mr. Grattan's motion, intelligence arrived in Dublin that the British ministry avowed themselves adverse to the measure of emancipation. The Lord-Lieutenant, after holding the government only three months, was displaced, and Lord Camden appointed in his stead. On the 24th of April, Earl Fitzwilliam appeared in the English House of Peers, and challenged ministers to a full investigation of the nature of his instructions, and the cause of his removal; and, a profound silence ensuing on the other side of the House, the Duke of Norfolk gave notice of a motion to address the King, that those parts of the correspondence between Earl Fitzwilliam and the ministry, which related to his Lordship's recall from his government in Ireland, should be forthwith laid before their Lordships. This motion was debated in a full House, on the 8th of May, being supported by the Duke of Leeds, Earl Moira, and Earl Fitzwilliam himself, who positively avowed that he went out expressly authorised to complete the measure of Catholic emancipation, and that no objections had been made to the steps he had adopted for that purpose, until he had proceeded to the dismission of certain persons in office inimical to that measure, and had taken other gentlemen into his favour and confidence. Lord Grenville declined entering into a formal discussion of the subject, from reasons of state which he could not with propriety explain. The motion, he observed, called upon ministers to violate the secrets of the cabinet and the sanctity of their oaths; but he asked in what respect the situation of a Lord-Lieutenant differed from that of any other minister of the crown, who might be removed at pleasure? His Lordship said, he had witnessed the removal of many Lord-Lieutenants, without a single complaint to Parliament on the subject, and to adopt a new course would be to change the constitution, and to convert the House of Parliament into a committee of public safety. After a long and vigorous debate, the House divided—contents, 25; non-contents, 100. A similar motion in the House of Commons, moved by Mr. Jekyll, and seconded by Mr. Fox, was lost by a majority of 188 to 49.

About this time, an event of great national importance took place, in the marriage of the heir-apparent. His royal highness espoused his royal father's niece, Princess Caroline, daughter of the Duke of Brunswick and the Duchess Augusta of England, and Lord Malmsbury was employed to conduct the royal bride from her father's court. On her arrival in England she was received with every mark of distinction due to her royal birth and illustrious alliance. Having arrived at St. James's, the people, with the ardent eagerness of spontaneous loyalty, received the fair stranger with long-continued shouts of congratulation. On the 8th of April, the marriage of their royal highnesses took place in the chapel royal, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the nuptials were celebrated with a magnificence suitable to the rank of the illustrious parties.

A message from his Majesty to the Commons (April 27) announced the marriage of the Prince, and expressed the King's conviction that a suitable provision would be made for the establishment of the prince and princess.

cess. The message proceeded to state that his royal highness was under pecuniary incumbrances, and recommended to Parliament the gradual extinction of his debts, by applying to that purpose part of the income which should have been settled on the Prince, and appropriating to that object the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall. After some discussion, the House, on the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, determined, that one hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds, together with thirteen thousand pounds arising from the duchy of Cornwall, should be settled upon the Prince, of which seventy-eight thousand pounds should be applied annually to the liquidation of his debts, which amounted at this period to upwards of six hundred thousand pounds, and that a law should be passed to prevent the heir-apparent in future from being involved in similar difficulties. These propositions met the concurrence of the house, and a jointure of fifty thousand pounds per annum was settled upon the Princess of Wales, in the event of her surviving his royal highness.

Parliament was prorogued on the 27th of June, by a speech from the throne, which breathed the air of pacification; and his majesty was graciously pleased to declare it impossible to contemplate the internal situation of the enemy with whom we were contending, without indulging a hope that the present circumstances of France might, in their effects, hasten the return of such a state of order and regular government as might be capable of maintaining the accustomed relations of peace and amity.*

In the early part of the present year, a spirit of discontent pervaded the country, and petitions for peace from London, York, Norwich, Hull, Manchester &c. were presented; but these petitions were not sufficiently general to produce any material impression, and their influence was counteracted by counter-petitions, expressive of a confident reliance in the wisdom of government, and in their readiness to enter upon negociations for peace whenever the proper period should arrive. In the month of July, however, some serious riots, which continued for several days, took place in Westminster, arising out of the excesses committed in several crimping houses in that city; and the mob, which evinced a marked aversion to the prime minister, repaired to his house in Downing-street, where they broke the windows, and were proceeding to further excesses; but Mr. Pitt escaped by the Park gate, into the Horse Guards, and the presence of a body of military soon restored the public tranquillity.†

In the autumn of this year, great apprehensions were excited, by large assemblages of the populace, convened by the Corresponding Society, which still continued its meetings; and on the 26th of October, not less than 40,000 persons assembled in a field at Chalk Farm, near Copenhagen House, for the purpose of voting a number of resolutions, expressive of their views of the measures of government, and a petition, praying that the "bill recently introduced into the House, for the restriction, or rather the utter prevention of popular assemblies, for the purpose of political investigation, might be dismissed with that marked disapprobation it so justly deserved." To the agitations produced by the conflicts of parties, was now to be added another evil still more alarming. A scarcity arising almost to famine prevailed throughout the kingdom. This scarcity was occasioned, in part at least, by an alarming deficiency in the year's crop, which had suffered extremely by incessant rains. The state of the nation, from these circumstances, appeared so critical, that it was judged expedient to assemble Parliament at an earlier period than usual.

On the day fixed for the meeting of Parliament, (October 29), an unusual concourse of people assembled in the park, and as his Majesty passed to the House, violent exclamations were heard of—"Peace! Peace! Bread! No Pitt! No War!" and the clamour gradually increasing, stones began to be thrown at the royal carriage, as it proceeded through the streets of Westminster; and from a house in Margaret-street, near the Abbey, a bullet was supposed to be discharged from an air gun, as no noise was heard, though something passed through the glass of the coach with great force and velocity. On entering the House of Peers, his Majesty, in some perturbation, addressing the Lord-Chancellor, said, "My Lord, I have been shot at." The rage of the misguided populace was not yet exhausted; for on his return from the House, the King was again assailed in the park, and to such a pitch of audacity did the mob carry their resentment, that one party of them attacked and nearly demolished the state carriage as it returned empty from St. James's, while another party attempted to stop the private carriage of the King, in which he had seated himself for the purpose of joining his family at the Queen's house, and even to force open the carriage doors. In this last attack, the King, for the moment, seemed to lose his characteristic firmness, and was evidently struck with amazement and consternation; but upon the arrival at so critical a moment of a party of the life-guards, the populace were dispersed, and the King, with great difficulty, and even danger, reached the Queen's house. So gross an outrage as this had never been offered to any other monarch of Great Britain since the days of Charles I. and the conduct of the mob excited the deep and universal execration of all orders of persons throughout the nation. A proclamation was immediately issued, offering a reward of one thousand pounds, to be paid on conviction of any person concerned in this daring and criminal assault; but no one who had been guilty of any actual violence was ever discovered. Kidd Wake, a journeyman printer, was indeed found to have been among the hissers and disturbers of the King's peace, of which crime he was convicted, and sentenced to five years' solitary confinement in the penitentiary-house at Gloucester, and to stand in the pillory; but no other person was brought to punishment.

The outrage committed upon the sovereign, excited, as might be supposed, great consternation in the House of Lords. As soon as the King withdrew, the ministers had a short consultation, as to the proper mode of proceeding on so extraordinary an occasion. It was at length determined to postpone the consideration of the speech from the throne to the following day; and immediately to form the House into a committee of privileges. This being done, Lord Grenville apprised the Peers of the attack which the King had sustained on his way to the House, from persons who, forgetting the respect and reverence due to their sovereign, had dared to violate

* The affairs of Ireland wore a most portentous aspect at this period; the recal of Earl Fitzwilliam had cast a deep gloom over the country, and the arrival of his successor in the capital, on the 31st of March, was accompanied by so marked an ebullition of popular discontent, that the intervention of the military was found necessary to maintain public tranquillity. On the 13th of April the Irish Parliament assembled, and on the 21st of that month a motion was made by Mr. Grattan for an inquiry into the state of the nation, including the reasons for the recall of Earl Fitzwilliam; but, this motion was negatived by a large majority of the same Parliament which had almost unanimously supported all the measures of the preceding administration. On the 24th, Mr. Grattan presented his memorable bill for Catholic emancipation; but on the second reading, which took place on the 4th of May, the bill was rejected by seventy-one voices.—From this period the political association, styled the society of United Irishmen, rapidly extended itself over the whole country. All the Catholics, and a large proportion of the Protestants of the kingdom, joined this community, and the leaders began to entertain dangerous designs, and to form illegal and treasonable connections with the government of France. Secret oaths of adherence to the association were administered; and agents were sent to negociate with the national convention. Acts of sedition, rapine, and murder were perpetrated by the most desperate of the lawless and licentious populace; while, on the other hand, the violent supporters of the system of exclusion confederated together for the purposes of security, under the name of Orangemen, in societies styled Orange Lodges. Mutual injuries soon engendered a most inveterate hatred between these two descriptions of men, one of which was beyond comparison superior in number, and the other in property, in legal authority, and military force; and these dissensions rapidly increased, till the whole land exhibited a scene of terror, consternation, and blood.

† During this period of alarm and agitation, Higgins, Smith, and Le Maitre, the persons accused of a conspiracy to take away the life of the King, by shooting at him a poisoned dart through a tube, were again apprehended, and with one Crossfield, a surgeon, who had been for some time a prisoner in the town of Brest, were put upon their trial for imagining the death of the sovereign; but after a full investigation of the case, they were all pronounced not guilty.

violate the privileges of Parliament, to disregard its dignity, insult its honour, and to set the laws of their country at defiance. The Earl of Westmoreland, who, as Master of the Horse, and Lord Onslow, who, as Lord of the Bedchamber in waiting, had attended the King, then stated to the House the particulars of the transaction as they had come within their knowledge. Some witnesses were next examined, who gave an account similar to that above stated, with some additions. It was proved, that, after the royal carriage had passed the gateway at the Horse Guards, there were frequent exclamations of "Down with George!—No King" and many stones were thrown at the coach by the mob; and it was also stated, by one of the King's footmen, that when the ball, or whatever it was, which perforated the glass, whizzed by him, he saw a window open in a house in the direction whence it proceeded. When all the facts had been thus established, a conference was proposed with the Commons, and a joint address was presented to the King, in which the two Houses avowed their indignation and abhorrence, at the daring outrage which had been offered to his Majesty, on his passage to and from Parliament, declared that they could not reflect, without the utmost concern, that there should be found within his dominions, any persons so insensible of the happiness which all his subjects derived from his just and mild government, and of the virtues which so eminently distinguished the royal character, as to be capable of such flagitious acts; and they expressed their earnest wishes, in which they were confident they should be joined by all descriptions of his Majesty's subjects, that he would be pleased to direct the most effectual measures to be taken, without delay, for discovering the authors and abettors of crimes so atrocious.

In compliance with the wishes of the two Houses, a proclamation was immediately issued, offering a large reward for the discovery of the authors of the outrage; and also stating, that, previously to the opening of Parliament, a meeting had been holden in the vicinity of the metropolis, at which inflammatory speeches were delivered, and divers means used to sow discontent, and to excite seditious proceedings; requiring all magistrates and other well affected subjects, to exert themselves in preventing and suppressing all unlawful meetings, and the dissemination of seditious writings.

In the speech from the throne, the King expressed his satisfaction at the improved state of public affairs; arising from the measures which had been adopted for preventing the invasion of Italy and Germany, by the French;—the crisis brought about by the prevalence of anarchy at Paris, was represented as likely to produce consequences highly important to the interests of Europe. Should that crisis terminate in any order of things compatible with the tranquillity of other countries, and affording a reasonable expectation of security and permanence in any treaty which might be concluded, the appearance of a wish to negotiate for a general peace, on just and suitable terms, would not fail to be met, by the King, with an earnest desire to give it the fullest and speediest effect. The speech notified the treaties of defensive alliance which had been concluded with the two Imperial courts, and the ratification of a commercial treaty with America.

Mr. Fox moved an amendment to the address, which had been proposed by Lord Dalkeith, asserting the ability of the French government to maintain the accustomed relations of peace and amity with other nations, and praying his Majesty to give directions to his ministers, to offer such terms to the French Republic, as would be consistent with the honour of his Majesty's crown, and with the security and interests of his people. This amendment was negatived, by a large majority.

The spirit which had dictated the late excesses also appeared to his Majesty's government to call for an extension of the treason and sedition laws, and two bills were in consequence brought into Parliament; the former "for the safety and preservation of his Majesty's government against treasonable and seditious practices and attempts;" and the latter "for the more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies." The restrictions imposed by these bills upon the constitution of the country, excited hot and violent debates; but, in the month of December, they both passed into laws.*

During these stormy discussions, however, the senate was not unmindful of the critical state of the country, owing to the scarcity of corn. It appeared, from the information laid before a committee of the House appointed to inquire into this subject, that the principal failure in the late harvest had been the crop of wheat, and a bounty of twenty shillings per quarter was in consequence ordered to be paid on the importation of wheat from the Mediterranean; fifteen shillings per quarter on that from America; and five shillings per quarter on Indian corn. Bills were also introduced and passed the two Houses of Parliament for prohibiting the manufacture of starch from wheat; for prohibiting the distillation of spirits from grain; and for facilitating the cultivation of waste lands; and a considerable number of inclosure bills passed the House in the course of this session of Parliament.

On the 4th of November, Lord Arden moved that one hundred and ten thousand seamen, including eighteen thousand marines, should be voted for the service of the year 1796; and Mr. Windham, on the same occasion, proposed that two hundred and seven thousand men should be employed in the land service. These motions being carried, Mr. Pitt brought forward, on the 7th of December, a proposal to negociate a loan of eighteen millions, and stated the sum of twenty-seven millions five hundred thousand pounds to be the estimated expenses of the approaching year.

A message was delivered to the House of Commons by Mr. Pitt, on the 8th of December, announcing "the establishment of such a form of government in France as appeared capable of maintaining the relations of peace and amity, and expressive of a readiness on the part of the British government to meet any proposal for negociation on the part of the enemy, with a desire to give it the speediest effect in producing a peace." On the following day Mr. Pitt moved an address,

* The first of these bills, which was introduced into the Upper House by Lord Grenville, and which thus obtained the name of the "Grenville Act," consisted of two parts; the first made a very momentous change in the law, and an extension in the punishment of the crime of treason: it declared the commission of any offence, by deed or by words, spoken, written, or printed, or shewn in any other open manner, or in any way tending to the imprisonment, deposition, or death of the King, or his heirs and successors, a conspiracy to levy war, in order to overawe the Parliament, and to effect a change of counsels; or to instigate any foreigner or stranger, by force to invade any of the King's dominions; to be high treason, during the King's natural life, and till the end of the next session of Parliament after the demise of the crown. The second part extended the crime, and aggravated the punishment of sedition: to excite dislike and hatred to the person of the King, or to the persons of his heirs and successors, or to the government and constitution of this realm, as by laws established, by deed, by advised speech, or by words written or printed, subjected the offender for the first offence to the pains and penalties incurred by the commission of a high misdemeanor, and for the second, to the usual punishments prescribed by law, or to transportation for seven years, at the discretion of the court. By the second bill, introduced into the Commons by Mr. Pitt, on the 10th of November, and called the "Pitt Act," it was enacted that all assemblies exceeding fifty in number, and not already recognized by law, if convened for addressing the King or Parliament, with the view, or on the pretext of considering grievances, or procuring an alteration in the church or state, should be declared unlawful, and liable to dispersion by a magistrate, after reading a proclamation for that purpose, unless the assembly were collected by a public advertisement, signed by seven resident householders, and a true copy of it, subscribed by them, were left with the publisher, who, under a penalty of fifty pounds, must deliver it to any justice of the peace by whom it should be demanded. It further provided, that disobedience for more than one hour to the magistrates' order to disperse should subject any individual of a number above twelve, to the punishment of death; and even an assembly held by regular advertisement, in the same manner, and with the same risk to the disobedient, might be dispersed, if any measures, which, in the judgment of a magistrate, should be thought subversive of the constitution, or tending to excite the people to hatred or dislike, or contempt of the royal family, or of the Parliament, were proposed. And for the purpose of suppressing certain political lectures, any person opening a house for political discussions, without a licence, incurred a penalty of one hundred pounds.

thanking his Majesty for his most gracious communication. This address gave rise to a debate, in which Mr. Sheridan proposed an amendment, disclaiming the idea of considering any change of government in France as affecting the principle of negociation, and praying that a treaty might immediately be entered upon. This amendment was said to be perfectly consistent with the spirit of the message, which admitted that Great Britain might now safely treat: where then could be the objection of declaring, that she would treat with France? To this reasoning ministers observed, that it was highly proper and expedient, that the executive government should be left unfettered, and the amendment was negatived without a division.

A. D. 1796.] This year was ushered in by the birth of a princess, at present heiress to the Prince of Wales. Her Royal Highness was born on the 7th of January, and baptized Charlotte, in compliment to her august grandmother, the Queen of England.

Parliament having assembled, after the recess, Mr. Grey moved, on the 15th of February, an address to the King, praying him to communicate to the executive government of France, his readiness to meet any disposition to negociate a general peace. This motion was resisted on the same grounds as the amendment to Mr. Pitt's motion, previously moved by Mr. Sheridan, and negatived by a great majority.

On the 18th of April, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward a proposition, which was agreed to, for a second loan, to the amount of seven millions and a half, in order to take out of the market a great proportion of the paper, constituting the unfunded debt. Early in May, motions were made in both Houses, for the appointment of committees of finance, to ascertain how far the public expense had increased beyond the supplies annually granted by Parliament; but these motions were negatived, by very large majorities.

On the 10th of May, an address to the King was moved in both Houses—in the Upper House, by the Earl of Guildford, and in the Lower House by Mr. Fox. This address declared, "That the duty incumbent on Parliament no longer permitted them to dissemble their deliberate opinion, that the distress, difficulty, and peril, to which this country was then subjected, had arisen from the misconduct of the King's ministers, and was likely to exist and increase as long as the same principles, which had hitherto guided these ministers, should continue to prevail in the councils of Great Britain." Mr. Fox enlarged much on that most fatal, as he called it, of all the innumerable errors of ministers, their rushing into a ruinous and unnecessary war, instead of mediating between France and the allied powers. Had they, said he, counselled his Majesty to accept the grateful office of mediator, it would have added lustre to the national character, and placed Britain in the exalted situation of arbitress of the world.

Mr. Pitt insisted that his Majesty could not have interposed his mediation without incurring the hazard of involving himself in a war with that power which should have refused his terms. He expatiated on the danger arising to all Europe, from the revolutionary decree of the 19th of November, and the insult offered to this country in particular, in the encouragement given to the seditious and treasonable addresses presented to the Convention, by whom the bearers of them were cherished, applauded, and caressed; and while the negociations were yet pending, war was actually declared by France; that country, therefore, and not England, was the aggressor. This nation had no alternative; and after a war of more than three years—a war approved and sanctioned by that House, by repeated votes and declarations—a war justifiable on every principle of morality, and essential to the very existence of our constitution, would the House now acknowledge themselves in a delusion? Would they submit to the humiliating degradation of falsely arraigning themselves, and of passing on their own acts a sentence of condemnation? It was a war of which the necessity and policy were manifest; and if the country should at any time suffer a disastrous reverse of fortune, he would exhort them not to yield to a temporary pressure; but on the contrary, to redouble their efforts, in order to surmount their difficulties, and finally to obtain safe and honourable conditions of peace. Nor, on the other hand, if success were gained, should the prospect of obtaining more and further advantages be relinquished, by a premature readiness to make peace. These arguments were deemed conclusive, and the motions of both Mr. Fox and Lord Guildford were lost by immense majorities. The public business being now concluded, his Majesty terminated the session of Parliament on the 19th of May with a speech from the throne, expressive of the highest approbation of "the uniform wisdom, temper, and firmness, which had appeared in all their proceedings, since their first meeting in that place;" and on the following day the Parliament was dissolved by proclamation.

A. D. 1795.] Having brought the Parliament to a final close, it now becomes expedient to advert to the state of France, the conduct of the campaign,* and the naval affairs of the year 1795.

It has been already seen, that the English army, after the abandonment of Nimeguen, took the route of Arnheim and Deventer, under the command of General Sir Ralph Abercrombie. They reached the last of these places at the end of January, 1795, closely pursued by a far superior force. In their retreat they suffered incredible hardships—the partial thaws which took place obliging the soldiers to wade through torrents of mud and water. After a very short halt at Deventer, the army moved again towards the German frontier; and on the 12th of February they crossed the Ems at Rheine, much harassed by the advanced parties of the enemy. At Groningen the division commanded by Lord Cathcart was refused admittance; but after a long series of disasters, the shattered remains of this fine body of troops, supposed at their departure from England, to amount to 35,000 men, now reduced to about a fifth part of that number, reached the city of Bremen on the 27th and 28th of March; and soon afterwards they embarked on board the transports lying ready to receive them in the Elbe, for England.

The continued successes and triumphs of France, induced the grand Duke of Tuscany, brother of the Emperor, and first of all the potentates who had joined the coalition, to recognise the French republic; and through the intervention of his minister, Count Carletti, he concluded at Paris a separate treaty of peace with the convention, and resumed openly his original system of neutrality. The Regent of Sweden following the pacific policy of the grand Duke, sent the Baron de Stael to Paris to assure the French nation of the friendship entertained for them by the court of Stockholm.

The King of Prussia, having annexed two great commercial cities, Dantzic and Thorn, together with some of the most fertile provinces of Poland, to the dominions of the house of Brandenburg, next entered into a negociation with the committee of public safety, and on the 5th of April concluded a treaty of reciprocal advantage, by means of his minister, the Baron de Hardenberg, with citizen Barthelemy, the French ambassador at Basle. This was soon after followed by a treaty of peace between the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel and the French republic, under the mediation of the King of Prussia, in which it was stipulated, that the French should still continue to occupy one of his fortresses, Rheinfeldt, and that he should neither renew nor prolong the two subsidiary treaties with England.

Uninterrupted success still attended the arms of France, on the side of the Pyrennees. In the first campaign indeed, after the breaking out of the war,

* Early in the year, Lord Amherst returing from public life, his royal highness the Duke of York was appointed commander-in-chief and field-marshal general of the forces of Great Britain. The Duke of Richmond was removed from his post of master of the ordnance, in which he was succeeded by Earl, recently created Marquis, Cornwallis; and Sir William Howe was nominated, in the place of the latter nobleman, Governor and Lieutenant of the Tower of London.

the Spaniards had been victorious; but, in the second, the republicans were decidedly successful; and, no sooner had the third opened, than the French seized upon Vittoria, while General Miollis crossed the Ebro, and took possession of Miranda, in Old Castile, within one hundred and sixty miles of Madrid. The King of Spain, seized with terror at the conquests of an enemy who threatened speedily to over-run his kingdom, transmitted orders to Don Domingo d'Yriate, whom he had nominated his plenipotentiary at Basle, immediately to conclude a treaty of pacification, which was signed on the 22d of July. By this treaty, France agreed to evacuate her conquests in Spain, on his Catholic Majesty ceding to the French republic all the Spanish part of the island of St. Domingo.

Thus the contest assumed a new form, and all the governments of Europe, that of England excepted, now breathed a fervent and sincere wish for peace; even the Elector of Hanover had notified his accession to the treaty between France and Prussia; and soon after issued the most peremptory orders for the departure of all the armed emigrants.

As soon as Robespierre and his party had received the punishment due to their crimes, an entire change took place in the conduct of the civil war, in la Vendée. After some preliminary negociations in the beginning of February, Charette and the principal chiefs of his army on behalf of the Vendeans, and General Comartin on the part of the Chouans, publicly signified their intention to deliver up their arms and magazines, and to live for the future in subjection to the existing government. Conferences were opened at a farm house near Nantes, between the insurgent chiefs and the deputies from the Convention; and on the 7th of March a treaty of peace was concluded, signed and ratified at Nantes.

The hopes, however, that this peace would be permanent, were soon proved to be delusive. The republican government, on the plea of bad faith, refused to advance the sums (nearly 4,000,000*l.* sterling) stipulated by the treaty of the 7th of March, and several of the chiefs having been arrested for holding a traitorous correspondence with the English government, the country was again in arms early in June, under the command of Charette and Stofflet. The British government, however, appeared unwilling to adopt any decisive plan of operations on the French coast, and determined to let the Royalists act for themselves, with such assistance of arms and money as England could afford. Agreeably to this decision, a small armament was prepared in the month of June. It consisted of all the emigrant nobility, then in England; who had enlisted in their service, with more zeal than prudence, a number of French prisoners of war, who were Republicans in heart, and who only wanted an opportunity to return to their native country. The whole formed a body of about three thousand men, who were landed on a peninsula, in the bay of Quiberon, on the southern coast of Britanny, on the 27th of June. Here they attacked a fort defended by three thousand Republicans, which they speedily reduced; and were, in a few days joined by a body of Chouans, who increased their numbers to twelve thousand. During this time arms were distributed among the people of the country, who were favourably disposed; and sanguine expectations were entertained of being able to raise an army capable of opposing the Republicans in the field. Count D'Herville, a gallant and experienced officer, now placed himself at the head of a large body of Chouans, and made an attempt to penetrate into the country; but on the approach of a small Republican force, his followers forsook him, in the most dastardly manner, threw down their arms, and fled. In order to confine the Royalists to the contracted space of the peninsula, which they occupied, the Republicans erected three forts at the neck of it. These the Royalists resolved to attack on the night of the 15th of July. They carried two of them; but, being excessively galled by a masked battery, on their approach to the third, they were compelled to retreat; and were indebted for their safety to the seasonable fire from the British ships, which checked the victorious Republicans in their pursuit, and made them fly in their turn. The failure of this attempt produced dissentions among the Royalists, which were reported, with great exaggerations no doubt, to the Republican General, Hoche, by those French prisoners, who had been enlisted in England, and who now deserted. Through the treachery of these miscreants, Hoche obtained the watch-word of the Royalists, whose camp he surprised in the night of the 20th of July, and took or slew the greater part of them. The young Count de Sombreuil, however, at the head of a gallant body of emigrants, continued to make such a desperate resistance that Hoche was induced to enter into a capitulation with them, by which they were to be treated as prisoners of war, and their personal safety insured. All the stores, ammunition, and baggage fell into the hands of the enemy. Thus ended this abortive attempt, in which some of the best blood of ancient France was shed. Sombreuil, and his gallant associates, were, by a most scandalous breach of faith, tried, condemned, and executed as traitors. One hundred and eighty-seven Royalists, including the Bishop of Dol, and several of his clergy, who had accompanied the expedition, were murdered, in cold blood, on this occasion. The British squadron hovered on the coast for some time, and having failed in an attempt to take the island of Noirmoutier, succeeded in gaining possession of Isle Dieu, which they fortified.*

The allied powers were not in a situation to take the field

* The two parties, who had combined to overthrow the tyranny of Robespierre, soon shewed that they could not exist together; and on the 2d of March, a report was presented to the Convention, in which Barrére, Collot d'Herbois, and Billaud Varennes, were accused of having participated in the enormities of Robespierre, and after undergoing the usual form of trial, it was decreed, that they should be transported to Guiana. The proceedings against these deputies, united with the pressure of famine, which at that moment was felt with peculiar severity, occasioned an insurrection in Paris, which broke out on the 1st of April, and was not suppressed till the following day. The trial of Fouquier Tinville, and of the ex-judges and jurors of the revolutionary tribunal during the reign of terror, followed, and having been convicted, of the mal-administration of public justice, and of having perverted the law to purposes of judicial murder, Tinville, and fifteen others, were executed on the morning of the 9th of May. Another insurrection took place in Paris, on the 20th of May, when the rallying exclamation was "Bread, and the constitution of 1793." This was followed by insurrections in the departments, but they were all at length suppressed.

In the history of the internal concerns of France during the present year, no event made a more powerful impression on the sympathies of Europe, than the death of the infant son of the unfortunate Louis XVI. It was at first supposed that this child of misery, whose only crime consisted in being born to a throne, owed his death to poison; and it is at least highly probable that his death was hastened by having ardent spirits administered to him, by the unjust confinement in which he was held, and by which he was debarred from taking the air and exercise necessary to his existence. He was attacked by a fever, and death at length terminated his sufferings on the 9th of June, in the prison of the Temple, where he had been confined from the fatal autumn of 1792. Affected, perhaps, by this event, the committee of public safety proposed the exchange of his sister, the Princess, who remained a prisoner in the Temple, for the deputies Semonville and Maret, who had been delivered up to Austria, by Dumouriez: this proposal was after some delay acceded to, and the Princess once more breathed the air of liberty.

The plan of a new constitution was drawn up and presented, on the 23d of June, by a committee appointed for that purpose. After much discussion, the constitutional act was, on the 23d of August, declared complete, and referred to the primary assemblies, for their approbation. By this constitution, the legislative power was vested in two councils, chosen through the medium of the electoral assemblies,(a) the one consisting of 500, and the other of 250 members. To the former, styled the Legislative Council, belonged the proposing, to the latter, styled the Senate, or Council of Elders, the confirming of laws; and no person could be a member of the Council of Elders who had not completed his fortieth year. One third of each council was appointed to be re-chosen every year. The executive power was delegated to a directory of five members, to be partially renewed by the annual election of one member in regular rotation; the directory to be elected by the two councils—the Council of Five Hundred making out, by secret scrutiny, a list containing ten

(a) By this constitution, every man of one-and-twenty years of age, born and resident in France, who paid a direct contribution to the state, and who had not forfeited his franchise by any infamous crime, was declared to be a French citizen; these citizens formed the Primary Assemblies; and by them the Electoral Assemblies were nominated, in the proportion of one elector for two hundred citizens; it being required that each elector should be five-and-twenty years of age, and possessed of certain property.

field till the month of May; and it was not till the 7th of June, that the fortress of Luxemburg was attacked by the French troops. After its surrender, nothing seemed wanting to complete the glory of the French arms, and to secure their recent acquisitions, but the subjection of Mentz, which had now been fruitlessly besieged for several months. The Austrians, commanded by Generals Clairfait and Wurmser, maintained an uninterrupted intercourse with the garrison, from Cassel, on the opposite bank. It being at length perceived that the city could not be reduced until a perfect investment was formed, a large body of the French troops, under Jourdain, passed the Rhine at Dusseldorf, which surrendered without resistance—the Austrians retiring to a strong position on the Lahn. Another body, commanded by Pichegru, effected the passage of the river at Manheim, of which city they took immediate possession, on terms very favourable to the inhabitants. The investment of Mentz was now at last accomplished, and a confident hope was entertained of its speedy capitulation; but a division of Pichegru's army being ordered to the attack of a post necessary to prevent the junction of the forces of Clairfait and Wurmser, now marching to the relief of Mentz, were overpowered and compelled to retreat with precipitation to Manheim; and Jourdain, thus deprived of the expected co-operation of Pichegru, found his position no longer tenable. The Austrians also had taken part of his heavy artillery: Jourdain was therefore obliged to raise the siege, and he repassed the Rhine at Dusseldorf, much harassed by Clairfait in his retreat. The Austrians even pursued the enemy across the river, and beat up the quarters of the French, spreading terror over the country as far as Luxemburg. General Wurmser, on the other side, proceeded to the attack of Manheim. He immediately began a bombardment, which in a short time destroyed the principal buildings of that beautiful city, reducing it to a scene of desolation; and the garrison surrendered themselves prisoners of war.

The campaign was at length terminated by an armistice of three months.

The French navy being extremely reduced by the disasters of the war, the naval transactions of the present summer, were of comparatively slight import. In March an engagement took place in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Corsica, between the squadrons (nearly equal in force,) of the Admirals Hotham and Richery, which terminated honourably for the English. The Ca-Ira of eighty, and the Censeur of seventy-four guns struck to the English flag: on the other hand the French captured the Berwick, of seventy-four guns, on her way to join the fleet; and the Illustrious, of the same rate, being much damaged in the fight, was driven on shore, and lost near Avenza. Soon after this, another partial action took place near St. Fiorenzo, and the Alcide, a French ship of the line, struck her colours; but, from some fatal accident, blew up before she could be taken possession of by the English.*

Notwithstanding their disparity of naval force, the French, after recovering the whole of Gaudaloupe, attacked with success, the fort of Tiburon in St. Domingo, and made themselves masters of St. Eustatius. St. Lucia, after a violent and bloody conflict, was reluctantly evacuated by the Governor-General, Stewart; and Grenada, Dominique, and St. Vincent's, were preserved with great difficulty. Those whom the sword spared were taken off by the ravages of the yellow fever.

The French having acquired possession of Holland, on the 19th of January, a proclamation was issued,—containing peremptory orders to seize whatever Dutch vessels were found in the ports of Great Britain; in consequence of which, five ships of war were secured lying in Plymouth Sound, nine East Indiamen, and about sixty sail of other vessels. On the 9th of February a third proclamation was published, authorising the capture of all Dutch ships and property; and letters of marque and reprisal were also, after an interval of some months, granted; so that war against Holland was virtually declared: and, before the end of the summer, the famous settlement of the Cape of Good Hope surrendered to Vice-Admiral Elphinstone almost without resistance. In the course of the year, also, divers of the Dutch East Indian colonies fell into the hands of the English: amongst the rest, in August, Trincomalé; and soon afterwards, Columbo, and the other Dutch settlements in the Isle of Ceylon. In October following, times the number of the members of the directory, from which the Council of Elders selects, by secret scrutiny, the proposed number. The judicial power to reside in judges of departments and districts, chosen by the Electoral Assemblies; and a high tribunal of appeal, and cassation or annulment, established by the same mode of election, for the whole kingdom. The directory, however, was not invested with the power of assembling or proroguing the legislative bodies; and the executive authority was much weakened by being committed to five persons, between whom differences and divisions might be expected to arise. On this constitution two decrees were engrafted, which in their consequences plunged the metropolis of France into another of those scenes of horror that had so often been exhibited during the revolution: by the first of these decrees, passed on the 5th Fructidor, (August 22d) it was enacted, that the elective bodies should, in appointing the deputies to the legislative body, choose two-thirds from among the members of the present convention; and by the second, that in default of such election, the convention should fill up the vacancies themselves. The forty-eight sections of Paris, while they unanimously accepted the constitutional act, firmly rejected the law for the re-election of the two-thirds. The majority of the primary assemblies throughout the country, to whom both the constitution and the decrees were submitted at the same time, accepted them both, but not without violent opposition. Such, however, was the determined resistance of the sections of Paris, that they soon proceeded to acts of open hostility; and, in the dead of the night of October the 4th, the cry of "To Arms! To Arms! Liberty or Death!" once more reverberated through the streets of the metropolis; and at the dawn of day, the sections having drawn out their forces, marched them to the hall of the convention, and a sanguinary battle took place in the streets. The command of the troops was confided on this occasion to Barras, by the convention; and the different avenues of the Thuilleries being planted with cannon, great slaughter was made among the insurgents, who repeatedly rallied, and returned to the charge with incredible obstinacy; but being overpowered, they were, at the close of the day, and not till then, driven by the conventional troops from all their posts, with the loss of about eight hundred men; and the convention now triumphant, declared the majority of votes in the departments in favour of the law of Fructidor. The labours of the convention were now drawing to a close: and on the 30th of September, they solemnly decreed the incorporation of all the countries which the house of Austria, previously to the war, had possessed on the French side of the Rhine, with the republic of France. The last act of the convention, was passed on the 27th of October, when it was decreed, that the punishment of death should be abolished at the peace, and a general amnesty granted; and the president then rising, said—"The Convention is dissolved!" The members of the new legislature having formed themselves into two councils, according to the constitutional act, proceeded to the choice of the directory, and the election fell upon men not distinguished as favourites of the people, but most of whom bore characters free from reproach. At the head of the list stood Reveilliere Lepaux, a lawyer by profession, and of the Gironde party: the next was Reubel, a moderate man, of plain good sense, also an attorney. Letourneur de la Manche, an officer of engineers, and rather more attached to the Mountain than the Plain, was the third. The fourth was Barras, formerly a Viscount, a soldier by profession, and a man of pleasure in habits. Sieyes, the subtle statesman, was at first nominated as the fifth, but he saw too clearly the difficulties of the constitution; and Carnot, a member of the Committee of safety under Robespierre, but who had attended almost exclusively to the business of the military department, and of whom it was said, "That he organized victory, and rendered her permanent," filled up the number. Thus constituted, the new government, in all its departments, entered upon the active exercise of its functions, and the palace of the Luxembourg was appointed for the residence of the executive power.

* The skilful retreat of Admiral Cornwallis, with a small squadron of five ships of the line, from a far superior force, is entitled to mention. The Admiral had been for some weeks cruizing off Belleisle, where he made some valuable mercantile captures; but, on the 16th of June, standing in with the land near the Penmarks, the Phaeton frigate made a signal for an enemy's fleet, consisting of thirteen line-of-battle ships. At nine the next morning the French began the attack, which was vigorously repelled by the English, who kept up a running fight the whole day, without suffering the enemy to gain the least advantage. At length, by a well-timed and happy deception, signals were thrown out, by the repeating frigate, that a superior British fleet was in sight, on which the assailants thought it most prudent to sheer off. On the 23d of the same month, however, the French squadron actually fell in with a superior fleet, under Lord Bridport, off Port l'Orient. The engagement began early in the morning, and lasted till three in the afternoon, by which time three capital ships had struck their colours. The rest of the squadron, keeping close in shore, escaped into L'Orient. On the other hand, the French made, in the month of October, a capture of thirty merchantmen from the Mediterranean and Levant, with a ship of the line, constituting part of the convoy.

Whilst France, on one hand, was spreading misery and desolation around her, Russia, on the other, was no less active in destroying the liberty, and shedding the blood, of the unfortunate Poles. The Empress Catherine, persisting in her plan of being effective sovereign of the country, and of making her will the law of an independent state, instructed her ambassador, a Baron Ingelstrohm, to insult the King, and to controul the proceedings of the Diet, by the presence of an armed force. Under such auspices, the unhappy Poles were compelled to repeal all those laws, and to annul all those regulations, which were the result of their deliberate reflection, and which were calculated to ensure the independence and happiness of their country. It was not possible that a people, who knew the value of freedom, and who possessed the spirit of men, could long endure a state of such intolerable bondage, without making some effort to relieve themselves from these disgraceful shackles. During these struggles, Kosciusko appeared on the public stage. He was a soldier of fortune; accustomed to revolutions; active, energetic, full of resources, and ardently attached to his native country. He had obtained from the revolutionary government of France, whither he had returned after the unsuccessful attempt to resist the Russians, when they overthrew the Polish Constitution of 1791, a considerable sum of money, with which he hastened back to Poland, and collecting a large body of people, early in 1794, attacked the Prussians and Austrians, in different quarters, gained many advantages over them, and restored the constitution which Catherine had suppressed. Fifteen thousand Russians were, at this time, in the capital; but having endeavoured, on the approach of Kosciusko, to make themselves masters of the arsenal, they were successfully opposed by the armed citizens, who, after a desperate engagement, drove them out of the city. In May, 1795, the cause of freedom appeared more likely to prosper than it had been at any period since the commencement of this unequal struggle. The Polish army amounted to nearly seventy thousand men, besides a numerous and warlike peasantry, ever ready to fly to arms, when called upon to assist their gallant countrymen. But it did not meet the views of the neighbouring powers to suffer this state of things to continue. The King of Prussia, by a base dereliction of every principle which he advanced, when he first entered into, or rather formed the confederacy against France, had, as we have seen, in the most dishonourable manner, deserted the allies, and made a separate peace with the French republic, whose armies were to be left in the possession of the Prussian territory, on the left bank of the Rhine. This act was rendered more detestable by the motive which gave rise to it; for it is clear that the Prussian monarch was induced to desist from his opposition to the regicides of France, by a desire to employ his troops against the patriots of Poland. He entered that country with a powerful army, laid siege to Cracow, which surrendered on the 15th of June, and, having collected all the Russians in the neighbourhood of Warsaw, he formed the siege of the capital, the speedy reduction of which he regarded as a matter of certainty. Kosciusko, however, strained every nerve to collect an adequate force for the frustration of his design. On the 11th of June, he approached Warsaw, forced all the Russian posts, and established himself in an advantageous position, in front of the city. Here his army received constant reinforcements, and he was enabled to throw up formidable intrenchments, from which he battered the Prussian camp. By these means the Prussians, after bombarding the city without effect, at intervals, for several weeks, were at last, reluctantly compelled to raise the siege on the 5th of September. But the triumph of the Poles was of short duration. A powerful army of Russians now entered their country under the command of Suwarrow, the celebrated conqueror of Ismael, bore down all opposition, and, after defeating six thousand Poles, under Kosciusko, and taking their General prisoner,† advanced against the capital itself. The city had a garrison of ten thousand men, under the Generals Madalinski and Dombrowski, who resolved to defend it to the last extremity. The assailants, under Suwarrow, amounted to sixty thousand; the Russian General resolved to take it by assault. The conflict was sustained with desperate courage, and unshaken resolution, for eight hours, when the Russians obtained possession of the suburb of Prague, where they committed a dreadful slaughter. The city being now rendered incapable of further resistance, a proposal was made to capitulate, but the only terms which the inflexible conqueror would consent to grant, were security of life and property, forgiveness for the past, and permission to all, who did not chuse to capitulate, to leave the place. Warsaw was delivered up to the enemy on the 19th of September; and, before the close of the year, the whole country was completely subjugated. The Polish monarchy was dissolved; its territory divided between the three neighbouring powers, Russia, Prussia, and Austria; and its sovereign degraded into a miserable stipendiary of the court of St. Petersburgh. In this instance, the three potentates, who had first, and most loudly reprobated the outrageous conduct of the French revolutionists, concurred in pursuing a similar line of conduct themselves. Without the smallest provocation, or any colourable pretext, they invaded the kingdom of an independent power, dictated laws to him in his capital, destroyed the constitution of his country, murdered his subjects for their loyalty and patriotism, and, finally, hurled him from the throne. In their condemnation of the rebels and regicides of France, these Princes pronounced their own sentence. An act of greater violence and injustice stains not the annals of guilty ambition. It has extorted the maledictions of the present age, and posterity, will receive it with execration and horror.‡

* The invasion of the Cape of Good Hope was undertaken partly with a view of preventing the French from obtaining possession of it, and partly with an intention of securing an intermediate station between Europe and the rich and numerous possessions of Great Britain in the east; and the conduct of the expedition was intrusted to Vice Admiral Sir George Keith Elphinstone and General Sir Alured Clarke. On the 14th of July a landing was effected at Simons-Town, and possession obtained of that place, which had been previously evacuated with the intention of being burnt. Major-General Craig, though entirely destitute of artillery, marched against the enemy, who was posted in great force at Mysenberg. After a long and fatiguing march, the Major-General made an unsuccessful attack upon one of the enemy's out-posts, which failed, partly from the intricacy of the roads, and partly from the timidity and ignorance of the guides. The British commanders were now reduced to a very distressing dilemma, for neither the numbers nor the energy of their adversaries seemed to diminish; and while no fair opportunity presented itself on the one hand for the army to advance, the navy on the other was unable, on account of the unfavourable season, to form a ready co-operation with the troops, by occupying Table Bay. The arrival of General Clarke, with the forces under his command, was of course looked for with intense anxiety; but such was the exigency of the situation of the British army, that it was determined, if at the expiration of six days no succour arrived, Major-General Craig should march forward under every disadvantage, to try the fortune of an attack, before the total failure of their provisions rendered a retreat unavoidable. They were however anticipated by the enemy, who on their part meditated an assault on the British camp, which in all probability would have decided the fate of this important colony. They accordingly advanced during the night of the 1st of September, with their whole strength, supported by a train of eighteen field-pieces; and considerable bodies of troops had already made their appearance—when, at this critical and important moment, the signal for a fleet, soon after succeeded by the appearance of fourteen large vessels, induced the enemy to relinquish their enterprise, and to return to their former post. This event was decisive of the conquest of the Cape, for on the morning of the 16th an officer arrived from the Dutch Governor Sluysken, in consequence of which a cessation of arms ensued, and the castle and Cape of Good Hope were surrendered to the British arms.

† This action was fought on the 10th of October. The Poles displayed great valour, and fought with great obstinacy; but they were at last compelled to yield to superior numbers. The Polish General, Poniatouski, who was stationed, with 40,000 men, to prevent any reinforcement from being sent to the Russians engaged with Kosciusko, neglected to perform his duty; and to that neglect the loss of this battle, which, notwithstanding the smallness of the numbers engaged on either side, decided the fate of Poland, was ascribed.

‡ Stanislaus Poniatowski, late King of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania, died at St. Petersburgh, February 12, 1798.

A. D. 1796.] The campaign of this year was distinguished by the most extraordinary and important events. The French Generals, Jourdan and Morean, penetrated into the heart of Germany; but were compelled to retreat, and abandoned the whole of the Imperial territory. In Italy, under the auspices of Buonaparte, the Republican arms were eminently successful. It should here be remarked, that Buonaparte, who had demanded, of his patron Barras, some reward for the zeal which he had displayed by his activity in the memorable massacre of the citizens of Paris, in the month of October, 1795, received the command of the army of Italy, on condition that he would accept, at the same time, the hand of Madame Beauharnois, who, since the death of her husband, had lived with Barras, as his mistress. This offer, which a man of honour would have rejected with indignation, Buonaparte most gratefully accepted. He accordingly married the lady, and took the command of the army, which entered the territory of the Genoese republic, in the month of April. Soon after the campaign opened, Buonaparte found himself at the head of more than 60,000 men, 45,000 of which were under his immediate command. Kellerman, who headed the army of the Alps, as it was called, had 25,000 men under him, so that the whole force of the French, in the spring of this year, amounted to 85,000 men. The Austrian army, under General Beaulieu, did not amount to 35,000 effective men, including a Neapolitan corps of about 7,000. The Piedmontese army, commanded by the Austrian General Colli, amounted to 20,000, and was employed in defending the different approaches to Piedmont; and the Duc d'Aosta was stationed in Savoy, with 15,000 men, to watch Kellerman. Hence it will appear that, to the French force of 85,000 men, the Allies had only 70,000 men to oppose. After many hard fought battles, the French armies effected the conquest of all the Austrian dominions in Italy, established the Cisalpine republic, and compelled all the other Italian states to submit to such terms of peace, as they thought fit to impose. After his triumphs on the southern side of the Alps, Buonaparte penetrated the mountainous region of the Tyrol, and advanced so near to Vienna, that the imperial capital was filled with consternation, and daily expected the approach of the enemy.*

This year the insurgents in La Vendée were entirely overcome,

* It was on the 9th of April, that hostilities were commenced, by the Imperialists, who attacked the enemy at Voltri, with a body of ten thousand men. This first operation proving successful, the Austrians advanced rapidly, in the hope of cutting off the retreat of the French troops; but Buonaparte, foreseeing this sanguine pursuit, detached a body of troops under General Massena, who, taking advantage of the night, gained the rear of the Austrian army, and drove them from the field with the loss of three thousand five hundred men. The French troops pushed forward to the banks of the Bormida, till they attained the vicinity of Millesimo, where a general engagement was fought on the 17th of April. The Generals Massena and La Harpe passing the Bormida, surrounded the left wing of the Austrian army, on which a great slaughter ensued, and General Provera, with his division, was obliged to surrender, with a loss to the Austrian army of eight thousand prisoners and thirty-two pieces of cannon. On the following day, however, General Beaulieu surprised the French, on the banks of the Bormida, and carried the village of Dego by the point of the bayonet. This success was of short duration; for Buonaparte, by a prompt and well combined movement, obliged the Austrians to abandon Dego, and the French cavalry being sent in pursuit, completed their disorder. The Piedmontese and Sardinian army retreated with precipitation, and being successively driven from the posts of Ceva, Mondovi, and Cherasco, sought refuge in Turin. The French thus become masters of the course of the Tanaro, encamped in the midst of the plains of Piedmont, and prepared to besiege its metropolis. The aged King, despairing of being succoured by the Austrians, and uncertain of the attachment of his own subjects, sent orders to General Colli, to enter into a negociation for a truce; to obtain which, he surrendered Exilles, Tortona, Coni, Alexandria, and Chateau Dauphin, as the pledges of his good faith; relinquished Savoy, in the county of Nice, for ever; and consented to the immediate demolition of the fortresses of Suza and Brunetta, on the French frontier. The aristocracy of Venice, which, thinking itself hitherto little interested in the war, had manifested a decided partiality to the house of Austria, now perceived the necessity of bending before the genius of the Gallic democracy: and in pursuance of this policy the Count de Provence, eldest brother of the late King of France, and now styled Louis XVIII. was compelled to withdraw from the Venetian territory.

Buonaparte, who had thus defeated two armies, and detached one of the Kings from the coalition against France, proceeded by forced marches, towards Placentia, and crossed the Po, on the 8th of May, with little opposition, the troops which Beaulieu had sent to oppose the passage having arrived too late to prevent it. The detachments which had advanced for this purpose, proceeded to Lodi, to which place Beaulieu had moved in the night. On the 10th of May, the Austrian rear guard, which was posted in front of the town of Lodi, and of the river Adda, was cannonaded by the advanced guard of the French, who compelled them to evacuate the town, and to retire to the opposite side of the river. A great fault was committed here, in not breaking down the bridge, after they had crossed it; but the omission, however, did not arise from negligence, but from design; for Major Malchamp, Beaulieu's son-in-law, who commanded the rear guard of the Austrians, had, as he thought, guarded the bridge so effectually that the enemy would not dare to cross it. In fact, he had placed several pieces of cannon at the end of the bridge, which served to enfilade it, while batteries, placed on the right and left, commanded it by a cross fire. Convinced of its perfect security, he would not allow it to be destroyed. He was destined, however, to perceive, and to deplore his error, when too late to correct it. As soon as the whole of the French army had reached the banks of the Adda, Buonaparte assembled his general officers, and imparted to them his resolution to storm the bridge. The plan was unanimously condemned as rash, destructive, and useless. Inflexible in his purpose, he treated their remonstrances with disdain; and, having called together a council of grenadiers, he communicated his determination to them, and, by successful appeals to their vanity, strongly aided by other persuasions, extorted their consent to his project. At the end of his speech to the grenadiers, the latter said—"Give us some brandy, and we will see what is to be done." This potent means of infusing courage into the republican troops, the good effects of which had been so often experienced, was administered in abundance, and proved much more efficacious than Buonaparte's eloquence. Four thousand grenadiers, and carabineers, formed into a solid column, approached the bridge; but no sooner had they set foot on it than a dreadful discharge of grape shot, from the Austrian guns, compelled them to fall back. Again and again they returned to the charge, fortified by liquor, and insensible to danger, but again and again were they mowed down by a tremendous fire, from the short distance of a few paces. Any commander, who had the smallest regard for the lives of his men, particularly when he could have secured his object, with little or no loss, by different means, would have now abandoned this destructive conflict. But Buonaparte had no such regard; he considered his soldiers as mere automata, to move at his command; or rather as instruments, corporeally active indeed, but mentally passive, for the attainment of his objects, whatever they might be, and whose lives were not worthy the thought of a moment. He supplied the enormous deficiency, in the assailing column, occasioned by the destructive fire of the enemy, with fresh troops, and ordered another attack to be made. Six Generals placed themselves at the head of their men, whom they inflamed by their language, and animated by their example. Availing themselves of a propitious moment, when the thick smoke from the Austrian guns enveloped the bridge, as it were in darkness, and effectually obscured them from the sight of their enemy, they rushed impetuously forwards, reached the opposite extremity of the bridge, before they were perceived by the Austrians, and, consequently, escaped their fire. They then seized the guns, while the remainder of the army passed over the bridge without opposition; and the Austrians, unable to contend against such superior numbers, abandoned their ground, and began their retreat. They were protected by the Neapolitan cavalry, who greatly distinguished themselves on this occasion. The success of this action by no means justified the attempt; nor is the smallest credit due to Buonaparte, either for his skill or his judgment, in directing and arranging the plan of the attack. He acted in direct contradiction to the general opinion of his officers; and took a severe responsibility upon himself. Nor was the weight of this at all diminished, nor ought the effects of it to have been at all averted, by the final accomplishment of his plan. It is the duty of a commander so to execute his projects, as to expose his troops to the least possible danger, and to incur the least possible loss. And, if two modes of obtaining an object present themselves, by one of which five hundred men only are likely to be sacrificed, and by the other of which five thousand form the probable amount of the loss to be sustained, the commander, who prefers the latter to the former, is as much guilty of the murder of four thousand five hundred men as if he signed the order for their execution. Now, it is certain that Buonaparte might have passed the Adda with as little loss as he incurred in the passage of the Po; there was no more necessity for his crossing the one river at Lodi, than there was for his crossing the other at Valenza. At Valenza, he found the Austrians prepared to receive him, and he wisely desisted from his purpose, and gained his point at a different place, with little or no opposition; and, consequently with little loss. At the bridge of Lodi, the Austrians were more advantageously posted; and the passage could not be effected without a certainty of immense loss. There was every motive for adopting a similar line of conduct, and the same facility subsisted for crossing the river at a different part. Yet, did he pursue totally a different course; and utterly regardless of the dreadful sacrifice which he was about to make, without the smallest necessity to call for, or to justify it, he obstinately persisted in his destructive project. He shewed himself, therefore, woefully deficient in the first qualities of an able commander; and had nothing, indeed, to boast of, but obstinacy and decision. The French officers and troops certainly displayed, on this occasion, the most intrepid courage; but the praise so profusely bestowed on their commander, for his personal prowess, does not appear to have truth for its basis. It is not probable, that Buonaparte should place himself at the head of the first column which attacked the bridge, he would ill indeed have discharged his duty as commander-in-chief, if he had exposed himself to unnecessary danger, in such a situation. Nor overcome, and the contest in those departments was brought to a close.*

The conquests of the French in Europe, did not prevent the English from persevering in their intention to capture all their remaining colonies, as well as those of their allies, between the tropics; and they were now enabled, by their strength, to obtain successes in that quarter unknown in any former period of the war. The mortality which had occurred among our troops in the West Indies, and the alarming accounts that were received

Nor is it more probable, that he was one of the six Generals who led the final attack. There is reason to think that he did not pass the bridge till the Austrian guns had been secured; and he had not much opportunity afterwards for the display of his courage. In his letter, to the Directory, Buonaparte stated the loss of the Austrians to amount to 2500 men, of which 1000 were prisoners; while, with the most profligate contempt of truth, he reduced his own to four hundred. Indeed, not the smallest reliance can be placed on any one of this man's reports; but never did he exhibit a more glaring proof of their falsehood, than at present. By no one, but himself, was his loss at the bridge of Lodi ever estimated at less than four thousand; and it has even been carried by some, who had an opportunity for personal observation, as high as seven thousand.

Having defeated the principal army of the imperialists, Buonaparte, after taking Pavia, proceeded to Milan, and before the end of May, subdued the principal part of Lombardy.

On the 28th of June, a detachment of French troops took possession of Leghorn, though belonging to a neutral power, on pretext of dislodging the English; the whole of whose property found in that city was confiscated to the use of the republic. The factory, however, had the address to remove the greater part of their effects to the Isle of Elba.

During these operations, the main army of the French entered the territory of the ecclesiastical states, and took possession of the cities of Bologna, Urbino, and Ferrara. Alarmed in the highest degree at the advance of an enemy, now become formidable to all Italy, both the Pope and the King of Naples sued for an armistice, which was granted to his Sicilian Majesty, on the easy condition of withdrawing all assistance from the allied army; but the Pope was obliged not merely to cede to the French the towns already in their possession, but to add to their number the city and fortress of Ancona, on the Adriatic, together with a contribution of twenty-one millions of francs by instalments, and a present of one hundred pictures, statues, busts, and vases, to be selected by competent judges of the arts from the galleries at Rome, to adorn the museums of France.

The whole country south of the Po, Genoa excepted, now in possession of the French, appointed delegates, to the number of one hundred, to meet in convention at the city of Modena; the ducal government being previously dissolved, and the Duke of Modena himself having abandoned his territory, and virtually abdicated his sovereignty. The convention met on the 16th of October, and immediately decreed, that there should be a sincere and indissoluble union between the states of Bologna, Reggio, Modena, and Ferrara—the new federation taking, from its geographical situation, the name of the Cispadane republic; and with the approbation of the French General, a delegation was sent to Milan, styled by analogy the Transpadane republic, for the purpose of establishing between the two states the bonds of political union and fraternity. In return, the administrators of the political government of Milan were permitted to send deputies to the general congress, now removed to Reggio, and which, about the close of the year, resolved themselves into a republic, one and indivisible, on the model of France.

Buonaparte followed Beaulieu to Borghetta, the approaches to which place he found defended by four thousand infantry, and eighteen hundred horse; but the assailants having forced the redoubts, the Austrians crossed the bridge, and cut down one of the arches. An ineffectual attempt was made by the French to re-establish the communication, and an awful pause ensued; but at length a column of grenadiers, led by General Gardanne, jumped into the river, and with the water up to their chins, and their muskets elevated above their heads, forded the river, to the astonishment of the enemy, who immediately gave way.

General Beaulieu, incompetent to withstand the enemy, resigned the command of his army, which was conferred on Field Marshal Wurmser, a warrior who, in his eightieth year, combined all the energy and ardour of youth with the experience of age. Having collected the shattered remains of Beaulieu's army, and strengthened them with large reinforcements, Marshal Wurmser crossed the Adige towards the end of July, and having carried the posts of Sala and Corona, which covered the city of Mantua, the French were obliged to raise the siege, and to evacuate their posts with considerable loss. Buonaparte suddenly withdrew his troops, and by a forced march regained possession of Brescia. He then collected his forces near the village of Castiglione, between the lake of Garda and the city of Mantua; Marshal Wurmser having likewise taken a position in the same vicinity. On the 5th of August, the two armies came in conflict, and the battle was continued for several successive days, but victory at length declared in favour of the French General; and Marshal Wurmser, after evacuating Roveredo and Trent, narrowly escaped being cut off at Bassano, and was at length obliged, on the 27th of August, to take refuge in Mantua. On this, Buonaparte resumed his former position on the Adige, and after having manifested his sanguinary disposition, by punishing an insurrection of the inhabitants of Dego with all the horrors that could be inflicted by fire and sword, sat down once more before Mantua. The Emperor immediately assembled another army, at the head of which was placed Alvinzi, a member of the aulic council. Fortune was at first favourable to the new General, who expected to be able to form a junction with the army of the Tyrol, and raise the blockade of Mantua, at the head of fifty thousand men; but his progress was intercepted by Buonaparte, who suddenly appeared in order of battle, with his left commanded by Vaubois, his right by Massena, and his centre by Augereau. Having ordered the two last Generals to advance, on the 15th of November, the out-posts of the Austrians were immediately driven in; but an obstinate resistance was experienced at Arcole, a position equally strengthened by nature and art. The French Generals Verdier, Vernes, and Lasnes, were wounded and obliged to retire, while Augereau, who had advanced with a stand of colours in his hand, was forced to withdraw from the storm of grape shot with which he and his followers were assailed. The commander-in-chief, unable to restrain his impetuosity, repaired with his staff to the front of Augereau's division, and advancing at the head of the grenadiers, ordered them to charge; he however had scarcely proceeded thirty steps, when the incessant fire of the Austrians broke down the bridge, and forced Buonaparte into a morass, whence he was with some difficulty rescued. The battle was renewed the next day, and night alone forced the combatants to separate, before victory had declared on either side. On the third morning, a combined attack was concerted and executed, by Massena on the left, and Augereau in front, while the garrison of Porto-Legnano, supported by a considerable train of artillery, received orders to make a diversion in the rear. The column that attacked the bridge was however once more repulsed, and fell back in disorder towards Ronco; but on receiving a reinforcement, the battle was again renewed, and the Austrians, seeing their left about to be turned, abandoned the field, and retired towards Vicenza.

In the mean time, the left wing of the French army had been forced by General Davidowich, who seized on the important post of Rivoli, and advanced to Castello-Nuovo, within eight leagues of Mantua; but Buonaparte, taking advantage of his late victory, ordered a body of troops under General Massena to repass the Adige, and attack the successful division, which was forced to retire behind the Arisio, on the 22d of November, while Alvinzi took refuge on the other side of the Brenta, after losing about six thousand men in killed and wounded, eighteen pieces of cannon, and four standards. Thus ended one of the most memorable campaigns recorded in history.

In Germany, an overwhelming force was directed to penetrate into the circle of Suabia, to seize on the country adjoining the lake of Constance; to march through the passes of Bregentz; and after scaling the Rhetian Alps, to enter the Tyrol; and while one body of troops, following the course of the Ram, reached the Adige, and communicated with the army of Italy; another was to traverse the vallies of the Inn, and extending itself to the borders of the Danube, in the neighbourhood of Passau, was to threaten the German capital. The conduct of Pichegru having become suspicious, the command of the French armies on the Rhine was conferred on Jourdan and Moreau. Three battles won successively, at Renchen, Rastadt, and Etlingen, threw all Germany into dismay, and not only enabled the invaders to gain possession of the passes of the Black Forest, but to invest Mentz, Manheim, Phillipsburg, and Ehrenbreitstein, at the same time. The engagement at Etlingen, where the Archduke Charles, a gallant and popular Prince, now at the head of the Austrian army, contended against Moreau in person, was long and obstinate, and when at length the Austrians were forced to retire, it was rather before the enthusiasm than the superior skill of their adversaries. In his victorious career, Moreau forced the Elector of Bavaria to sue for peace; while Jourdan, seizing on Nuremberg, Ingoldstadt, and Amberg, menaced Austria on his right, as well as Bohemia in his front. The retreat of the imperial forces in Germany was contemporary with the dreadful losses which they were sustaining from Buonaparte in Italy; but their strength, though overpowered, was not

* Stofflet, desirous to place himself at the head of a formidable party, left his haunts, and on the return of spring, proceeded from place to place, for the purpose of stimulating the lukewarm loyalty of the people. One of these excursions proved fatal. Having repaired to the village of Langreniere, with only a single domestic, and a couple of aid-de-camps, two republican officers were informed of his arrival. They suddenly entered the apartment, and seized on the person of Stofflet, a chief, who in the course of two years, had fought one hundred and fifty actions, in more than a hundred of which he had proved victorious. He was executed at Angers, on the 23d of February, and died with heroic constancy. As the war, however, could never be considered finished while Charette survived, he was incessantly pursued by the cavalry of Hoche, and on the 23d of March, the Adjutant-General of his army came up with him at Chabottier in Poitou. Although harassed with unceasing fatigue, and wounded both in the head and hand, he had strength sufficient to escape into a wood, supported by two of his faithful followers, who determined to share his fate, and actually fell dead in succession at his feet, covered with wounds. On this Travot ran up, seized the chief, and conducted him to Nantz, dressed in a short green vest and pantaloons, disfigured by blood, with his arm in a scarf, and his countenance pale, sickly, and dejected. He however beheld the preparations for his execution with an undaunted eye. He not only surveyed the soldiers drawn up to inflict upon him the punishment of death, without shrinking, but even refused to have a bandage tied across his face, and actually gave the signal for his own death. On the fall of these chiefs, all the insurgent departments readily submitted, and Hoche, who at Quiberon had acquired celebrity as a warrior, was now hailed with the appellation of pacificator of La Vendee.

ceived of the exploits and intrigues of Victor Hugues, rendered a new army absolutely necessary in that quarter. A naval force, with several regiments on board, was therefore prepared to act against the West Indian colonies of Holland; and very early in the year, Demerara, Issequibo, and Berbice, surrendered to the British commanders. A debarkation was next effected on St. Lucia; and the enemy retired to Morne Chabot, one of the strongest positions of the island, which was carried by the gallantry of a small body under General Moore. Morne Fortuné was next invested and taken; so that no choice was left to the French but to capitulate, and two thousand French soldiers were made prisoners, the insurgent negroes being all disarmed, and the island ceded to Britain. An expedition under General Knox, to St. Vincent's, undertaken on the 25th of May, was no less successful, where the French surrendered to the number of seven hundred: the dispersion of the Caribbs immediately followed, and peace was soon after restored to the settlement. An attack was afterwards made on Grenada, which succeeded with little bloodshed. A body of seven thousand troops arrived early in the spring at the Mole in St. Domingo; but the mortality of the yellow fever was so great, and the numbers of the free blacks and mulattoes so formidable, that the war was waged with few advantages on our side. Toussaint, with his negro army, and Regaud at the head of the mulattoes, maintained a fierce, though desultory warfare; and the British with difficulty retained their extensive chain of posts, occupying a coast, three hundred miles in extent.

The Dutch government, determined not to suffer the loss of the Cape of Good Hope, without a struggle to regain that important settlement, fitted out an expedition consisting of two sail of the line, three smaller ships of war, and three armed vessels, which sailing from Holland about the middle of the year, 1796, anchored on the 2d of August in the Bay of Saldanha. Just at the critical moment when General Craig, with his small army, was marching down to the coast, to meet the invaders, they perceived a British fleet of two seventy-fours, five sixty fours, a fifty gun ship, and six other vessels, advancing with a fair wind to the mouth of the harbour. The English Admiral, aware of his superiority, anchored within cannon shot of the Dutch vessels, and sent a written summons to their commander to surrender. Rear-Admiral Engelbartus Lucas, knowing that resistance must be unavailing, obeyed the summons, and on the 17th of August he surrendered his whole fleet, without firing a gun.

The progress of the republican arms on the Continent of Europe, the turbulent spirit of the inhabitants of Corsica, and the arrival of a body of French under General Cazette, to co-operate with internal revolt, rendered the possession of that island no longer possible to the British. Seizing on the heights above Bastia, the invaders captured the garrison and city. Fiorenzo, Bonifacio, and the tower of Mortella, were retaken on the 20th of October, and considerable spoils fell into the hands of the victors on the retreat of the English fleet from the adjoining bay, and on the final evacuation of the island. The island of Elba, however, which had been seized some months before, was still retained, and formed a useful arsenal, and a convenient station.

The French government, perceiving a crisis in the situation of Ireland, more favourable to the success of an invasion than any other which had occurred since the French Revolution, attempted to strike a blow of no common importance. Fifteen thousand chosen troops, under the command of Hoche, were embarked at Brest on the 15th of December; intended to act, on their arrival, with a body of the disaffected Irish, who were known to be considerable in numbers, and organized for insurrection. Admiral Villaret Joyeuse sailed from Brest, and eighteen ships of the line, besides frigates and transports, while the General embarked, with his staff, on board the frigate La Fraternité. The wind at first was favourable; but scarcely had the expedition left the outer harbour, when a storm arose which dispersed the fleet, and separating the frigate which carried Hoche, obliged him to escape into the harbour of Rochelle, after a dangerous cruize, and being chased by two British vessels. Of the whole fleet, only eight two-deckers reached the coast of Ireland, under Admiral Bouvet, who appeared off Bantry Bay, but was forced from that station in a few days by tempestuous weather, and obliged to return to France, without effecting a landing. In this expedition, the French lost three ships of the line, and three frigates, from the adverse elements; but they had the singular good fortune to escape Lord Bridport and Admiral Colpoys, the former of whom, with a British fleet under his command, arrived in Bantry Bay immediately after the departure of the enemy.

During the course of this year, the remaining commerce of France was harassed and diminished by the indefatigable exertions of the British cruisers. The English navy did not lose a single ship of any force; while upwards of seventy sail of armed vessels belonging to the enemy were either detained or captured; not broken, and it was reserved for the unsubdued resolution of the cabinet of Vienna, and the masterly skill of the brother of the sovereign, once more to arrest the hand of disaster and to turn the tide of misfortune. The Archduke Charles, having received considerable supplies, determined to throw himself between the invaders, and Ratisbon; but before the arrival of his highness, the army of Wartenslaben had fought a successful battle, and driven the French from the heights before Amberg. On the 22d of August, the Archduke arrived in person, and after defeating the enemy under Bernadotte, drove them back to Newmark. Jourdan, finding his left wing and rear thus exposed to a superior force, was driven by the impetuosity of the Austrian army, and the indignation of the peasantry, as far as Wurtzburg; here they were again overtaken, and being once more defeated, they were seized with a panic and immediately disbanded.

The disorderly conduct of the army of the Sambre and the Meuse, placed that of the Rhine and the Moselle, in the most critical position, for all the conquests of Moreau were now become useless in consequence of the defeat of Jourdan. The former, after conducting his victorious troops from the banks of the Rhine to those of the Danube and the Isere, and proving successful in no less than five pitched battles, as well as a multitude of skirmishes, was now obliged to commence his celebrated retreat. Instead of appearing disconcerted by the recent successes of the Archduke, the French General actually crossed the Danube, as if with an intention to succour his defeated colleague; but this movement was merely calculated to collect his detachments, and concentrate his strength. Having completely deceived the Austrians relative to the route he intended to take, Moreau crossed the Lech, on the 11th of September, and gave orders to cut down all the bridges behind him; he then ascended along the banks of the Danube, and stationed his head-quarters at Ulm. Finding himself closely pursued, he attacked General Latour in his camp between Biberach and Buchau, and after a long and bloody action, fought on the 1st of October, not only forced him to retire in confusion, but would have entirely destroyed his army had it not been for the gallant resistance on the part of the emigrants under the Prince de Conde, who covered the retreat of the Austrians, and saved their baggage. He now divided his army into two bodies, and marched suddenly through Munderkingen, Neudlingen, and Belengen, to attack the Generals Nauendorf and Petrasch, who were forced to abandon their respective positions. Having at length opened a communication with the forest towns, forced the passes of the Black Forest, and penetrated through the Val-d'Enfer (the Valley of Hell) the name of which sufficiently expresses the nature of the country, with his centre, he employed his two wings against the numerous detachments, led on by the Generals Latour, Petrasch, and Nauendorff.

The French army having resumed its march, the main body encamped in the neighbourhood of Fribourg on the 12th, and waited for the arrival of the rest of the troops; the moment a junction had been effected, the Archduke Charles assaulted, and with some difficulty carried the village of Kendringen; next day he attacked part of the enemy stationed at Nymbourg, but after an action that lasted from ten o'clock in the morning until dark, he was obliged to desist from his enterprise, having experienced considerable loss in consequence of the spirited resistance of General Dessaix. Moreau now abandoned the Brisgaw, and at the head of an army fatigued by the length of its march, destitute of shoes, and rendered sickly by continual rains, marched towards the banks of the Rhine; and dividing his army into two bodies, Dessaix repassed that river at Brisach, while he himself directed his course towards Huningen, continually followed and harassed by the enemy. On his arrival at Schliengen he assumed an excellent position, and notwithstanding the superior numbers of the Austrians, determined to wait the event of a battle. He was accordingly attacked along the whole of his line, but the enemy were repulsed on every side. However, Moreau moved his camp on the night of the engagement, and having passed the Rhine at Huningen without any molestation on the part of the enemy, returned to Strasburg, the point whence he set out, on the 26th of October.

By a singular union of gallantry, talents, and good fortune, the Archduke Charles had thus liberated Germany from the yoke of France; and the surrender of the fortress of Kehl, and the entrenched position at Corne, after an obstinate but fruitless resistance, freed the whole of the Austrian dominions on the eastern side of the Rhine from the presence of the invaders.

among which were five line-of-battle ships, nine of forty-four guns, and three of forty.*

Scarcely had the new government of France, under the directory, commenced its operations, when a difference arose between that country and America, originating in the treaty of amity and commerce, recently executed between Great Britain, and the United States.† Towards the close of the summer, Mr. Monro, the American Ambassador at Paris, was recalled from his embassy, to the great dissatisfaction of the French government, who refused to receive his successor, Mr. Pinkney, in the same capacity; and M. Adet, the French resident in Philadelphia, notified to the American government, on the 23d of November, that the directory had suspended him from the exercise of his functions. Such was the situation of the foreign relations of the United States in the spring of 1797, when General Washington resigned his government; and again retired to his paternal estate on the banks of the Potowmac.

In Holland, a national convention of the inhabitants of the United Provinces, met at the Hague on the 1st of March, and formed a constitution on the model of the French republic. One of the first acts of the new government, was to declare war against England.

Public tranquillity was preserved at Paris, but many of the provinces of France exhibited at this period, scenes of the most dreadful disorder.‡

Various

* On the 22d of August, Sir John Borlase Warren, with only four frigates, the Pomone, Artois, Galatea, and Anson, gallantly attacked a French squadron, consisting of one ship of forty-four guns, two of forty, one of thirty-two, and one of thirty guns, with two armed vessels, not far from the Saintes, and after dispersing their convoy, captured the Etoile, of thirty guns.—In the Mediterranean, Captain Nelson, in the Agamemnon, accompanied by the Meleager, Diadem, and Peterell, performed a brilliant exploit at Loana, on the 25th of April, having boarded and cut out four French store ships by means of the boats of his squadron, under the fire of the batteries, and amidst an incessant discharge of musquetry. He also took possession, during the month of May, of several vessels laden with cannon and ordnance stores destined for the siege of Mantua, in the neighbourhood of Oneglia, fearlessly boarding the enemy amidst the fire of three eighteen pounders stationed on shore, and a fourth mounted in a gun-boat. Towards the autumn, Admiral Duncan blockaded the Texel, to prevent the sailing of the Dutch fleet, and on the 13th of October, captured a frigate and a sloop of war belonging to that nation. Captain Williams, of the Unicorn of thirty-two guns, and Captain Martin of the Santa Margarita, a ship of equal force, pursued and took two heavy frigates of forty, and thirty-six guns, called the Thames and Tribune; the Dryad of thirty-six guns, also obtained possession of the Proserpine of thirty, twenty-six of which were eighteen-pounders, after a chase of eight hours, and a gallant action of forty-five minutes. Captain Bowen, of the Terpsichore, of thirty-two guns, also distinguished himself by the capture of the Mahonesa, a Spanish frigate of thirty-four guns, near Gibraltar: he soon after forced the Vestale, a French ship, which carried the same number of guns as his own, to strike; she, however, escaped next morning into Cadiz, and was reclaimed in vain.

One of the most gallant actions, during the whole war, was fought by Captain, now Sir Henry Trollope, in the Glatton of fifty-four guns; she had been formerly an Indiaman, and now carried carronades of a large calibre. Having, on the 16th of July, fallen in with six frigates, accompanied by a brig and a cutter, off Helvoet, this brave commander, undismayed either by the number or the force of the enemy, bore down upon and came up with them late in the evening; and, notwithstanding he was surrounded in such a manner as to be attacked at the same time on the lee-quarter, the weather-bow, and the stern, so incessant and severe was the fire of his battery, that his adversaries deemed it prudent to desist and retreat.

† This treaty was said to discover a disposition altogether inimical to France, and the provisions of it to be wholly incompatible with the idea of neutrality. By the treaty of 1778, still in force, the United States guaranteed to France the possession of their West India Colonies; but by the treaty of 1795, they consented that even supplies of provisions sent to those islands from America should be treated as illegal commerce. The directory, though it abstained from actual hostilities, regarded the Americans in the light of secret enemies, and made such depredations on their trade under various pretences as almost amounted to a commercial war; and a directorial arret was issued on the 8d of July, expressly enjoining French ships of war to observe the same conduct towards the vessels of neutral nations as they had hitherto suffered with impunity from the English. Thus began that oppressive system, by which neutral nations were doomed to be persecuted in the future progress of war, under the designation of Berlin and Milan decrees, and British Orders in Council.

‡ The jacobins, who had hitherto filled the principal places under government, were enraged at witnessing the return of moderate principles, and they manifested their hostility by exercising their power where they still remained in office, in the most cruel and oppressive manner. Against this sanguinary faction, the existing government found it necessary to declare decided hostilities, and laws were enacted to punish with death, seditious assemblies, that had for their object either the re-establishment of royalty, or assemblages of groupes that sought to destroy the present form of government. The jacobins, against whom these laws were principally directed, and whose places of assembly had been shut up by order of the government, were at length wrought up to purposes of vengeance; and for six weeks, rumours prevailed of projected insurrections, that would, if accomplished, have once more deluged the country with blood, and revived all the horrors of the early stages of the revolution. On the morning of the 10th of May, the guard of the directory and of the legislative body was tripled, the streets were patroled, and the gardens of the Luxembourg closed against the populace. On the same day, the council of five hundred received a message from the executive directory, informing them, that a horrible conspiracy was prepared to burst forth the following morning at break of day; that the design of the conspirators was to murder the executive directory, the members of the two councils, the field-officers, the constituted authorities of Paris, and to deliver up the city to pillage and massacre; that the government, informed of the place where the conspirators had assembled, had seized their persons, and they added with regret, that Drouet, one of the council, was of their number. Among the persons arrested with Drouet was Laignelot, an ex-deputy of the national convention, and a professed atheist. The others were Charles and Ricard, both members of the convention, and well known terrorists; Babeuf, once the associate of Marat, giving himself the title of "Gracchus Babeuf, the tribune of the people;" Rossignol, an ex-general of La Vendee, and Julien, the confidential agent of Robespierre. To these desperate characters were added several others of inferior note, and their mad enterprise was less a project of revolution than of extermination. The trial of the conspirators was delayed for a considerable time: Drouet effected his escape, but Babeuf and several of his associates were at length tried, convicted, and executed. Other insurrections in various parts of the country followed on the discovery of this plot, which was popularly styled the conspiracy of Floreal, but they were all quickly suppressed. The directory next determined to submit to the operation of the law the sanguinary perpetrators of the massacres of September, 1792; and a tribunal was accordingly established for that purpose. Of the great mass of criminals brought to trial, some were executed and others imprisoned, but a large majority of them were acquitted. The directory then directed their attention to the subject of finance. The rapid decline of the credit of the assignats had rendered that species of paper altogether useless; and as gold and silver had withdrawn themselves from the intercourse of trade, it was judged expedient to employ some other means to replace the debased currency. A law was accordingly passed on the 26th of March, to sell the remainder of the national domains at the estimate which was made in 1790, which was at the rate of about twenty-two years purchase; for which property the nation was to receive in payment a new paper fabrication, under the name of mandats, to be issued to the amount of four hundred millions of livres; of which, part was destined to withdraw the assignats from circulation, at the rate of thirty for one, and the public lands remaining unsold, were to be mortgaged for the remainder. Notwithstanding this security, the mandat, at its birth, lost one-fourth of its value: nor did the depreciation stop here, for in a very few months, it sunk so low as not to maintain a currency of above one-fifth of the price affixed upon it by the national treasury. In the midst of these difficulties, the committee of finance presented a report containing a general statement of the public revenue, from which it appeared, that the expenditure during the last year amounted to one thousand millions of livres, and that the ordinary annual revenue amounted to barely five hundred millions. To make up this enormous deficiency various resources were pointed out, but the principal expedient was to be found in the sale of the church lands, in the newly united provinces of the Netherlands.

Marseilles, so often during the revolution the scene of political discords, presented at this period a spectacle of horror and dismay. The jacobins, however, defeated at that place, soon after made another attempt to subvert the government at Paris, more violent, and more extravagant, than the insurrection headed by Babeuf. The camp of Grenille, a plain on the south side of the Seine, between Paris and the hills of the Meudon, still contained numbers whom the jacobin leaders considered as their adherents; and emboldened by the assurances of these soldiers, whom they had gained over to their party, they formed the desperate determination to attack the government, with the assistance of the camp. These desperadoes, to the number of five or six hundred, accordingly assembled at a tavern, at the village of Vaugirard; and though their intention of visiting the camp was no longer a secret to the government, they entered it at midnight, amidst cries of "Long live the constitution of 1793!" "Down with the councils!" "Down with the five tyrants!" Having thus proclaimed their purpose, they invited the soldiers to fraternize, to get rid of their chiefs, and to march under the banners of freedom to glory and to empire. The act of rebellion being now complete, a party of troops, appointed to that duty by the government, did not delay to execute the punishment due to the temerity of the insurgents; and the most forward of them were immediately put to the sword or shot; while the remainder, confounded and dismayed by this novel species of fraternity, fled in all directions. Numbers made their escape, but one hundred and thirty-two of them were taken prisoners, and soon after tried by a military commission. Of this number, the majority were released; but the rest having been for the most part members of the revolutionary committees, were condemned to death or banished, according to the characters they had formerly maintained. The directory now found it expedient to annul the unjust and sanguinary decrees, directed not merely against the ecclesiastical officers of the Gallican church, but also against the civil and political rights of the clergy.

About

Various had been the plans of annoyance against this country projected by the French government; but all had hitherto been delayed, or set aside as inadequate or impracticable, till it was suggested, that the most effectual mode of opposing England with advantage, was to attack her commerce, by shutting out her manufactures from every port in Europe subject to French controul, or under French influence.—This new species of hostility was carried into execution with as much dispatch as the jarring interests of the continental powers would allow, and British manufactures soon found no legal entrance into any port on the continent, from the Elbe to the Adriatic, with the exception only of the ports of the Hans Towns, of Portugal, and of Russia.

Towards the close of the year, the confederacy against France lost another of its members, in the person of Catharine II. Empress of Russia, who died on the evening of the 6th of November. This extraordinary woman terminated a life of sixty-seven years, and a reign of forty-four, in a fit of apoplexy, attended with an extravasation of blood. She was found on the morning preceding her death, stretched on the floor of her private closet, speechless and insensible. She was succeeded by her son, the Emperor Paul.

Although the war was still prosecuted between Great Britain and France with undiminished energy, the governors of both countries found it necessary to remove the impression, that the contest was as interminable in its duration, as it was indefinite in its objects; and with this view his Majesty, in his speech from the throne, at the opening of the new Parliament, on the 6th of October, 1796, declared "That he had omitted no endeavours for setting on foot negociations to restore peace to Europe; in consequence of which, a way was now opened to an immediate negociation, which must produce an honourable peace for us and our allies, or prove to what cause alone the prolongation of the war was to be ascribed." For this purpose, his Majesty said, he would "immediately send a person to Paris, with full powers to treat for this object, and it was his anxious wish that the negociation might lead to the restoration of general peace. But it was evident that nothing could so much contribute to give effect to the negociation, as a manifestation that we possessed both the determination and the resources to oppose with increased activity and energy an enemy who had openly professed a design to attempt a descent upon these kingdoms." On the propriety of entering upon a negociation with republican France, some difference of opinion existed between ministers and their supporters; and the friends of Mr. Burke, in inculcating hostility against revolutionary France, adhered to that great statesman's original opinion, that the restoration of monarchy, and the ancient orders, under certain modifications, ought to be the sole and avowed purpose of the war; that no peace could be secure until that object was effected; and that we must either conquer the revolution, or the revolution would conquer us. These sentiments were particularly adopted by Earl Fitzwilliam, and, after opposing the address on the King's speech, he entered on the journals of the House of Lords a very elaborate protest, assigning ten distinct reasons for refusing to concur in an address of approbation on his Majesty's speech announcing the opening of a negociation for peace with the French republic.

The English cabinet had in the month of March commissioned Mr. Wickham, the British ambassador to the Helvetic States, to apply to M. Barthelemi, who was then engaged in diplomatic agencies at Basle, to inquire if the government of France were disposed to enter into a negociation with his Majesty and his allies? M. Barthelemi was instructed to answer, "that the executive government of France ardently desired to procure for the republic a just, honourable, and solid peace, but an indispensible condition of any treaty entered into for that purpose was the retention of those conquests which had actually been annexed to the territory of the republic." This reply, expressing a decided resolution not to surrender the Austrian Netherlands to the Emperor of Germany, displayed, in the opinion of the British ministry, a temper so remote from any disposition for peace, that the correspondence between the two ministers ceased, and both parties proceeded to open the campaign. On the 6th of September, Lord Grenville addressed a note to Count Wedel Jarlsberg, the Danish ambassador in London, requesting that he would transmit through the Danish envoy at Paris, a declaration expressive of "his Britannic Majesty's desire to conclude a peace on just and honourable conditions, and demanding the necessary passports for a person of confidence, whom his Majesty would send to Paris with a commission to discuss with the government there, all the measures most proper to produce so desirable an end." The directory replied, "that the executive government would not receive, or answer any overture from the enemies of the French republic, transmitted through any intermediate channel; but that, if England would send persons furnished with full powers and official papers, they might, upon the frontiers, demand the passports necessary for proceeding to Paris." Passports were accordingly applied for and obtained, and Sir James Harris, the negociator, who had been lately called to the peerage, under the title of Lord Malmesbury, being nominated by his sovereign, "plenipotentiary to the French Republic," repaired to Paris, on the 22d of October. Two days after his arrival, the negociations were opened by a memorial from his Lordship, containing a proposition for reciprocal restitution. "Great Britain," says the memorial, "from the uninterrupted success of her naval war, finds herself in a situation to have no restitution to demand of France; from which, on the contrary, she has taken establishments and colonies of the highest importance, and of value almost incalculable;" but, it is added, "she is willing to restore her own conquests in lieu of the acquisitions which France has won from her allies, as a basis for a treaty, and she therefore proposes a general principle of reciprocal restitution." The executive directory replied—"that considering the British ambassador to be the agent of Great Britain only, and not understanding him to have a commission to act for the allied powers, they could not now enter into the concerns of the other states, which could tend only to multiply the combinations, and increase the difficulties of the negociation;" but they nevertheless declared, "that as soon as Lord Malmesbury should exhibit to the minister for foreign affairs, sufficient powers from the allies of Great Britain for stipulating for their respective interests, accompanied by a promise on their part, to subscribe to whatever should be concluded in their names, the executive directory would hasten to give an answer to the specific propositions which should be submitted to them, and that the difficulties should be removed as far as might be consistent with the safety and dignity of the French republic." To these observations they thought proper to add an opinion, that the British government was insincere in its overture—that its object was "to prevent by general propositions, the partial propositions of other powers, and to obtain from the people of England the means of continuing the war, by throwing the odium of a refusal to negociate a peace, upon the republic." The British minister, disdaining to reply to the offensive and injurious insinuations, thrown out by the directory, stated in reply, that he had not been commissioned to enter into a separate treaty, but that Great Britain proposed to make common cause with her allies. The directory rejoined, that in a question of reciprocal restitution, the chief object of consideration was the relative condition of the respective parties; that, of the original confederates, some were become the friends of France, and others observed a strict neutrality; that the remaining allies of Great Britain were weakened by their losses, and the desertion of their associates; and that France could not in a negociation for terms, forget the circumstances in which she was placed. Having thus admitted the principle of compensation, M. de la Croix, the French negociator, in a note to Lord Malmesbury, dated the 27th of November, again requested him to point out expressly, and without delay, the objects of reciprocal compensations which he had to propose. His Lordship was now obliged to consult his court, and the negociation was suspended till the 17th of December; on which day his Lordship submitted, in two formal and confidential memorials, the terms on which a treaty might be concluded, on the basis of mutual compensation: these terms he stated to be, "that France should restore all her conquests made in any of the dominions of the Emperor of Germany, or in Italy, and that Great Britain should render back, all her acquisitions gained from France, in the East and West Indies; that Russia and Portugal should be included in the treaty; that no obstacle would be interposed on the part of his Britannic Majesty, against Spain becoming a party to the negociation; and that in case Holland was reinstated in all respects, in the same political situation in which she stood before the war; the colonial possessions captured by Great Britain might be restored, and the status ante bellum, with respect to territorial possessions, re-established in her favour; but if, on the contrary, Holland should remain a republic, their Britannic and Imperial Majesties would be obliged to seek in territorial acquisitions, those compensations, and that security, which such a state of things would render indispensible." At the time that these memorials were delivered by Lord Malmesbury to M. de la Croix, a long, and animated conversation took place between the negociators, in the course of which the French minister inquired, whether in placing the memorials before the Directory, "he was to state the disuniting of Belgium from France, as a sine qua non from which his Majesty would not depart?" To which Lord Malmesbury replied, that "it most certainly was a sine qua non from which his Majesty would not depart: and that any proposal which would have the Netherlands annexed to France, would be attended with much greater benefit to that power, and less to the allies, than the present relative situation of the belligerent powers could entitle the French government to expect." M. de la Croix," observes Lord Malmesbury, in his report of this conversation, "repeated his concern at the peremptory way in which I made this assertion, and asked if it would admit of no modification?" "I replied, if France could, in a contre-projet, point out a practicable and adequate one, still keeping in view, that the Netherlands must not be France, or likely again to fall into the hands of France, such a proposal might certainly be taken into consideration. M. de la Croix by no means encouraged me to explain myself more fully; he repeatedly said, that this difficulty relative to the Netherlands, was one that could not be overcome." This assertion was shortly verified; for two days after the conversation, Lord Malmesbury received a letter from M. de la Croix, consisting of a literal copy of an arrette of the Directory, requiring his Lordship "to give in to him, officially, within four and twenty hours, his ultimatum, signed by himself." Lord Malmesbury replied, that to demand an ultimatum, in so peremptory a manner, before the two powers had communicated to each other their respective pretensions, was to shut the door against all negociation;" but, "he repeated that he was ready to enter into the discussion of the proposals of his court, or of any contre-projet which might be delivered to him on the part of the Executive Directory." The Directory rejoined in a note of the 19th of December, that they "would listen to no proposal contrary to the constitution, to the laws, and to the treaties which bound the republic; and as Lord Malmesbury announced at every communication, that he was in want of the opinion of his court, from which it resulted, that he acted a part merely passive in the negociation, his presence at Paris was rendered useless, and he was required "to depart from Paris in eight and forty hours, with all the persons who had accompanied and followed him; and to quit, as expeditiously as possible, the territory of the republic; but that if the British cabinet was desirous of peace, the Executive Directory was ready to follow the negociations, according to the basis laid down in the present note by the reciprocal channel of couriers." Lord Malmesbury hesitated not to reply that he was preparing to quit Paris on the morrow, and demanded the necessary passports for himself and his suite. On the 20th he quitted the French capital and repaired to England.

About the same time, a grand literary and scientific association, bearing the appellation of the National Institute, was formed in France. The first public meeting of this learned body was held in the great hall of the Louvre, when the president of the directory, in the presence of the ambassadors and ministers of Spain, Sweden, Denmark, Prussia, Tuscany, and Holland, with a vast assemblage of spectators, delivered a speech, in which he declared it to be the stedfast purpose of the government to revive the drooping arts, and to shield both learning and liberty from all attacks of ferocious anarchy.

Thus terminated the first negociation for peace between Great Britain and the republic of France. The British ministry, considering its abrupt conclusion as arising totally from France, published a manifesto, on the 27th of December, enlarging upon the pacific dispositions of the British government, and setting forth the malignant hostility of the enemy.

This manifesto being laid before Parliament, Mr. Pitt, after a brilliant exordium, in which he lamented the failure of the attempt to restore the relations of peace, proceeded to take a review of the circumstances that preceded and attended the late negociations, and insisted that their rupture was wholly imputable to the government of France. The enemy demanded not as an ultimatum, but as a preliminary, to retain all those territories of which the chance of war had given them a temporary possession, and respecting which they thought proper, contrary to the law of nations, to pass a constitutional decree, declaring, that these should not be alienated from the republic. But this perverse and monstrous claim, in virtue of which, territories acquired by force of arms, were annexed to a state during the continuance of the war, in which such acquisitions were made, could never be supposed to supersede the treaties of other powers, and the known and public obligations of the several nations in Europe. Yet this had been the pretension to which the French government laid claim, and the acknowledgment of which they held out as a preliminary of negociation to the King of Great Britain, and his allies. And not content with setting up this claim to abrogate treaties previously concluded, they had offered a studied insult to his Majesty, by ordering his ambassador to quit Paris, and proposing that the negociation should be carried on by means of couriers. The question then, said Mr. Pitt, "Is not how much will you give for peace; but how much disgrace will you suffer at the outset? how much degradation will you submit to as a preliminary? In these circumstances, then, are we to persevere in the war, with a spirit and energy worthy of the British name, and of the British character? or are we, by sending couriers to Paris, to prostrate ourselves at the feet of a stubborn and supercilious government, to yield to what they may require, and to submit to whatever they may impose? I hope there is not a hand in his Majesty's councils which would sign the proposal; that there is not a heart in this house that would sanction the measure; and that there is not an individual in the British dominions who would act as the courier." Mr. Fox, in reply, maintained that the whole amount of the minister's splendid oration, was to admit that we had been four years engaged in a war, unprecedented in expence, both in men and in money, and that we had done nothing; that in fact the enemy, instead of being humbled and ruined, as had been so often and so confidently foretold, had now become more unreasonable and dictatorial in their pretensions than ever. Mr. Fox concluded his speech, by proposing an address to the throne, recommending "That his Majesty's faithful Commons should proceed to investigate the conduct of his Majesty's ministers, who had involved this nation in her present misfortunes, and produced the failure of the late negociations." This amendment was negatived by 212 against 36; and a similar fate awaited a similar motion made by the Earl of Oxford, in the House of Lords.

The House of Commons resolved itself into a committee, (October 18) to take into consideration, that part of his Majesty's speech which alluded to the preparations making by the enemy to invade these kingdoms. In addition to the naval force now actually employed, and which the premier declared to be more formidable than had ever existed at any former period of our history, he proposed first, a levy of fifteen thousand men, from the different parishes, for the sea service, and for recruiting the regular regiments of the line: his second proposal was to raise a supplementary militia, to consist of sixty thousand men; not to be immediately called out, but to be enrolled, officered, and completely trained, so as to be ready to serve their country, in a moment of danger; and his third military project was to raise a force of twenty thousand irregular cavalry—every person who kept ten horses to provide one horse and one horseman, those who kept more than ten horses, to provide in the same proportion, and those who kept fewer, to form themselves into classes, and decide who at the common expence should provide the horse and the horseman. These several propositions were passed into laws early in the session; but the plan for raising the irregular cavalry force being found difficult of application, the measure was superseded in a great degree by the numerous volunteer corps of yeomanry cavalry, which pressed forward in the service of their country.

During this session, a bill was introduced by Mr. Dundas, for raising and embodying a militia force in Scotland, which was much resisted in that part of the kingdom. One hundred and ninety-five thousand men were voted for the land service, for the year 1797, and soon afterwards one hundred and twenty thousand seamen and marines for the navy.

In the early part of December, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his annual financial statement, from which it appeared, that eighteen millions would be wanted, by way of a loan, exclusive of five millions and a half of Exchequer bills, and about thirteen millions and a half of victualling, transport, and navy bills. This loan was followed by a second, during the same session of Parliament, amounting to eighteen millions, comprehending a great variety of deficiencies, and including a vote of credit for three millions to be remitted to the Emperor of Germany.

A. D. 1797.] Scarcely at any period, had the aspect of public affairs in this country assumed a more gloomy and dispirited complexion, than at the commencement of the year 1797. The rapid and enormous increase of the national debt had created an alarm among many of the proprietors of the public funds; and under this impression, sums to a great amount were sold out of the stocks, and vested in other securities. The Bank had, in the course of the war, advanced immense sums to the government, far beyond its usual advances to the public treasury; and as a considerable part of these advances consisted of remittances to foreign powers, especially to the Emperor of Germany, made in coin, and not in notes, the gold and silver in the Bank were greatly diminished. The consequences of this had been long foreseen by the directors of the Bank, and as early as the year 1795, they had expressed to Mr. Pitt their expectations that he would arrange his finances for the year, in such a manner as not to depend on any further assistance from the Bank. This remonstrance they repeated on the 8th of October, in the same year, and again in 1796, but they still continued to afford accommodation to the treasury. In the beginning of 1797, the minister requested still further advances, and intimated, at the same time, that a loan amounting to the sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds, beyond the accommodation to the English treasury, would be wanted for Ireland. On the 9th of February, the governor of the Bank informed Mr. Pitt, "That under the present state of the Bank's accommodation to government here, to agree with his request, of making a further advance of one million five hundred thousand pounds as a loan to Ireland, would threaten ruin to the Bank, and most probably bring the directors to shut up their doors." Another cause powerfully co-operated to produce an alarming derangement in the affairs of the national Bank. The dread of invasion had induced the capitalists, as well as the more opulent farmers and traders, at a distance from the metropolis, to withdraw their money from the hands of the country bankers, with whom they had been accustomed to deposit it; and the run upon the provincial banking houses soon extended to the capital. On the 20th of February, an unusual demand was made by the holders of notes, upon the Bank of England, for specie, and this run, which increased on the 21st, became so rapid and urgent on the four following days, as to excite the most serious alarm, and to oblige the directors to submit their situation to the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the 26th, government found it necessary to interfere, and on that day, an order of the privy council was issued, prohibiting the directors of the Bank from issuing any cash in payment till the sense of Parliament should be taken. The consideration of this important subject was brought with as little delay as possible before the two houses of Parliament, and the first step taken was to appoint two secret committees, to ascertain the assets of the Bank. The public apprehension was materially allayed by their reports, delivered early in March, from which it appeared, that on the 15th of February, the last day of paying gold and silver at the Bank, the amount of the demands upon the company was 13,770,390*l.* that their assets, exclusive of the permanent debt due from government, amounted to the sum of 17,597,280*l.* so that there remained a surplus of 3,826, 890*l.* to which must be added the sum of 11,686,800, three per cent. stock, lent at different times to government on Parliamentary security; which being estimated at fifty per cent. agreeably to the actual price at that time of the three per cent. consols, the whole of the capital vested in the corporation of the Bank, after the payment of all demands, amounted to the enormous sum of 9,627,000*l.* On these reports, Mr. Pitt grounded a bill enabling the Bank to issue notes in payment of demands upon them, instead of cash, agreeably to the late order of council to that effect, and a clause of the utmost importance was introduced into the act for preventing any person from being held to bail who offered Bank of England notes in discharge of a debt; though this law, by leaving the creditor the option of demanding cash in payment instead of notes, did not actually constitute them a legal tender. From this time the circulation of gold coin in a great measure ceased, and notes, from twenty shillings and upwards, became the general medium of circulation.

Animated debates took place in Parliament, respecting the affairs of the Bank; and the Duke of Bedford, and Mr. Grey respectively moved a series of resolutions condemning the minister's intercourse and concerns with the Bank, and attributing the embarrassments of the company to his negligence and prodigality; but the proposed votes of censure were rejected by large majorities, in both Houses.*

Scarcely had the alarm created by the stoppage of cash payments at the Bank begun to subside, than a spirit of mutiny and disaffection broke out among the fleet at Spithead. Great dissatisfaction had for some time prevailed respecting the pay and provisions of the sailors, and in the month of February, several anonymous letters were received by Lord Howe from the fleet, praying for his Lordship's influence towards obtaining an increase of the seamen's pay, and an improvement in the quality and quantity of their provisions; at the same time a correspondence was going on by letter between the crews of the different ships, and a committee of delegates was appointed to obtain a redress of grievances. These proceedings were conducted with so much secrecy, that it was not till the 15th of April, when Lord Bridport made a signal to prepare for sea, that they began to be suspected amoug the superior officers of the fleet. Instead of weighing anchor, as

* By a singular coincidence, in the same year, and about the same period of the year, the national bank of Vienna was placed in similar circumstances; and his imperial Majesty found it necessary to issue an order, directing, that from the 5th of April, 1797, the notes of the Bank should be received at their full value, as ready cash, in all payments of trade, revenue, &c.

the signal imported, the seamen of the Admiral's ship all ran up the shrouds and saluted the crews of the adjoining ships with three cheers, which being instantly answered in the same manner by the other ships, it became manifest that the spirit of disobedience had become general.—The next step of the delegates was to assemble in council in the cabin of the Admiral's ship, and to place the officers in custody to prevent them from going on shore. Here a petition to the Admiral was drawn up, and presented on the spot, accompanied with an intimation, that, till the prayer of the petition for an increase of wages, and a regulation in the ratio of provisions took place, they should not quit their present station, "Unless the enemy was known to be at sea." On the 18th, a committee of the Admiralty, with Earl Spencer at their head, repaired to Portsmouth, with a view to induce the refractory seamen to resume the duty they owed to their country, and on the 23d, the Admiral returned to his ship, and after hoisting his flag, informed the crew that he had brought with him a redress of all their grievances, accompanied by his Majesty's pardon for the offenders. After some deliberation, these offers were cheerfully accepted, and every man hastened to return to his duty.—It was now supposed that all cause of dissatisfaction was removed; but, when, on the 7th of May, Lord Bridport made the signal to put to sea, every ship at St. Helen's refused to obey. This second mutiny arose, it appeared, from a groundless apprehension on the part of the seamen, that government did not mean to accede to their demands. A meeting of the delegates was again convened to be held on board the London; but Vice-Admiral Colpoys, having determined to prevent the illegal assembly from being held on board his ship, ordered the marines to fire upon the boats as they approached, and five seamen were killed in the skirmish which ensued. The crew of the London, irritated by this resistance on the part of the Admiral, now turned their guns towards the stern, and threatened to blow all aft into the water unless the commander submitted, and Admiral Colpoys and Captain Griffiths were both taken into custody by their crew, and confined for several hours in separate cabins. In this state of mutiny the sailors at Portsmouth remained till the 14th of May, when Lord Howe arrived from the Admiralty with plenary powers to settle all differences; and as his Lordship was the bearer of the act of Parliament which had passed on the 9th, granting an additional allowance of pay to the seamen, and also of his Majesty's proclamation of pardon, the flag of insurrection was struck, and the fleet prepared to put to sea to encounter the enemy. The public saw with infinite satisfaction the extinction of this dangerous spirit of disaffection; but a new mutiny in another quarter, which for boldness and extent is without a parallel in the naval history of Britain, soon converted their pleasure into alarm and consternation.

The North Sea fleet, as well as the ships lying at the Nore, imitating the dangerous conduct of the crews at Spithead, but greatly exceeding them in the extent of their demands, chose delegates from every ship, and appointed a seaman of the name of Richard Parker, a bold and enterprising man, as their president. The demands of these mutineers comprehended a greater freedom of absence from ships in harbour—a more punctual discharge of arrears of pay—a more equal distribution of prize money, and a general abatement of the rigours of discipline.

On the 23d of May, the flag of Admiral Buckner was struck on board the Sandwich, and the red flag, the symbol of mutiny, hoisted in its stead. To the daily conferences of this mutinous usurpation, each man of war sent two delegates, and, besides these, there was a committee of twelve in every ship, who determined not only all affairs relating to the internal management of the vessel, but instructed their delegates, and decided upon their merits. The delegates, with the rebel Admiral at their head, went on shore daily, and after holding their meetings, paraded the streets and ramparts with music and flags. The arrival of Lord Keith and Sir Charles Grey at Sheerness, at length put an end to these audacious processions. The mutiny had then risen to the most alarming height, and it was intimated to the seamen that no further concessions than what had already been made by the legislature would be granted. Some of the most desperate of their number suggested the idea of carrying the ships into an enemy's port; but the majority revolted at so treacherous a proceeding, alledging that a redress of grievances, as it was their primary, so it should be their ultimate object. Notwithstanding this disagreement, the crews of the respective ships continued to prosecute their designs, and for the purpose of extorting compliance with their demands, they proceeded to block up the Thames, by refusing a passage either up or down the river to the London trade, and to supply their present wants, they took from a vessel three hundred sacks of flour, which they distributed throughout the fleet.

On the 4th of June, the whole fleet at the Nore celebrated his Majesty's birth day by a royal salute; and on the 6th they were joined by the Agamemnon, Leopold, Ardent, and Isis men of war, and the Ranger sloop, which had deserted from the fleet of Admiral Duncan, then in Yarmouth Roads. This accession of strength swelled the mutinous fleet to twenty-four sail, consisting of eleven ships of the line and thirteen frigates. The appearance of such a multitude of shipping under the command of a set of common sailors, in a state of insubordination, formed a singular and awful spectacle. Government in the mean time were not inattentive to the obligations imposed upon them by the perilous situation of the country, and a proclamation was issued, offering his Majesty's pardon to all such of the mutineers as should immediately return to their duty. This was speedily followed by two acts of Parliament, the former for more effectually restraining the intercourse from the shore with the ships in a state of mutiny, and the latter for punishing with the utmost severity of the law any person or persons who should attempt to seduce seamen or soldiers into mutinous practices; but the master-stroke of policy was to be found in the removal of all the buoys from the mouth of the Thames, and the neighbouring coast, by which any large ship that should attempt to sail away would be exposed to the most imminent danger of running-a-ground; while furnaces and red hot balls were kept in readiness at Sheerness, to repel any attack that might be made on that place by the mutineers. The last attempt at reconciliation by treaty was made through the Earl of Northesk, who on the 6th of June was rowed on board the Monmouth at the instance of the delegates, where he found the convention in the state cabin, consisting of sixty delegates, with "Admiral" Parker placed at their head. To his Lordship they communicated the terms on which alone they would give up the ships, and requested that he would submit them to the King, and return on board with a clear and positive answer within fifty-four hours; intimating that the whole must be complied with, or they would immediately put the fleet to sea. These terms, which were submitted the next day to the King in council, were rejected, and the intelligence of their refusal was communicated by Captain Knight, of the Inflexible. All hopes of accommodation being thus at an end, preparations were making to inforce obedience to the laws, from the works at Sheerness, but the defection of several of the ships, on the 9th, with other symptoms of disunion amongst the mutineers, rendered the application of force unnecessary. On the 10th, several of the mutinous ships, being reduced to great exigencies for want of fresh provisions and water, struck the red flag. On the 12th, all but seven of the ships hoisted the union flag, to signify their wish to return to obedience; and on the following morning, five out of the seven remaining vessels ran away from the mutinou ships, and sought protection under the guns of the for of Sheerness. All further resistance was now in vain, and after a fruitless attempt to obtain a general pardon, the crew of the Sandwich steered that ship on the following morning into Sheerness, where "Admiral" Parker was arrested by a picquet-guard of soldiers, with a person of the name of Davies, who had acted as a Captain under him, with about thirty other delegates, and were all committed to the black hole in the garrison. One of the delegates, of the name of Wallace, more desperate than the rest, being determined neither to out-live his power, nor to submit to the ignominy of a public execution, shot himself dead on the appearance of the soldiers. Thus all resistance to the authority of the officers ceased, and the public mind recovered its former composure, by the entire extinction of this alarming revolt. In the course of the investigation which took place, it appeared that several of the disaffected Irish, and of persons in England connected with the revolutionary societies, had entered the navy, for the express purpose of infecting the minds of the seamen with revolutionary principles.*

Ever since the recall of Earl Fitzwilliam, from Ireland, the discontents of that country had continued to increase, and several parishes, baronies, and even counties, were declared to be out of the King's peace. The Earl of Moira, on the 21st of March, moved in the House of Lords for an address to his Majesty, praying, "That he would be graciously pleased to interpose his paternal interference, to remove the discontents which prevailed in Ireland, and created the most serious alarm for that country, and for the dearest interests of Britain." Lord Grenville, in reply, insisted that the present motion could not be adopted without tearing asunder every bond of union, and breaking the solemn contract subsisting between the two countries. Instead of remedying discontents, the motion now submitted to the House would increase them, and induce the Irish to imagine that their own legislature was regardless of their welfare. The motion was ultimately negatived by a majority of 70 to 20 voices; and a similar motion made two days afterwards in the House of Commons, by Mr. Fox, was also lost.

The inhabitants of Westminster, and of several other cities and populous districts, assembled in the spring of the present year, and numerous petitions were voted at these meetings, praying for the removal of ministers. Encouraged by these proceedings, which, however, were by no means general, the Earl of Suffolk moved, in the House of Lords, on the 27th of March, "That an address might be presented to his Majesty, humbly requesting him to dismiss from his councils the first Lord of the Treasury, whose pernicious measures had deprived him of the confidence of the country." This motion was followed on the 19th of May by another in the Commons, moved by Mr. Alderman Combe, for an address to the King, "beseeching his Majesty to dismiss from his councils his present ministers, as the most likely means of obtaining a permanent and speedy peace." The motion for the address was negatived, in the Peers, by 86 to 16; and in the Commons, by 242 to 59.†

Mr. Grey, (May 26) made his final motion relative to a reform in Parliament;‡ but it was lost by a majority of 258 to 63 voices.

On the 20th of July, Parliament was prorogued by a speech from the throne, in which his Majesty intimated, "that he was again engaged in a negociation for peace, which nothing should be wanting on his part to bring to a successful termination, on such conditions as were consistent with the security, honour, and essential interests of his dominions."

Amongst the miscellaneous events of the present year, may be mentioned the marriage of the Princess Royal of England, Charlotte Matilda, with Frederic William the hereditary Prince of Wirtemberg;§ and the death of one of the most distinguished statesmen of the age—a man whose talents as a Parliamentary orator, and a political writer, were of the first order. Mr. Burke died at his seat, at Beaconsfield, July the 8th, 1797, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.‖

The

* The trial of Parker commenced on the 22d of June, on board the Neptune, off Greenhithe, before a court martial, of which Sir T. Paisley was president. The prisoner was charged with various acts of muting, committed on board his Majesty's fleet, at the Nore; of disobedience of orders; and of contempt of the authority of his officers. The facts being clearly established, the court adjudged the prisoner to death; on which, with astonishing composure, he addressed them as follows:—"I bow to your sentence with all due submission, being convinced I have acted under the dictates of a good conscience. God, who knows the hearts of all men, will, I hope, receive me. I hope that my death will atone to the country; and that those brave men who have acted with me, will receive a general pardon; I am satisfied they will all then return to their duty with alacrity." On the 20th of June, Parker was executed on board the Sandwich, and met his fate with fortitude. A great number of the other mutineers received sentence of death, and several of the ring-leaders were executed. Some of the minor offenders atoned for their crime by undergoing a public whipping; but all those on whom sentence of death had been pronounced, without being carried into effect, experienced the royal clemency, after the splendid naval victory obtained by Admiral Duncan.

† In favour of these addresses, it was urged "that ministers had plunged the country into an unnecessary war, which had added one hundred and thirty millions to the national debt, and had imposed taxes to the amount of six millions and a half annually; that, instead of restoring monarchy in France, they had been compelled to recognize the republic; that, instead of weakening the powers, or dismembering the territories of the enemy, they had suffered them to add the Netherlands, Holland, and a great part of Italy, to the republic; that they had neglected the proper opportunities of making peace, and that their negociations for that desirable object had been conducted with insincerity; that to their profusion were imputable all the embarassments that had so lately distressed the national bank, and to their folly and misconduct, all the insubordination that had shewn itself in the navy; the discontents that prevailed among the people of England; and the spirit of rebellion which had begun to manifest itself in Ireland; that their boast of having preserved their country from jacobinical principles was supposititious, but that the evils they had brought upon the country were real, and would be permanent as the government itself; that in fact, ministers themselves were the most practical jacobins in the country; that they had banished gold and silver from circulation, and taken up the paper system, at the time France had laid it down; that they had had recourse to arbitrary measures, military force, and pretended plots, with every article of jacobinism, that had been previously practised in France; and that it was the virtuous and enlightened juries of 1794 which defeated the Robespierrian system, attempted to be established in this country by his Majesty's ministers." It was contended on the other hand, "that the country owed to ministers the three greatest blessings that a country could possess—liberty, internal tranquillity, and general prosperity. That under their administration, juries had been invested with the power of judging of the point of law, as well as the matter of fact; that when Mr. Pitt came into office, the funds were at sixty-four, but, by his financial abilities, they had been raised, before the war broke out, to ninety-eight; that even during the war, our trade, manufactures, and agriculture, had continued to flourish; that it was impossible for ministers to avoid entering into the war; that though the success of our allies had not equalled our expectations, yet, as for ourselves, our success as well as our exertions had been unparalleled; in a word, that we were indebted to the exertions of the present ministers, for arresting the progress of French principles among us, for our freedom from those miseries that France had brought upon other countries, and for the internal tranquillity that at present prevailed in our own happy island."

‡ The Honourable mover solemnly affirmed, "That he sought not to alter any part of the constitution, but merely to obtain for the people, a full, fair, and free representation in Parliament, to which they were incontrovertibly entitled. He proposed, that the county representation should continue upon the same footing as at present, but that the number of county members should be increased from ninety-two to one hundred and thirteen; the addition to be made to the largest counties, in proportion to their population—for instance, instead of two for the county of York, there should be two for each riding, and so in the other counties, where the present representation was not proportioned to the extent of the population. In order to put an end to compromises, counties should be divided into grand divisions, each of which should return one representative: the right of the elective franchise to be extended to copy-holders and lease-holders, who were bound to pay a certain annual rent, a certain number of years: the remaining four hundred members to be returned by one description of persons, namely, householders: the poll to be taken throughout the kingdom at one time; and the same person not to be permitted to vote for more than one member; the duration of Parliament to be limited to three years; upon this plan Mr. Grey said the members would hold their seats, not indeed on the basis of universal suffrage, but of universal representation. The qualification would be so fixed, that no man, however mean, might not hope, by honest industry, and fair exertion, to raise himself to this distinction."

§ The ceremony was performed on the 18th of May; and a portion of 80,000*l.* was voted by Parliament for the royal bride.

‖ Edmund Burke was born in Dublin, on the 1st of January, 1730. He derived his descent from a respectable family; his father being by profession an attorney, in considerable practice in that city. Having received a liberal education, he repaired to London, early in life, and entered himself in the Temple, where he increased his slender finances by writing for the newspapers, and other periodical publications. His first acknowledged literary production was "A Vindication of Natural Society," and his second, an "Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful." During the Rockingham administration he was chosen member of Parliament for Wendover, in Buckinghamshire. On the dissolution of Parliament, which speedily followed, he was chosen member for Malton, and at the same time was elected, with Mr. Cruger, representative for the city of Bristol, for which he took

RAPIN'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

THE SURRENDER OF THE SPANISH ADMIRAL TO COMMODORE NELSON ON BOARD THE SAN JOSEF
THE 14TH OF FEBRUARY 1797.

Published by Jas. Gardner, Albion Press, London, 1835.

The King of Spain, so recently the ally, had now become the enemy of England; and the French republic, having at her disposal the navy of Spain, as well as that of Holland, proposed to her confederates, that the greatest part of the Spanish navy should sail in the early part of the year 1797, to Brest, where, being joined by the French ships of war in that port, they should afterwards form a junction with the Dutch fleet; and that this armada, then swelled to upwards of seventy sail of the line, should bear down upon England, and having humbled the lofty pretensions of her naval power, should lay the foundation for her future subjugation. This design soon became known to the British ministry, and to frustrate its execution, a fleet under Sir John Jervis, was appointed to blockade the port of Cadiz, while Admiral Duncan was stationed off the coast of Holland, to watch the movements of the Dutch fleet in the Texel. Sir John Jervis having received intelligence on the 13th of February, from Captain Foote, of the Niger, stationed off Carthagena, that the fleet under Admiral Don Joseph de Cordova, was at sea, immediately set sail in quest of it. At the dawn of the succeeding day the enemy was descried off Cape St. Vincent, but as the weather happened to be extremely hazy, it was not until ten o'clock, that a signal from a British frigate announced the enemy's fleet to consist of twenty-seven sail of the line. The British commander, though his squadron consisted of no more than fifteen ships, resolved to bring them to action, and at half past eleven o'clock formed in the most complete order of sailing in two lines. By carrying a press of sail, the British squadron was so fortunate as to prevent the two divisions of the enemy's fleet from connecting, and to cut off all that portion which had fallen to leeward. Such a moment was not to be lost, and confident in the skill, valour, and discipline of the officers and men under his command, the Admiral felt himself justifiable in departing from the regular system; and passing through the enemy's fleet, in a line, formed with the utmost celerity, he attacked, and thereby separated one third from the main body; after a partial cannonade, which prevented their rejunction till the evening; and by the very great exertions of the ships which had the good fortune to arrive up with the enemy on the larboard tack, four of their ships of the line were captured by the British, and the action ceased about five o'clock in the evening. This brilliant victory, which acquired for the Admiral, the title of Earl St. Vincent, was obtained with but little loss; and though Commodore Nelson, in the Captain, of seventy-four guns, distinguished himself greatly upon that occasion, by boarding the San Nicholas and San Josef in succession, he only lost one officer, twenty seamen, and three marines. Much to the credit of the commander-in-chief, to whom the Salvador del Mundo struck, only a few English ships were engaged in the contest. The slain and wounded in the Spanish ships, amounted to about twelve hundred, including amongst the former, Commodore Don Francisco Xavier Winthuysen, while the loss of the British did not exceed one-fourth part of that number. Great rejoicings took place throughout the nation on the arrival of intelligence of this well-timed victory. The fleet was honoured with the thanks of both Houses of Parliament; the King conferred a patent of an Earldom, with a pension of three thousand pounds a year, on the Admiral in chief; Vice-Admiral Thompson, and Rear-Admiral Parker, were created baronets; Commodore Nelson was invested with the order of the Bath; Captain R. Calder was knighted; and gold medals and chains were presented to all the commanders.

Having determined to fit out an expedition against Ireland, the French directory gave orders to embark a body of troops on board the Dutch fleet in the Texel. On the first intelligence of these preparations, which took place early in the year, the board of Admiralty sent a powerful squadron to the North Sea, under the command of Admiral Duncan, to intercept the enemy. It was not, however, till the month of October, and not till the British Admiral had returned to Yarmouth to refit, that the Dutch fleet put to sea. On this the English commander, who had received the most early and accurate information of the enemy's movements, suddenly returned to his former station. The command of the enemy's fleet, which consisted of twenty-six sail, including frigates, had been confided to Admiral De Winter, who had distinguished himself in the army under General Pichegru. No sooner had De Winter quitted the Texel, than Captain Trollope, who had been stationed with a light squadron of observation at the mouth of that river, gave notice of his approach, and on the 11th of October, Admiral Duncan gave orders for a general chase, and the Dutch ships were soon discovered drawn up in a line of battle on the larboard tack, between Camperdown and Egmont, the land being about nine miles to leeward. Admiral Duncan, whose fleet consisted of fifteen sail of the line, exclusive of frigates, finding there was no time to be lost, made the signal to bear up, break the enemy's line, and engage them to leeward, each ship her opponent; by which the British squadron placed itself between the enemy and the land, whither they were fast approaching. The Admiral's signal being obeyed with promptitude, Vice-Admiral Onslow, in the Monarch, bore down on the enemy's rear, in the most gallant manner, his division following his example, and the action commenced about forty minutes past twelve o'clock. The Venerable soon got through the enemy's line, and a close action was begun on their van, which lasted nearly two hours and a half, when all the masts of the Dutch Admiral's ship were observed to go by the board; she was, however, defended for some time in a most gallant manner, but being overpowered by numbers, her colours were struck, and Admiral De Winter was brought on board the Venerable; soon after, the ship bearing the Vice-Admiral's flag, was also dismasted, and surrendered to Vice-Admiral Onslow; and these, with three of sixty-eight guns, two of sixty-four, two of fifty-six, and two vessels of inferior force, were taken possession of by the English. In the early part of the action, Rear-Admiral Story, who commanded the centre division of the Dutch fleet, fled for the Texel in the States-General of seventy-four guns, with part of his division, and afterwards made a merit of having saved part of the fleet. The British squadron suffered much in their masts, yards, and rigging, and many of the ships lost a number of men, but in no proportion to the loss of the enemy. The carnage on board the two ships that bore the Admirals' flags, was beyond all description, and did not amount to less than 250 men took his seat. Having given offence to many of his constituents at Bristol, by his defence of the trade of Ireland, he declined to offer himself again to their suffrages on the dissolution of Parliament, in 1780. On the admission of the Rockingham party into power, Mr. Burke came into office, and was appointed paymaster-general of the forces. This situation he held till the elevation of Lord Shelburne to the office of premier, when Mr. Burke withdrew from the administration, with his friend Mr. Fox; but on the appointment of the coalition administration, he was again reinstated in his office of paymaster-general.

On the termination of the trial of Warren Hastings, he resigned his seat in favour of his only son. This young man, the object of his father's warmest solicitude, was appointed secretary to Earl Fitzwilliam, pending his vice-royalty to Ireland, but his death, on the 2d of August, 1794, put a period to his opening prospects, and inflicted upon his father a shock from which he never recovered. On the death of his son, the King was pleased to settle upon Mr. Burke and his lady a pension for life. The last effort of his pen was entitled "Thoughts on a Regicide Peace;" a production that made its appearance when Lord Malmesbury was first sent to France, to negociate with the directory. Soon after the publication of this book, his health began to decline, but his body only, and not his mind, was affected. The week in which he died, he conversed freely with his literary and political friends, and dwelt particularly on the French revolution, and on the painful separation from admired friends which it had occasioned; he spoke with pleasure of the conscious rectitude of his intentions, and intreated, if he had by an unguarded asperity given offence that they would pardon his infirmity. The last subjects of his literary attention were "the inculcations of practical wisdom, guiding to temporal and eternal happiness;" and during his last illness he frequently declared his thorough belief of the Christian religion. He appeared neither to wish nor to dread, but patiently and placidly to await, the appointed hour of dissolution; and after a most interesting and tender conversation with his young friend Mr. Nayle, he faintly uttered "God bless you," fell back, and breathed his last.

250 men killed and wounded on board each ship. The total loss of the British amounted to 191 killed, and 560 wounded, while the loss of the enemy must have exceeded double that number. The votes of both Houses of Parliament greeted the arrival of the gallant sailors; many of the Captains were gratified by medals; the venerable Admiral was rewarded by the King with the dignity of Viscount Camperdown, and a pension of three thousand pounds per annum; while Vice-Admiral Onslow was created a baronet, and the Captains Trollope and Fairfax knights banneret.

Cadiz was twice bombarded this year by Rear-Admiral Nelson, under the command of Lord St. Vincent; first on the 23d of June; secondly, on the 5th of July. By these operations, considerable injury was inflicted upon the city, but without advancing the objects of the war.

In February, the Spanish island of Trinidad capitulated to an expedition consisting of six sail of the line, and a number of troops, fitted out at Port Royal, in Martinico, under the command of Sir Ralph Abercromby, and Admiral Harvey. On the approach of the English, the Spaniards, who had a squadron of four ships of the line, and one frigate lying at anchor in the gulf of Paria, set fire to their ships, and one line of battle ship only escaping the conflagration, fell into the hands of the victors; the governor and the garrison were made prisoners of war. The same commanders made an attempt in the month of April, on the large and important island of Porto Rico; but this island being found too strong to be carried by a coup-de-main, the enterprise totally failed, and was attended with a loss to the assailants of upwards of two hundred men.

An attack upon the Isle of Teneriffe, by a squadron of seven ships of war, commanded by Admiral Nelson, and a force of 1000 marines, under Captain Troubridge, was still more unfortunate. On the 15th of July, the British expedition arrived before the port of Santa Cruz, and having effected a landing, took possession of the town, but they learnt, when too late, that the force under their command, was utterly unequal either to carry the fort of Santa Cruz, or to contend with the military force of the island, now assembled to oppose them. Preparing therefore for a retreat, they had the misfortune to learn that the violence of the surge on the beach had staved their boats, and reduced them to a mere wreck. In this situation they were summoned by the Spanish commander to surrender; but this Captain Troubridge disdainfully rejected, adding, "That while he had a man left alive he would not capitulate." The Spaniards then sent a polite message to the Captain, to say, that for the purpose of sparing the effusion of blood, facilities would be afforded to himself and his followers to return to their ships; and as soon as the capitulation to this effect was signed, the enemy very generously furnished them with supplies of wine and biscuits. The loss of lives in this attempt, was equal to that sustained in the battle of Cape St. Vincent; 44 privates were killed, 105 wounded, 97 drowned, and 5 unaccounted for; Captain Richard Bowen, of the Terpsichore, and six Lieutenants, lost their lives; Captain Thompson of the Leander, Captain Fremantle of the Seahorse, a Lieutenant and a Midshipman, were wounded, and Rear-Admiral Nelson lost his arm.

The French directory, after conquering so many Kings, menaced the independence of the British empire, by ordering troops to be assembled on the coasts of the Channel, under the designation of "the army of England;" and, to add some weight to their resolves, they declared that "the conqueror of Italy," Buonaparte, was appointed to its command. In the early part of this year, and before Buonaparte had terminated his career in Italy, a strange attempt was made on the coast of Wales, by an expedition fitted out at the port of Brest. On the 22d of February, that part of the coast of Devonshire, which lies at the mouth of the Bristol Channel, was surprised by the appearance of an enemy's force, which, entering the small port of Ilfracombe, scuttled some merchant vessels, and made an unsuccessful effort to destroy all the ships in the harbour. This invading squadron, which consisted of two frigates, and two sloops, next steered its course for the bay of Cardigan, in Wales, where on the 23d of February, they disembarked about fifteen hundred criminals, attired as French troops, and provided with a proportionable quantity of arms and ammunition, but without field pieces. On receiving information of this event, the Welch peasantry, animated by the gentry of the country, seized their scythes, sickles, and pitchforks, and marched forth to meet the invaders. Lord Cawdor had assembled, in the course of a single day, a local force, consisting of from six to seven hundred militia, fencibles, and yeomanry cavalry, and the French commander, perceiving his situation to be desperate, dispatched a letter the day following to his Lordship, and about two o'clock in the afternoon of the 26th, surrendered himself and his followers prisoners of war. To add to the disaster of this extraordinary enterprize, the two frigates which accompanied the expedition, were captured on their return to Brest, and the whole expedition proved as unfortunate in the execution, as it was unaccountable in its plan.*

Buonaparte

* At the commencement of the year, General Alvinzi took the field, at the head of fifty thousand well appointed troops, and a formidable train of artillery, by means of which he hoped to chase the republicans beyond the Alps, and to circumscribe the dominions of France within their ancient limits. Having formed the determination to raise the blockade of Mantua, by a rapid march through Castello Nuovo, and Vallegio, he attacked and carried the French position on the 7th of January; the imperial commander then suddenly passed the Brenta, stormed the town of Cortona, which had been fortified with great care, and obliged a body of troops, under the command of Joubert, to fall back upon Rivoli. Buonaparte, who had been for some time at Bologna, was no sooner apprised of this new and unexpected irruption, than he repaired to the heights of San Marco, and made such judicious dispositions, that Alvinzi, who expected an easy conquest, soon found himself surprised and defeated. In the sequel, the fall of the important fortress of Mantua (on the 2d of February) crowned the labours of the army of Italy. This siege, which is said to have cost the French twenty-two, and the Austrians twenty-four thousand men, was terminated by famine rather than by the sword; for on the entrance of the French army into the city, they found that the horses of the troopers had been wholly devoured by such of the garrison as survived the numerous conflicts without the walls. On the fall of Mantua, Buonaparte published a proclamation to his army, in which he stated, that they "had proved victorious in fourteen pitched battles, and in seventy engagements; that they had taken from the enemy more than 100,000 prisoners, 500 field pieces, and 2000 large cannon; that the contributions raised in the countries conquered by them, had supported, maintained, and paid the army, during the whole campaign; while thirty millions of livres had been sent to the minister of finance, for the increase of the public treasure:" and, after glancing at their achievements against the Kings and Princes of Italy, he declared it to be his intention to carry the war into the hereditary states of Austria, and requested them to recollect, "that it was liberty they were about to present to the Hungarians, whose sovereign had disgraced himself, by submitting to be in the pay, and at the disposal of England."

The papal see, which had relied with implicit confidence on the success of the Austrians, was menaced with sudden ruin; for Buonaparte had published a proclamation, in which, after reproaching the holy father with subterfuge and perfidy, he declared the armistice to be at an end, recalled the French minister from Rome, and threatened all those who opposed the progress of the republican columns with the most exemplary vengeance. These denunciations were not uttered in vain; for General Victor immediately entered the town of Imola, and beheld the pontifical army entrenched along the banks of the Setria, with the left wing at Caffiano, the centre at Faenza, and the right at Lugo. The papal army, though scarcely broken, immediately abandoned the fertile plains of Romagna, and took refuge on the summits of the Apennines, towards the sources of the Arno and the Tiber; the towns of Cesena, Forli, and Ravenna, on this submitted in succession. The whole march of Ancona also acknowledged the triumph of the three coloured ensign, which was now displayed from the top of the holy chapel of Loretto; while the votive offerings of Kings, Popes, and Emperors, became the prey of an unbelieving soldiery. When the French General arrived at Tolentino, and began to establish a republican form of government, his holiness, apprehensive lest he should march to the seat of government, at length determined to negociate. He was consequently obliged to renounce all claim to Avignon and the Venaissin, to relinquish the three legations of Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna; to furnish the statues, pictures, and treasure, stipulated in the former convention; and to pay the sum of fifteen millions of livres towards the expences of the war.

It was not without great difficulty that Francis II. was enabled to recruit his army; for the Hungarian levies had nearly all perished in the plains of Italy, and a large portion of the youth of Vienna had either been taken prisoners, or cut off by the sword of the enemy. A great and last effort was however made, and to a considerable body of recruits were added several divisions of that victorious army, at Buonaparte had found it expedient to negotiate, and conclude a peace with the Emperor; but the French directory affected to be dissatisfied with its terms—for some time refused its ratification—and at length consented to it, only, because they were engaged in the execution of a plan, at home, which more materially affected themselves. The new government had become not merely unpopular, but even despicable in the eyes of the people; so much so, indeed, that the crafty Sieyes refused a seat in the Directory. Soon after the appointment of that body, the two councils coalesced for a time with the terrorists, in order to crush their mutual enemies; the men of moderate principles; but the success of this plan was defeated by the still greater enmity which subsisted between those terrorists who adhered to Robespierre to the last, and those who brought him to the scaffold. After the conspiracy of May 1796, the directors were more circumspect in their conduct and language; and no difference occurred between them and the councils, till the new election, which took place in the spring of 1797; when, notwithstanding all the arts of intrigue which were exerted by the Directory, and all the manœuvres of the Jacobins, nearly the whol eof the new deputies were adverse to the present system; most of them were men of anti-revolutionary principles, and among them were some royalists, and even more than one emigrant. At length the time came for one of the directors also to go out, by lot; and, by dint of management, it was contrived that the lot should fall upon Letourneur, one of the weakest characters amongst them. He accordingly received a large sum of money, was appointed to the post of ambassador, and Barthelemi was chosen to succeed him in the directory. From this time, there was a majority in the two Councils opposed to the Directory, and, during the summer of 1797, a regular warfare was carried on between them, in messages and in speeches. The majority of the nation sided with the Councils, and, if their energy had been equal to the goodness of their cause, there could have been little doubt that they would have succeeded in their efforts, to give a better constitution to France, and peace to Europe. Their opponents, however, were better versed in the revolutionary tactics, more conversant with the maxims of the Robespierrean school, and less scrupulous about the means of accomplishing their end. The Directory, the head of which the Archduke Charles had combated during the preceding year in Suabia and Franconia. Such formidable preparations determined the directory to send a number of the battalions cantoned on the frontiers of the Rhine into Italy, to encounter the very same warriors with whom they had before fought in the midst of the Black Forest. The Austrians, on their arrival, were formed into an army as before, between the Tagliamento and the Piava; while the French, who occupied the right bank of the latter river, and the left border of the Arisio, were prepared to oppose their progress. A variety of movements, and minor actions, having taken place, General Joubert penetrated to the banks of the Arisio, where he engaged the Austrians; and after a long and bloody action, during which he took four thousand prisoners, obtained possession of the bridge of Neumark, with an intention of cutting off the enemy's retreat towards Bolsana. A second battle, equally unfortunate, was fought soon after at Trames; however, General Laudohn, who was well acquainted with this mountainous region, contrived for some time to arrest the progress of the invaders, at a pass of the Eisach; but at length, the light infantry were fortunate enough to scale a precipice, whence they rolled immense masses of rock on the opposing column, and their centre being pierced, and one of their flanks turned, nearly at the same time, the whole of the artillery, which consisted of eight pieces, with fifteen hundred soldiers, fell into the power of the republicans. After this, the invaders took possession of Brixen, in which were found immense quantities of ammunition, stores, &c.

The division under Massena, pursuing the centre of the retreating army, seized on the fort of Chiusa, forced the bridge of Carasola, and at length reached Tarvis, a town built on the summit of a mountain; while Bernadotte, at the head of a body of grenadiers, took possession of Gradisca, the capital of the Frioul. The capture of this city rendered the French masters of all the Austrian possessions from the Alps to the sea.

Goritz submitted, without making the least resistance; Trieste, the only port in the Adriatic appertaining to the Emperor, followed its example; and, while scaling the Norick Alps, still covered with snow, Buonaparte endeavoured to conciliate the minds of the inhabitants by proclamations, in which he declared that the French armies were fighting for peace, and that they would not fail to extend protection to the peaceable Tyroleans. In the mean time, the Archduke, who had retired to Clagenfurt, perceiving that a division of his army was in danger of being surrounded by two columns of the enemy, sent a strong body of troops, on the 26th, against Massena, who commanded one of them. The Austrians, however, were again beaten, and pursued by the French cavalry, first across hills covered with snow, and at last along the ice. A few days after this, the same General fell in with a detachment of the imperialists already alluded to; and, after a slight engagement, seized on all the heavy artillery, and nearly the whole of the baggage, belonging to the army of his highness. The career of success did not stop here; for the whole of the French army being now put in motion, arrived on the 30th of March, in the capital of the duchy of Carinthia, where the commander-in-chief of the Austrians had established his head-quarters previously to his retreat along the banks of the Muer. Notwithstanding Buonaparte had beaten the Austrians in six different engagements, and destroyed one half of their army, during a campaign that had lasted only twenty-one days, his situation was critical and alarming. The natives of the mountainous districts were attached by habit to the dominion of the house of Austria; and the offer of liberty, which exhibited so many charms to the fascinated inhabitants of the vallies, possessed but few blandishments for a people whose patriarchal manners were as yet undebased by tyranny. The numerous defiles of those dreary regions; the marked enmity of the peasantry; the difficulty of obtaining supplies; the danger of being surrounded, like Moreau, or nearly cut off, like Jourdan; all these considerations operated powerfully on the mind of the conqueror, and he found it necessary to affect the language of moderation. He accordingly addressed a letter to the Archduke, in which, after lamenting the miseries of a war which had already desolated Europe during six years, he inquired whether he was desirous to merit the title of "the benefactor of mankind, and the saviour of Germany?" by accepting overtures of peace. The Archduke, in his answer, told him, in substance, that it was his province to fight, and not to negotiate. However, he immediately transmitted Buonaparte's letter to Vienna; in a few days, he received full power from the Emperor, to enter into a negotiation; a suspension of arms for nine days immediately followed; and on the 18th of April, a preliminary treaty of peace was signed at the castle of Eckenwald, in Styria, which has since been known by the appellation of the treaty of Leoben, and which served as the foundation of the definitive treaty of Campo Formio.

On the Rhine, also, the French arms had been eminently successful.—Buonaparte hastened to avail himself of the overwhelming force placed at his disposal by the treaty of Leoben; and Augereau, at the head of 25,000 men, marched into Venice, and seizing on the arsenal and forts, demanded the three inquisitors, and ten principal members of the senate, accused of having instigated their countrymen to an assassination of the French soldiery. In a few days, a democratical municipality was installed; the islands in the Adriatic were subdued by the navy which had hitherto protected them; and the members of the government, finding neither commiseration nor respect from the people, were happy in being allowed to retire from their native country. In Genoa, also, the nobles were friendly to the Austrian cause, but the people were attached to the French interests, and desirous of a popular government. Buonaparte, in consequence, soon after the revolution of Venice, established a democratical government in Genoa; but as the nobles had never shown an active hostility, and made no material resistance to the change, they escaped exaction.

The negociation, between the French republic and the Emperor, proceeded, and on the 17th of October, the definitive treaty was signed on the part of the two governments, at Campo Formio, near Udina. By this treaty, the Emperor "renounced for himself and his successors, in favour of the French republic, all his rights and titles to the Austrian Netherlands;" and consented that the French republic should possess in full sovereignty the ci-devant Venetian islands of the Levant—viz. Corfu, Zante, Cephalonia, St. Maure, Cerigo, and the other islands dependent thereon, together with Butrinto, Larta, Vonizza, and in general all the Venetian establishments in Albania. And "the French republic, consented that the Emperor should possess in full sovereignty, Istria, Dalmatia, the Venetian islands in the Adriatic, the mouths of the Castaro, the city of Venice, the Venetian canals, and the countries lying between the hereditary states of his Majesty the Emperor, and the Adriatic seas; his Majesty the Emperor, acknowledging "the Cisalpine republic, founded on the union of the Cispadane and Transpadane commonwealths, as an independent power, which republic composed the ci-devant Austrian Lombardy, the Bergamesque, the Brescian, the Cremonesque, the Venetian states to the east and south of the Legner, the Modenese, the principality of Massa, and of Carara, and the three legations of Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna." This treaty was immediately promulgated, but fourteen secret articles, highly important in their nature, were for a time concealed. By one of these it was agreed on the part of the Emperor, to use his influence, "That the French republic should, by the peace to be concluded with the German empire, retain as its boundary the bank of the Rhine, from the confines of Switzerland, below Basle, to the branching of the Nette, above Andernach, including the head of the bridge of Manheim, the town and fortress of Mentz, and both banks of the Nette, from whence that river falls into the Rhine, to its source near Bruch." His imperial Majesty also agreed to use his good offices, to obtain for France the free navigation of the Rhine, the Moselle, and the Meuse; while on the other hand the republic was to endeavour to acquire for the house of Austria, the Archbishopric of Saltzburg, and part of the circle of Bavaria: and the fortresses of Mentz, Ehrenbreitstein, Philipsburg, Manheim, Konigstein, Ulm, and Ingolstadt, were to be evacuated by the imperial troops in the course of twenty days.

Having thus "conquered a continental peace," Buonaparte returned to Paris, on the 20th of November, where he was hailed with the most rapturous applause by the people, and received with every possible mark of consideration by the government.

too, were masters of the army, and of the whole executive power of the state. The enemies of the Directory, conscious of their majority, made no secret of their designs; but with a degree of weakness not easily to be accounted for, considering that they must have had a perfect knowledge of the characters and dispositions of the men who were opposed to them, they lost their time in petty disputes, and in subjecting the Directory to trifling mortifications; whereas, if they had either waited quietly till the period of another election, when they might, without difficulty, have secured a majority in the Directory, or had struck some decisive blow before the directors were thoroughly prepared for resistance, their triumph had been certain and complete. Although the Directory had solemnly declared, that they could not, on any consideration, violate any one article of the constitutional code, when called upon to give up a portion of the conquests which they had made, in order to restore peace to Europe; yet, when their object was to crush their personal enemies, they did not scruple to violate two very essential articles of the same code. By one article, the army were expressly prohibited from deliberating on any subject whatever. Yet, on the present occasion, in consequence of applications from the Directory, who had connived at all their plunder and extortion, they loudly declared themselves in their favour. Buonaparte made all the divisions of the army of Italy present petitions, of a threatening nature, against the councils. Moreau and Hoche did the same with their armies on the Rhine. The latter was pitched upon by the Directory, to command a body of troops, which they had ordered to Paris to destroy their enemies in the councils. By another article of the constitution, the approach of troops to within a certain distance from the place at which the Legislative Body held its sittings, was expressly forbidden. But this, and every other article, were disregarded by the Directory, when they had any favourite object to accomplish. Hoche, however, alarmed at the state in which he found the public mind, on his approach to the capital, was induced to decline the commission; and Augereau, who was originally a private soldier, in the Neapolitan army, but now a favourite General with Buonaparte, was employed in his stead. Augereau had no sooner taken the command of the troops, than he moved forward, and passed the limit prescribed by the constitution. The impetuosity of this man had outstripped the wishes of the Directory, who were not yet prepared to inflict the meditated blow; and, had the councils acted with firmness and decision, and passed a decree of accusation against the triumvirate, they might still have succeeded. But they wasted that time, which should have been employed in action, in frivolous debates, and fruitless discussions; and, while they were engaged in the silly expedient of ascertaining, with precision, whether the troops had really passed the constitutional limit, the hall in which they sat was suddenly surrounded, and most of the chiefs of the party, in opposition to the Directory, together with the new director, Barthelemi, were arrested without the smallest resistance or difficulty; and, being placed in carriages, resembling iron cages, previously prepared for the purpose, were sent to Rochfort, where a frigate waited to transport them to the pestilential deserts of Guiana. The remains of the two councils, who no longer constituted a Legitimate Body of representatives, and who were not competent to perform any one act of legislation, now assembled at the Odeon, and conferred on the Directory, by a formal decision, that absolute power which they had usurped, in breach of the constitution, which was specially trusted, by its concluding provision, to the safeguard of the Directory and the Legislative Councils. The immediate consequence of this event was, the triumph of jacobinism, and the re-establishment of a revolutionary government.

During these transactions in the interior of France—in the interval between the treaty of Leoben, and that of Campo Formio—the British ministry, finding that the coalition against France was effectually dissolved, again declared themselves actuated by a wish for peace. Accordingly, on the first of June, an official note from Lord Grenville to M. de la Croix, the French minister for foreign affairs, communicated the desire on the part of the British government to negociate preliminaries, which might be definitively arranged at a future congress. The French government, pursuing their usual policy of negociating a separate peace with each of their enemies, replied, that the directory would receive with eagerness the overtures and proposals which should be made to it by the court of England, but required, for the purpose of avoiding delay, that the negociations should be rather for a definitive, than for a preliminary treaty. The British government rejoined, that it would depend upon the progress and turn of the negociations, whether preliminary or definitive articles should be signed. The directory, in three days after the date of Lord Grenville's last note, transmitted the necessary passports for a minister, furnished with full powers from his Britannic Majesty, for the purpose of negociating, concluding, and signing a definitive and separate treaty of peace; and fixed upon the city of Lisle as the place of meeting for the respective plenipotentiaries. On the 17th of June, Lord Grenville, in a letter addressed to M. de la Croix, informed him that his Majesty had made choice of the same minister to represent him on this, as on a former similar occasion; to which the French minister, in reply, signified the consent of the directory, that the negociations should be opened with Lord Malmesbury, intimating, however, that another choice would have appeared to the directory more favourable for the speedy conclusion of peace. Lord Malmesbury, on his arrival at Lisle, was met by the French plenipotentiaries, Letourneur, late member of the directorial council, Pleville le Pelley, and Hugues B. Maret. His Lordship opened the business by submitting the plan of pacification, which he had received from the British ministry: this projet required the cession of the colony of Trinidad, on the part of Spain; and of the Cape of Good Hope, Cochin, in the East Indies, and the Dutch possessions in Ceylon, on the part of Holland: in return for which, it was proposed, that Great Britain should cede all the other settlements taken from France and her allies in the course of the war: our minister further required the restoration of his personal property to the Prince of Orange, or an equivalent in money; and that France should engage to procure for him, at the restoration of peace, an indemnity for the loss of the United Provinces; that Portugal should be included in the treaty, and that no demand should be made upon that country by France. To these proposals the French answered, that, previously to entering on the main business, it was necessary that three concessions should be made: first, that his Britannic Majesty should resign the title of King of France; secondly, that the ships taken and destroyed at Toulon should be restored, or restitution made for them; and thirdly, that any mortgage which England might have upon the Low Countries, in consequence of the money lent to the Emperor of Germany, for the purpose of carrying on the war against France, should be given up.

On the first of these points, Lord Malmesbury observed, "that on all former occasions a separate article had been agreed to, which appeared to answer every purpose they required, and which it was his intention, as the treaty advanced, to have proposed as proper to make a part of this:" on the second, he replied, "that this claim of restoring the ships was so perfectly unlooked for, that it was impossible for him to have been provided for it in his instructions:" and on the third, "that if the French republic had taken the Low Countries as they stood, charged with all their incumbrances, there could be no doubt what these words meant, and that if no exception was stated in the first instance, none could be made with a retro-active effect."

These were the observations that occurred to him on the first mention of the subjects to which they had adverted, but he would transmit a paper stating the three claims to his government for consideration. On the 15th of July, the French plenipotentiaries addressed a note to Lord Malmesbury, in which it was stated, "that the French government, unable to detach itself from the engagements which it has contracted with its allies, Spain and the Batavian republic, establishes, as an indispensible preliminary of the negociation for the peace with England, the consent of his Britannic Majesty to the restitution of all the possessions which he occupies, not only from the French republic, but further and formally of those of Spain and the Batavian republic." Lord Malmesbury replied, "that the requisition of these terms, was, in effect, to declare the intention of France to put an abrupt termination to the treaty, as it proposed cessions on one side, without any compensation on the other: if this were the resolution of the Directory, the negociation was at an end; and it only remained for Great Britain to persevere in maintaining, with an energy and spirit proportioned to the exigency, a war that could not be ended but by yielding to terms at once disgraceful and unjust." The French plenipotentiaries, feeling the justice of these observations, expressed a willingness to apply to the Directory, for fresh instructions; but, though this assurance was given on the 23d of July, at a conference held between the plenipotiaries on the 28th of August, it was admitted that no specific instructions had arrived. It was at the same time announced, that the delay of communication arose from the dissatisfaction of the Batavian republic, at the suggestion of their settlements being retained by Great Britain. It was however notorious to all Europe, that the members of the Directory were at this period tottering in their seats, and that, during the delay of the negociation, their attentions were confined to their own preservation. During this crisis, another revolution, as has already been related, took place in France, which expelled two of its members, Barthelemi and Carnot, from the office of directors. These events led to the recall of the French ambassadors, then at Lisle, and to the appointment of citizens Treilhard and Bonneir d'Alco, as their successors. This change of negociators was not more unpleasant to the feelings of Lord Malmesbury, than it was inauspicious to the progress of the negociation. Immediately after their first interview, on the 13th of September, Lord Malmesbury was required to inform them, whether, as a preliminary to negociation, he was empowered to concede on the part of his government, that England should surrender "all the possessions she had gained from France, and her allies, since the beginning of the war:" and his Lordship was further required to return an explicit answer to this question in the course of the same day. On the 16th, his Lordship addressed a note to the French plenipotentiaries, in which he intimated, that "he neither could nor ought to treat upon any other principle than that of compensation—a principle which had been formally recognised as a basis of a treaty equally just, honourable, and advantageous to the two powers." On the same day the French ministers apprized his Lordship of "a decree of the executive directory," purporting, "that in case Lord Malmesbury should declare himself not to have the necessary powers for agreeing to all the restitutions, which the laws and the treaties which bind the French republic make indispensible, he shall return in four and twenty hours to his court, to ask for sufficient powers."

The obvious answer to this imperious mandate was returned by Lord Malmesbury at eight o'clock in the evening of the same day, in a note demanding the necessary passports for himself and his suite, to return to England within the time prescribed by the Directory. Previously to his departure, however, another meeting took place between the plenipotentiaries, in which his Lordship, without compromising his dignity as the representative of a great nation, urged every consideration that might induce the French ministers to recall their late unwarrantable proposals, but without effect; his Lordship therefore took his departure from Lisle on the morning of the 18th of September.

Parliament met on the 2d of November, and his Majesty expressed his firm conviction, "that the papers laid before the two Houses, would prove to them, and to the world, that in the late negociations at Lisle every step had been taken on his part which could tend to accelerate the conclusion of peace; and that he still retained an ardent desire for the attainment of that blessing." When the King's speech came to be taken into consideration by the Commons, the House presented an extraordinary appearance; the benches on the left of the speaker's chair no longer exhibited their usual occupants. Finding their counsels rejected, and their opposition unavailing, the opponents of ministers, with some few exceptions, had determined to withdraw for a time from their places in Parliament, and to leave the members of administration to pursue their own system of policy without controul. Under these circumstances, the address on the King's speech was voted in both Houses without a division.

When the papers relating to the negociation were taken into consideration by the Commons, an address passed both Houses by an almost unanimous vote, highly applauding the conduct of his Majesty's government, and expressing a firm determination to support his Majesty to the utmost, and to stand or fall with our religion, laws, and liberties.

It was considered by the nation at large, that the concessions offered by England to France at Lisle, were as great as it was proper to make, and that the claims of France were highly unreasonable and unjust. A great majority of the people consequently evinced an extraordinary and sudden renewal of ardour in the prosecution of the war, and the recent victory of Lord Duncan, added to the secession of the opposition from Parliament, which by many was considered as a dereliction of public duty, gave to the ministers an unusually high degree of popularity.

A bill was introduced, early in the pressent session, and speedily passed into a law, for continuing the existing restrictions on cash payments by the Bank of England; and on the 22d of November, Mr. Pitt brought forward his annual statement, relating to the public finances. The whole expense of the year amounted to twenty-five millions and a half; and for the purpose of furnishing a supply equal to this immense demand, Mr. Pitt declared it to be his intention to have recourse to a perfectly new and solid system of finance. Of this sum, six millions and a half would arise from the unappropriated produce of the sinking fund, exchequer bills, and unmortgaged taxes. Of the nineteen millions then remaining to be provided for, he proposed to raise seven within the year, by a new impost, under the designation of a triple assessment, which would be regulated by the existing assessments—limited however to the tenth of each person's income—and from the application of this principle of taxation arose, at subsequent periods, the income and property taxes. Of the remaining twelve millions, four might be borrowed without creating an additional debt; the produce of the sinking fund, old and new, appropriated to the purpose of liquidating the national debt, being equal to that amount: the remaining eight millions he proposed to pay by continuing the triple assessment till the principal and interest were discharged, which would be the operation of little more than another year. This plan, he said, would extremely damp the hopes of the enemy, and shew to him, and to all Europe, that our national resources rose in proportion to the exigencies of our situation. Mr. Fox, at the request of his constituents, now again appeared in Parliament, and made the severest animadversions on the new scheme of finance. After a number of animated debates, however, the triple assessment bill passed the House of Commons, on the 4th of January (1798) when the opposition divided, 127 against 202.* During the progress of this bill through Parliament, a clause was introduced, on the motion of the speaker of the House of Commons, to admit of voluntary contributions towards the general defence of the country, now menaced with invasion by a powerful and enraged enemy; and the aggregate of the voluntary contributions thus entered into, under the sanction of Parliament, amounted to one million and a half, to which the bank of England contributed two hundred thousand pounds, the King twenty thousand, and the Queen five thousand, out of their private purses.*

A. D. 1798.] The next financial measure brought before the present session of Parliament (2d of April), was the redemption of the land-tax. The revenue at that time derived from the land-tax, amounted to two millions sterling; this Mr. Pitt proposed to set up at twenty years' purchase, when the three per cent. consols were at fifty, subject to a rise in the price to purchasers, according to the rise of stocks. Forty millions, sterling, the present amount of the land-tax, at twenty years' purchase, would amount to eighty millions three per cent. stock, affording an interest of two millions four hundred thousand pounds, and leaving, by this operation, a clear annual gain to the public revenue of four hundred thousand pounds. The person who purchased his share of the land-tax would obtain a landed security of his property, and that at a rate so favourable as to render it a very desirable object. What was of much more consequence to the interests of the state, eighty millions of capital would be taken out of the market. As to the terms that would be given, they should, Mr. Pitt observed, be such as would induce every person who was able, to become a purchaser. The proprietor was of course to have the right of pre-emption; and to simplify the operation, the purchase was to be made in stock, not in money. The bill further provided, that if the owner of the land should not be able to make the purchase within a time to be limited, his situation, or that of his heirs, should not be entirely hopeless, but a further period should be allowed to take advantage of the purchase. In the absence of the leading members of opposition, this bill passed into a law, without encountering any considerable difficulties; but from the radical defects of the plan, not more than about one fourth part of the land-tax was, within the space of the three succeeding years, bought up, and the advantage to the public, in point of revenue, did not within that period exceed fifty thousand a year. At the same time that the land-tax at four shillings in the pound was made perpetual, certain duties to the amount of that tax, on sugar and tobacco, were rendered annual; in order that the controul which Parliament previously possessed over the public purse might suffer no diminution.

A message had, early in the session, been sent to the two Houses of Parliament, apprising the members of the preparations making by the enemy for the invasion of these kingdoms, and soliciting the early attention of Parliament to the subject; notwithstanding which, some time elapsed before any regular plan could be matured for the national defence. Mr. Dundas, at length, moved for the introduction of a bill to enable his Majesty to call out a proportion of the supplementary militia; and, after an interval of some weeks, a second bill was introduced, for the encouragement of voluntary associations in defence of the country. This call was promptly obeyed; and no period in the history of Great Britain was ever distinguished by more striking manifestations of patriotic feeling and military ardour. A third bill was brought into the House by Mr. Dundas, for the revival of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, which, when a rebellion was impending in one kingdom, and when another was held in daily expectation of an invasion, could not with propriety experience any opposition.

Convinced that the dangers of the country were continually increasing, from the vast preparations accumulating on the coast of France, Mr. Pitt, on Friday, the 25th of May, moved for a bill for more effectually manning the navy; and, as his chief object was the temporary suspension of the protections of seamen, he expressed an earnest wish, that the bill should pass that day through its different stages, with a suitable pause at each if required; and that it should be sent to the Lords for their concurrence.

Mr. Tierney said, the very extraordinary manner in which the House was called upon to adopt this measure could not fail to create great and unnecessary alarm; and if the honourable gentleman persisted in hurrying the bill through its respective stages in the manner proposed, he should feel it his duty to give it his decided negative. Indeed, from all he had lately seen, he must view the measures of ministers as hostile to the liberty of the subject. Mr. Pitt, rising with considerable warmth, said—"If every measure adopted against the designs of France is to be considered as hostile to the liberties of this country, my idea of liberty differs widely from that of the honourable gentleman. If the measure be necessary, and as a notice of such an intention will enable those on whom it is meant to operate to elude its effects, how can the honourable gentleman's opposition to it be accounted for, but from a desire to obstruct the defence of the country?"——Mr. Tierney now rose, and called the Chancellor of the Exchequer to order; on which Mr. Addington, the Speaker, observed, that whatever had a tendency to throw suspicion on the sentiments of a member, if conveyed in a language that clearly marked that intention, was certainly irregular; of this the House would judge; but they would wait to hear the right honourable gentleman's explanation. Mr. Pitt said:—"If the House waited for his explanation, he feared it would wait a long time. He knew very well that it was not Parliamentary to state the motives that actuated the opinions of the members of this House; but it was impossible to go into arguments in favour of a question, without sometimes hinting at the motives that induced an opposition to the measures proposed. He submitted to the judgment of the House, the propriety of what he had urged, but he would not depart from any thing he had advanced by either retraction or explanation." Mr. Tierney immediately left the House, and the next morning sent Mr. Pitt a challenge. On Sunday afternoon, at three o'clock, the parties met on Putney-Heath, Mr. Pitt being accompanied by Mr. Dudley Ryder, and Mr. Tierney by General Walpole. After some ineffectual attempts on the part of the seconds to prevent further proceedings, the combatants took their ground, at the distance of twelve paces: a case of pistols was then fired at the same moment by both, without effect; to which another succeeded; but Mr. Pitt firing his second pistol in the air, the seconds interfered, and the matter was accommodated.†

In this year, as in the preceding, the Chancellor of the Exchequer found himself obliged to lay before the House a second estimate of supplies; when he took occasion to state, that the loan must be fifteen instead of twelve millions; and that the triple assessment, which was calculated at seven millions, would, it was apprehended, from the numerous modifications and abatements, be reduced to four millions and a half. The interest of the increased loan and deficiencies, he estimated at 763,000*l*, which he proposed to provide for by additional duties on salt, tea, dogs, horses and carriages, and by a tax on armorial bearings. The various duties on Houses and windows were, at the same time, consolidated into one table, graduating according to a regular scale, and diminished in some instances where the rise was disproportioned to the value of the Houses.

removal of ministers, which, after a long and vehement debate, was negatived by a majority of one hundred voices.

In an early period of the session, Earl Moira called the attention of the Lords to the state of Ireland, and "intreated the House to take into consideration the tendency of the oppressive and cruel system now practised with the authority of government, which, instead of removing discontents, had increased the numbers of the discontented, and would, he feared, if the system was not changed, ultimately separate Ireland from this country for ever." His Lordship's motion, to this effect, was opposed by Lord Grenville and the Lord Chancellor, on the ground that the House was not in possession of any authentic information on the subject; and that, supposing the evils complained of really to exist, the power to redress them was not vested in the British, but in the Irish Parliament. The question of adjournment was consequently put and carried. On the 16th of March, Earl Moira again brought the general state of the affairs of Ireland under consideration, and stated, that he had the affidavits of a hundred persons in his possession, to prove that torture had been employed, in extorting confessions from individuals against themselves, and against their neighbours; and that horrible devastation had been made on the Houses and property of persons accused of disaffection. The Marquis of Downshire replied, that zeal had carried the noble Lord too far in his representations against the executive government. He was ready to admit that some of the army, perhaps the undisciplined troops, might have committed excesses, but he would contend that it was not in consequence of any orders they had received either from their officers or from government. With respect to coercion, he saw the necessity of it, nor would he disguise, nor was he ashamed to acknowledge, that he was one of the first to recommend the executive government to issue the proclamation for putting the county of Down under martial law. Earl Moira rose to reply, but he was called to order by the Earl of Caernarvon, and his Lordship reluctantly suffered the conversation to drop, after observing that the documents he had referred to did not relate to any casual excesses of the troops.

Three months afterwards (June 15) Ireland being then in a state of actual rebellion, the Duke of Leinster, after an impressive speech, during the delivery of which his feelings seemed deeply agitated, moved an address, humbly requesting "that his Majesty would deign to direct the proper officers to lay before that House a full and ample statement of the facts and circumstances which led to the disastrous affairs of Ireland, and of the measures which had hitherto been pursued for the purpose of averting such momentous evils." A long and animated debate ensued; but the motion was negatived, by 51 against 18.

Lord G. Cavendish, in the House of Commons, after a pithy speech, on the same day, introduced a series of resolutions, recommending a system of policy to be adopted towards Ireland, at once firm and conciliatory, and wherein "severity should be tempered with mercy." These resolutions were seconded by Lord John Russel; but on the motion of Mr. Canning, for proceeding to the order of the day, all the resolutions were negatived, by two hundred and twelve to sixty-six members. Mr. Fox, in conformity with a notice previously given, then rose, and moved the following proposition:—"Resolved —That this House, (understanding it to be a matter of notoriety, that the system of coercion has been enforced in Ireland with a rigour shocking to humanity; and particularly that scourges and other tortures have been employed to extort confessions), is of opinion, that an immediate stop should be put to practices so disgraceful to the British name, and that our hopes of restoring tranquillity to Ireland, must arise from a change of system, as far as relates to the executive government, together with a removal from their stations of those persons by whose advice such atrocities have been perpetrated, and towards whom the people of Ireland can feel no sentiments but those of resentment and terror."

These discussions in both Houses of Parliament took place with closed doors, and the same system of secrecy was pursued on the 18th of June, when Lord Grenville rose to present a message from his Majesty, informing the House,—that the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, of different regiments of militia of this kingdom, had made to his Majesty a voluntary tender of their services, to be employed in aid of the regular and militia forces in Ireland, for the suppression of the rebellion now unhappily existing in that country; a bill was accordingly produced by Lord Grenville, and read a first time. On Tuesday, the 19th of June, the address, empowering his Majesty to accept the offer of such regiments as should be willing to serve in Ireland, was carried after an animated debate. On the 19th of June, the same subject was introduced to the House of Commons, in virtue of his Majesty's message; on which Mr. Secretary Dundas observed, that as he was not aware of any objection that could reasonably be urged against the measure, he should content himself with moving the thanks of the House to his Majesty for his most gracious communication. Mr. Nichols said, if the militia force of this kingdom were sent to Ireland, the principle of the militia bill, as originally established, would be completely abandoned. Mr. Lawrence Palk, and Mr. Pierrepoint, contended against the measure as a gross and flagrant violation of the constitution; and Mr. Banks moved, as an amendment, that the House considered the proposition suggested in his Majesty's message as of the utmost consequence, and such as required further deliberation. Mr. Secretary Windham said, it had been suggested that the House ought to pause before it agreed to the address; but were they to pause while an actual rebellion existed in one corner of the empire, while the King's troops and rebels were fighting, and not to assist the former to bring the latter to a sense of duty? The objection that the English militia had been raised merely for the protection of England, and never to be sent out of it, did not appear to him stronger than might be urged in the case of fencible corps, who had been raised on similar terms. Mr. Tierney declared, that when the minister had such a proposition to make as the present, he ought to come down to the House clothed in sackcloth and ashes. There was no official communication to that House, even of the existence of a rebellion in Ireland, but in the message, calling upon them to take this unconstitutional step, in order to suppress it. The militia was a part of the constitution: where was a substitute to be found for this body? The tenour of the oath was 'to serve faithfully in Great Britain.' Mr. Wilberforce said, he was convinced that the measure was in itself objectionable, yet he must give it his decided support, on account of necessity. On a division of the House, there appeared, for the address, 118, against it, 47 voices. Bills, founded upon the message, were afterwards passed previously to the prorogation of Parliament, on the 20th of June.

England being thus deprived of about twelve thousand of its constitutional defenders, though still under the imminent apprehension of an invasion, a spirit of military ardour at once seized and pervaded the whole kingdom; and all ranks and orders of men, eagerly formed themselves into volunteer corps, commanded by officers of their own choice, acting under temporary commissions from the King.

The present year had been ushered in by the congress of Radstadt, in which it was proposed to discuss and settle all the disputes between the French republic and the German empire. The emperor, as the head of the Germanic body, in his capacity of King of Hungary and Bohemia, had acceded to the demands of the Directory, to render the Rhine the boundary of the commonwealth, and surrender Ehrenbreitstein and Mentz; and it was imagined that the system of sacrifices and indemnities might be speedily adjusted.* However, whilst whilst the French plenipotentiaries were giving the most solemn assurances that their government panted for tranquillity, a war was suddenly declared against Switzerland, which, after a peace that had lasted for ages, were now condemned to experience all the horrors of the most rancorous hostility. The Swiss, attached from habit and interest to monarchical, were decidedly averse to republican France; and some of the cantons, Berne in particular, had not only refused during a considerable interval to recognize the French republic, but had countenanced the assembling of the emigrant army, and obliged the French minister to quit Soleure. Towards the end of the year 1797, certain menacing demands had been made by the French Directory on the Swiss cantons in general, but, for the cause just stated, it was expected that the thunder would spend its rage on Berne; and the Helvetic diet, chiefly at the instance of that state, immediately determined on a levy of twenty-six thousand men, while the armed force of two cantons, under the command of Colonel de Weiss, was sent, on the 14th of January, 1798, into the Pays de Vaud, to suppress a popular tumult, which had for its object the establishment of a democratic government. As soon as the French executive learned that Berne and Friburg had dispatched a body of soldiers and a train of artillery into the Pays de Vaud, a division of French troops just returned from Italy, was put in motion, and General Menard sent an aide-de-camp to the head quarters at Yverdun, with an intimation, "that the inhabitants of the bailiwick must be permitted to organize a government for themselves; and in case any violence was offered to them, force would be repelled by force." But this officer and his escort, being probably mistaken for an advanced guard, were either killed or wounded, and the minds of both armies became more inflamed against each other. The Vaudois in the mean time adopted a democratical form of government, and assumed the appellation of the republic of Leman. The cantons of Basle, Zurich, and Soleure, followed their example; but the Senates of Berne and Friburg, persisted in maintaining their ancient form of government.

* While this assembly was discussing the terms of a pacification, the hierarchy which had governed a considerable part of Italy, and for

The management of the war being confided to the French General Brune, he entered the territories of Berne on the 25th of January, and published a proclamation, containing professions, which appear to have been made only to be violated. Some unsuccessful attempts were made to obtain a truce, but a body of the invaders having advanced against the castle of Dornoch, seized that little fortress, while 13,000 troops summoned Soleure, which immediately opened its gates. Friburg, better prepared for resistance, determined to oppose the French; but Brune, having advanced at the head of a column, notwithstanding the gallant resistance of the garrison, headed by Verrer, the avoyer, who perished upon this occasion, took it by assault,—and on the 6th of March, the French army entered Berne. The ruling families were immediately displaced, the nature of the government was changed, the most respectable of the Senators were sent into exile, the treasures of the state were confiscated, and large military contributions exacted for the supply of the invading army. The Directory, determined on the subjugation of Switzerland, resolved to change the government from the federal into an united republic, which by means of a close and intimate union with France might be kept in continual dependance. The cantons of Berne, Zurich, Soleure and Friburg, hoping to obtain an ascendancy in the government, hastened to carry into effect the wishes of the Directory by chusing a legislature, and Arau was pitched upon as the scene of its deliberations: but the smaller states of Uri, Schwitz, Underwalden, Glaris, and Appenzel, attached to the government of their fathers, which had for ages guaranteed their liberty, and secured their happiness, refused to send deputies to the new assembly, or to recognize its authority—Having assembled in arms, and appointed Paravicini their leader, they seized on Lucerne and menaced Zurich; but finding it impossible to awaken the slumbering spirit of resistance among their countrymen, and by one great national effort to expel the invaders, they retired to the fortresses of their native mountains, and took post near the lake of Zug. The French, now commanded by General Schawenburg, immediately advanced in great force against them, and commenced an attack. The leader of the confederates perceiving that valour alone was unavailing against superior numbers, trained to the art of war, feigning to retreat, enticed the assailants into an ambuscade, in consequence of which a complete defeat ensued. This bloody battle, in which several thousands of the French perished, was soon followed by a treaty, in which, though it was agreed to accept the new constitution as a bond of general union, an express stipulation was entered into, that the internal government of the smaller cantons, should continue as before, and they were at the same time exempted from all contribution. In this arrangement Underwalden refused to acquiesce on any conditions whatever. On this the French marched a large body of troops accompanied by artillery into that canton, and after a terrible battle, commenced on the 8th and continued with little intermission to the evening of the 9th of September, during which clubs and spears were in vain opposed to muskets and bayonets, and fragments from the rocks to a regular artillery, the gallant mountaineers were overcome, the town of Standtz taken by assault; the houses in its beautiful valley destroyed by fire, the inhabitants nearly extirminated, and neither age nor sex spared by a furious and inveterate soldiery. All Switzerland now subscribed to the new constitution; Lucerne was chosen as the seat of government, and an alliance offensive and defensive entered into between the French and the Helvetic republics. This treaty, however, did not restrain the rapacity of the French Directory, who still continued to levy contributions and impose exactions, to a most enormous and unfeeling extent.

Buonaparte, averting his eyes from the north, now directed all his attention to the east. Struck by the gigantic and important plan, conceived by the superior for ages regulated the creed of a considerable portion of mankind, ceased to exist. Duphot, Chef de Brigade in the service of the French republic, having repaired to Rome, towards the end of 1797, for the purpose of espousing that sister of Buonaparte who was afterwards married to General Murat, became one of the victims of the commotions which took place on the 28th of December. On that fatal day, a mob, consisting of about one hundred persons, assembled at the palace of the French ambassador, Joseph Buonaparte, and demanded the assistance of France, for the purpose of overthrowing what they termed the papal tyranny, and establishing a republic in its stead. Joseph Buonaparte indisposed to countenance this project, dispatched Duphot to disperse the insurgents, and to prevail upon the papal troops to retire from the precincts of the ambassador's court; but while the General was engaged in this service, he was shot by a Roman fusileer. Joseph Buonaparte, after a lapse of fourteen hours, finding that no measures had been taken to avenge the late outrage, or to provide for the future security of his own person, retired into Tuscany. As soon as the murder of Duphot and the retreat of Joseph Buonaparte were made public at Milan, the people exclaimed—"Death to the assassin pontiff! Vengeance for our deliverers!" Troops were immediately levied, artillery prepared, and a declaration published, in which the fate of Rome was confidently predicted, and the odium of the late murder of the French General was cast upon the Pope and his counsellors; though it was perfectly clear, that this disastrous event produced the deepest disquietude in the breast of his holiness. The Directory feeling, or affecting to feel high indignation at the insult offered to their ambassador, and at the loss of their General, transmitted instructions to General Berthier, to march to the Roman capital. On the 10th of February (1798) the French army arrived at that place, and the castle of St. Angelo, containing the Pope and the greater part of his cardinals, surrendered on the first summons. The inhabitants, encouraged by the presence of the French army, assembled in the Campo Vaccino, the ancient Roman Forum, planted the tree of liberty in the front of the capitol, proclaimed their independence, and instituted the Roman republic. All the splendour and magnificence of which the Catholic worship is susceptible, were employed to celebrate this memorable victory over the head of its faith; every church in Rome resounded with thanks to the Supreme Disposer of events, for the glorious revolution that had taken place; and while the dome of St. Peter's was illuminated without, fourteen cardinals, dressed in the gorgeous apparel appertaining to functions they were fated soon after to abdicate, presided at a solemn Te Deum within the walls of that superb temple. The deposed pontiff was conveyed, by order of the Directory, first to Briançon, and afterwards to Valence, in France, where the infirmities of age and the pressure of misfortune terminated his existence, on the 29th of August, 1799, in the 82d year of his age, and the 24th of his pontificate.

mind of Leibnitz, whose memorial upon the subject, to Louis XIV. had been found amongst the Court archives of France, he now affected to consider Egypt but as the fulcrum whence he might stretch an immense lever across the Arabian Gulph, to overturn the empire of Britain in Hindostan; nor would powerful allies, he thought, be wanting in the native princes of the Indian Peninsula, to wage an eternal war against those who had invaded their dominions, and almost annihilated their power. The Directory, eager to find employment for armies which the plunder of Piedmont and Lombardy had sharpened rather than satiated; and by no means indisposed to the removal of a General in whose presence all their power seemed to be eclipsed, at length consented to this romantic enterprize; and although this project was founded on the spoliation of an ally, the gross injustice of the expedition was lost sight of in the splendid advantages it promised to bestow. Although the Sublime Porte had kept its faith with the French republic inviolate, an armament was fitted out for depriving the Emperor Selim III. of his precarious but acknowledged sovereignty over Egypt, which yielded an annual tribute to his treasury, and supplied his capital with corn. The ports of Marseilles and Toulon were busied in refitting and launching ships, the fabrication of cordage, and the preparation of military stores; and while all Europe was contemplating the extent and destination of the armament, Buonaparte, accompanied by a few of his chief warriors, and a multitude of artists and men of learning, hastened from Paris to the borders of the Mediterranean, where he was joined by many thousands of the army of Italy, which, by an affected and far-fetched metaphor, he now addressed as "the right wing of the army of England."

His preparations being complete, he set sail from Toulon on the 20th of May, with a formidable veteran army, consisting of nearly 40,000 men, besides an immense quantity of artillery and military stores, and leaving Sicily on the left, was joined by a squadron of Venetian men of war, commanded by Rear-Admiral Brueix, who had proceeded from Corfu nearly at the same time. To this officer, who had served with no higher rank than that of Lieutenant of the royalnavy, was intrusted the command of the fleet, and he now repaired on board the Orient, of 120 guns. After a passage of eighteen days, this armament, consisting of about 300 sail, including ships of the line, frigates, and transports, descried Malta, and at break of day the next morning, commenced a general landing of troops and artillery upon the coast, without encountering any formidable resistance.

At the dawn of the succeeding morning, the enemy had encircled the city of Valetta, and on the 12th of June, the French entered the city, and became masters of the whole island. The Grand Master Hompesch, who had ranked as a sovereign prince, finding the people destitute of the requisite union and constancy to support their independence, quitted the island, and received at his departure the sum of 100,000 livres, with an engagement on the part of the invaders, to allow him a pension of 3000 livres a year from the French treasury, no part of which was ever paid. Thus Buonaparte contrived to obtain possession of the island of Malta, containing a population of 60,000 souls, and affording one of the most advantageous stations in the Mediterranean sea; while the ancient order of St. John of Jerusalem beheld itself bereaved of its territories, after possessing them during a period of nearly three centuries. Having appointed a provisional government, Buonaparte entrusted the care of his new acquisition to General Vaubois, and again proceeded to sea. After a passage of a week, the armament arrived in sight of Candia, and in the evening of the 30th of June, the fleet anchored in the Roads of Alexandria.

As soon as the French Admiral had cast anchor on the coast of Egypt, General Buonaparte hastened to disembark his troops, and to prepare for the attack of the city of Alexandria. A summons to surrender being disregarded, he commenced his attack on the 5th of July, and in a few hours carried, by assault, with a loss only of one colonel, and seventy soldiers, killed and wounded, a city which, in the sixth century, sustained a siege of fourteen months, and inflicted a loss of twenty-three thousand men upon the besiegers. To strike terror into the inhabitants, and to preclude further resistance, a dreadful slaughter took place amongst the Mamelukes and the Arabs, after the city had surrendered.

General Dessaix, provided with two field pieces, was now dispatched towards Cairo. Buonaparte, in the interim, issued orders for the fleet to shelter itself from the enemy in the old port of Alexandria; but on sounding the channel, it was found, that there was not sufficient depth of water for the Orient, and the road of Aboukir was therefore chosen as the fittest anchorage. The cannon, cavalry, and military stores having all been disembarked, and the chief command conferred on General Kleber, a flotilla was established in the course of a few days, on the Nile, and the city of Rosetta; situated at the mouth of the western arm of that river, was subdued. On the 7th of July, the main body of the army entered the desert, and after experiencing the most terrible privations, from heat and thirst, arrived at Dementour. Allowing themselves only one day's rest they advanced to Miniet Salame, where intelligence was received, that the beys were encamped in the neighbourhood, and that an armed flotilla had descended the Nile on purpose to attack the invaders. Next morning, the Mamelukes, to the number of four thousand, were discovered near the village of Chebreisse, situated on the left bank of the river. Here two separate and distinct actions immediately took place, the one on the water and the other on the land. Buonaparte, having advanced to the support of Kleber, formed his army into five squares, with the cavalry and baggage in the centre. Impelled by their natural impetuosity, the Mamelukes commenced the attack, and were suffered to approach within the reach of grape-shot, when the cannon suddenly opened, and forced the main body of the assailants to retreat; but some, bolder than the rest, continued to advance, and met their fate either at the muzzle of the musket or the point of the bayonet.

Immediately on this defeat of the land forces, the village of Chebriesse, was carried by assault, and the flotilla belonging to the beys retired, after a desperate action, in which six hundred were killed on the side of the vanquished, and only seventy on that of the victors. The French troops, pursuing their victorious career, advanced through the deserted villages, to Ernbabé, where on the 20th of July, they beheld towards the left, those famous pyramids, which had braved the storms of three thousand years, and in front, about six thousand Mamelukes, Arabs, and Fellahs, entrenched in the plain. Buonaparte, after making the same dispositions as at Chebreisse, gave orders for a charge, and the Mamelukes, after an unsuccessful attempt to break their way through a rampart of bayonets, fell back in disorder and left the field of battle in possession of the enemy. General Dugua, availing himself of the retreat of the native troops, advanced against the village, while two divisions under Generals Rampon and Marmont were detached towards the rear, and carried the entrenchments in the face of a masked battery of forty pieces of artillery. A body of Mamelukes and Fellahs, amounting to fifteen hundred, perceiving their retreat cut off by this movement, took post behind a ditch, where they defended themselves with great bravery, but not a single man escaped the fury of the French soldiery, being all either killed by the sword, or drowned in the Nile. Murad Bey, who commanded on this occasion, being forced to retreat, left behind him four hundred camels, his artillery, baggage, and provisions; and the victors, who seized on many fine Arabian horses, superbly caparisoned, found all the purses of the vanquished Mamelukes well stored with gold. This decisive victory, obtained with the loss of ten men killed, and about thirty wounded, opened the gates of Cairo to the invaders; the chief inhabitants hastening to the camp of Buonaparte, solicited his protection, while the fortunate chieftain seized on this opportunity to visit the pyramids, and prophesied that his exploits would not be forgotten at the end of forty centuries.

Having conciliated the confidence of the sheiks and the principal families, by proclamations admirably adapted to their prejudices, and having organized a provisional government, Buonaparte marched against Mourad Bey, whom he forced to take refuge in Upper Egypt, while Ibrahim Bey, taking a contrary direction, fled towards Syria.*

The object of Buonaparte's expedition appears to have been altogether unknown in England, at the time of its sailing; but positive instructions were in consequence sent to Earl St. Vincent, then stationed off Cadiz, to select a sufficient number of line of battle ships to defeat his armament, whatever might be its destination. The First Lord of the Admiralty, in his dispatches to the Earl, says, "I think it almost unnecessary, to suggest to you the propriety of putting it under Sir Horatio Nelson." This appointment Earl St. Vincent had anticipated; and a detachment of ten sail of the line was dispatched under Captain Troubridge, to join the Rear-Admiral, who had been dispatched to the Mediterranean with a flying squadron. Rear-Admiral Nelson, thus invested with the command of a fleet of fourteen ships, thirteen of which carried seventy-four, and one fifty guns, determined to proceed in quest of the enemy. Steering his course towards Malta, he arrived off that island on the 22d of June, when he found that the enemy had quitted that place five days before his arrival, taking an eastward direction. Conjecturing, that Egypt must be the place of their destination, he sailed for the Port of Alexandria, where he arrived on the 28th, but they had not been seen on the coast of Egypt, nor could any satisfactory information be obtained at that place. Still acting upon his favourite maxim, that "perseverance in the profession will meet its reward," Nelson shaped his course northward for Caramania; thence he returned to Sicily; and, after obtaining refreshments and assistance of every kind for his squadron in the bay of Syracuse, he sailed once more for Alexandria in quest of the enemy. On approaching the coast of Egypt, on the 1st of August, he discovered thirteen sail of line of battle ships, moored in a strong and compact line, in the bay of Aboukir, the head-most vessel being close to the shoals on the N. W. and the rest of the fleet forming a kind of curve along the line of deep water, so as not to be turned on the S. W. The British Admiral, who from the anxiety of his mind, had scarcely taken either sleep or food for many days, now ordered his dinner to be served, while preparations were making for battle; and when his officers rose from table, and went to their separate stations, he exclaimed—"Before this time tomorrow I shall have gained a Peerage, or Westminster Abbey." The advantage of numbers, both in ships, guns, and men, was in favour of the French; they had thirteen ships of the line, and four frigates, carrying eleven hundred and ninety guns, and ten thousand eight hundred and ten men. The English had the same number of ships of the line, and one fifty gun ship, carrying in all one thousand and twelve guns, and eight thousand and sixty-eight men. The English ships of the line were all seventy-fours; the French had three eighty-gun ships, and one three-decker of one hundred and twenty guns; and the enemy's squadron was, in the opinion of the French commissary of the fleet, moored in such a situation, as to bid defiance to force more than double their own. The moment Admiral Nelson perceived the position of the French fleet, it struck him, that where there was room for an enemy's ship to swim, there was room for one of ours to anchor. Having explained to his captains his mode of attack, and given them the general instruction, first "to gain the victory—and then to make the best possible use of it;" the engagement commenced at six o'clock in the evening of the first of August. As soon as some of our van ships approached the small island of Bequieres, the Alert French ship began to execute the orders of Admiral Brueix, which were, to stand towards the British ships until nearly within gun shot, and then to manœuvre so as best to draw them towards the outer shoal lying off that island; but the British Admiral escaped this decoy, and hauled well round all the danger. On this island of Bequieres the French had established two batteries, but their distance rendered them useless. As our squadron advanced, the enemy opened a steady fire from the starboard side of the whole line, full into the bows of our ships; and at twenty-eight minutes past six, p. m. the French hoisted their colours. Captain Foley, who led the British van in the Goliath, had long conceived, that if the enemy were moored in line of battle in with the land, the best plan of attack would be to lead between them and the shore, because the French guns on that side were not likely to be manned, nor were ready for action; acting upon this plan of attack, he darted a-head of the enemy's foremost ship, Le Guerrier, doubled her larboard side, and having poured a destructive fire into the Frenchman, moved on to the Conquerant, whom he charged with tremendous fury, and in ten minutes shot away her masts: next followed the Zealous, Captain Hood, which attacked the Guerrier, on the side next the shore, and in twelve minutes, totally disabled her: third proceeded the Orion, Sir James Saumarez, and took her station between the enemy's fifth and sixth ships: the Theseus, Captain Miller, following the same example, encountered the third ship of enemy: the Audacious, Captain Gould, moved round to the fifth: then advanced the Vanguard, carrying the heroic Nelson, and his no less heroic Captain Berry, and anchored on the outside of the enemy's third ship, with six colours flying in his rigging, lest they should be shot away. Having veered half a cable, he instantly opened a tremendous fire; under cover of which the other four ships of his division, the Minotaur, Bellerophon, Defence, and Majestic, sailed on a-head of the Admiral. In a few minutes every man stationed at the first six guns, in the fore part of the Vanguard's deck, was killed or wounded; and three times in succession did the destructive fire of the enemy sweep away the seamen that served these guns. Captain Louis, in the Minotaur, nobly supported his friend and commander, and anchoring next a-head of the Vanguard, took off the fire of the Aquilon, the fourth in the French line. The Defence, Captain Peyton, took her station, with great judgment a-head of the Minotaur, and engaged the Franklin, of 80 guns, the sixth ship of the enemy on the starboard bow, which ship bore the flag of Admiral Blanquet de Chelard, the second in command. Thus, by the masterly seamanship of the British commanders, nine of our ships were so disposed as to bear their force upon six of the enemy. The seventh of the French line was the Orient, the Admiral's ship, a vessel of immense size, bearing one hundred and twenty guns: this stupendous adversary was undertaken by the Bellerophon, Captain Darby; while the Majestic, Captain Westcott, who engaged the Heu-

* "You will be told," observes Buonaparte, in a proclamation addressed to the inhabitants of Egypt, after the surrender of Alexandria, "that I come to destroy your religion. Do not believe it. Be assured that I come to restore your rights, to punish usurpers, and that I reverence more than the Mamelukes themselves, God, his prophet Mahomet, and the Koran. If Egypt be their farm, let them show the lease that God has given them of it. There were formerly among you great cities, great canals, and a great commerce. What has destroyed them all? What but the injustice and tyranny of the Mamelukes? "Cadis, sheiks, imans, and tchisbadjees, inform the people that we are the friends of the Mussulmans." In a visit to the pyramid of Cheops, on the 13th of August, in the company of the principal muftis and imans of the city of Grand Cairo, he used the following expressions:—"Glory to Allah! There is no God but God; Mahomet is the prophet, and I am his friend."——"The divine Koran is the delight of my soul, and the object of my contemplation. I love the prophet, and I hope ere long to see and honour his tomb in the holy city: but my mission is first to exterminate the Mamelukes."——"Adriel, the angel of death has breathed upon them; we are come and they have disappeared."——"Be faithful to Allah, the sovereign ruler of the seven marvellous heavens, and to Mahomet his prophet, who traversed all the celestial mansions in one night. Be the friend of the Franks, and Allah, Mahomet, and the Franks will recompense you."

reux, the ninth ship on the starboard bow, received also at the same time the fire of the Tonnant, which was the eighth in the line. The other four ships of the British squadron having been detached previously to the discovery of the French, were at a considerable distance when the action commenced, and the shades of night began to close in upon them before they reached the scene of action. Captain Troubridge, in the Culloden, took the lead of these ships. As he came on sounding, the increased darkness of the night had greatly increased the difficulties of the navigation; and suddenly, after having found eleven feet water, before the lead could be hove again, he was fast a-ground, on the tail of the shoal of Bequieres, nor could all his own exertions, united to those of Captain Thompson, in the Leander, and Captain Hardy, in the Mutine brig, both of which came to his assistance, get him off in time to share in the danger and the glory of the action. It was, however, some satisfaction to the mortified spirit of Captain Troubridge, that his ship served as a beacon to the Alexander and Swiftsure, which must, else, from the course they were holding, have gone considerably further on the reef, and would inevitably have been lost. These ships, after escaping the peril to which they had been exposed, entered the bay, and took their stations, enveloped in darkness, as was the whole fleet, in a manner that is remembered with general admiration. At this juncture the Bellerophon, overpowered by the huge Orient, her lights extinguished, nearly two hundred of her crew killed or wounded, and all her masts and cables shot away, was drifting out of the line, towards the lee side of the bay, when the Swiftsure, which at first mistook her for a ship of the enemy, but was soon undeceived, came up, and taking her station, opened a steady fire on the quarter of the Franklin, and the bows of the French Admiral. At the same instant, Captain Ball, with the Alexander, passed under the stern of the Orient, and anchoring within side of his larboard quarter, raked him, and kept up a severe fire of musketry on his decks. The last ship which arrived to complete the destruction of the enemy was the Leander, Captain Thompson, who took his station in such a position as to rake both the Franklin and the Orient.

The conflict was now carried on in the darkness of the night, and the only light to guide the operations of the fleets was derived from the flashes of their cannon. The two first ships of the French line had been dismasted, within a quarter of an hour from the commencement of the action, and others had suffered so severely that victory was already certain—its extent was the only remaining question. The third, fourth, and fifth ships of the enemy were taken possession of at half-past eight. While the battle raged with its utmost fury, the British Admiral received a wound in the head, from a piece of langridge shot, which cut a large flap of the skin of the forehead from the bone, and, falling over his only remaining eye, left him in total darkness. Captain Berry, on whom the command of the ship during the remainder of the action devolved, was standing near his Admiral when he received this dreadful wound, and caught him in his arms as he was falling. The great effusion of blood occasioned an apprehension that the wound would be mortal: Nelson himself thought so; and on being taken down into the cock-pit, he called his chaplain to deliver his dying remembrances to Lady Nelson; but the surgeon, on examining the wound, pronounced it to be merely superficial, and the gloom which had taken possession of the whole crew, under the agonizing apprehension of the loss of their commander, was dissipated and turned into expressions of joy. The French Admiral Brueix, who sustained the honour of his flag with undiminished firmness, and had been three times wounded during the present engagement, without quitting his station, now received a shot, which almost cut him in two: still he remained upon the deck, and this hero, so well worthy of a better fate, survived his last wound only a quarter of an hour. Soon after nine o'clock, the Orient struck her colours and appeared in flames. The fire spread with astonishing rapidity. By the prodigious light of this conflagration, the situation of the two fleets could now be distinctly seen from the towers of Rosetta, a distance of thirty miles.—Finding it impossible to extinguish the flames, those who had escaped death in battle, endeavoured to save themselves by plunging into the sea. About ten o'clock, the ship blew up with a tremendous explosion, which was succeeded by a silence not less awful. The firing, as by common consent, instantly ceased on both sides, and the first sound which broke the portentous stillness, was the dash of the shattered masts and yards falling into the water from the vast height to which they had been cast by the explosion. About seventy of the crew of the Orient were saved by the English boats, and among the many hundreds who perished, were the Commodore Casa Bianca and his son, a brave and intelligent boy about ten years of age: they were for a time seen in the water, on the wreck of the Orient's masts, seeking each other, when the ship blew up, and put an end to their hopes and their fears. The Orient had on board money to the amount of six hundred thousand pounds sterling.

After a lapse of about ten minutes, the fire re-commenced with the ships to the leeward of the centre, and continued without intermission till three o'clock the next morning. It then grew very faint till about five, when it was resumed with redoubled fury; but it was, on the enemy's part, the resistance, not of hope, but of despair. At day break, the Guillaume Tell, and the Genereux, the two rear ships of the enemy, were the only French ships of the line that had their colours flying, and in the forenoon they cut their cables and stood out to sea, taking along with them two frigates. The Zealous, worthy of her name, instantly commenced the pursuit, but as there was no other ship in a condition to support Captain Hood, he was recalled. The firing continued in the bay with some intermission till two o'clock in the afternoon, when it entirely ceased. As soon as the Admiral thought the victory secure, he issued the following order:—"Almighty God having blessed his Majesty's arms with victory, the Admiral intends returning public thanks for the same, at two o'clock this day, and he recommends every ship doing the same."

During the action,* thousands of the worshippers of Mahomet lined the shores of Egypt, and for the three successive nights the whole coast and the adjacent country were illuminated in honour of the victory.—Thus ended an engagement which will ever rank amongst the most distinguished victories in the naval annals of the world—"Victory," said Nelson, "is not a name strong enough for such a scene—it was a Conquest." The result was, that out of a fleet of thirteen sail, the Admiral's ship of one hundred and twenty guns, and the Timoleon of seventy-four were burnt; while two eighty gun-ships, and seven seventy-fours were captured; and it was the firm persuasion of the British Admiral, that had he been more amply provided with frigates, all the enemy's transports and smaller vessels in the harbour would have shared the fate of the ships of the line. This deficiency of frigates he deeply regretted, and in his usual forcible way of expressing himself, said—"Should I die at the present moment, 'Want of frigates' would be found written on my heart." The British loss in killed and wounded amounted to eight hundred and ninety-five. Of the French three thousand one hundred and five, including the wounded, went on shore by cartel, and five thousand two hundred and twenty-five perished!—constituting a loss, during that glorious, but fatal night, of upwards of five hundred human beings an hour! One British officer of the rank of captain only fell; this was the brave Captain Westcott, who was killed early in the action, and whose place was supplied with great gallantry and skill by his Lieutenant, afterwards appointed, Captain Cuthbert.*

The sensation of this victory was felt over all Europe, and even to the distant shores of India; but it was at Radstadt where the effect became the most evident.† The deputation of the empire had already agreed to a plan of indemnities, by means of which, forty-four of the secular and ecclesiastical states were to make immense sacrifices to obtain peace; but the attack on Switzerland and Rome, and the expedition of Buonaparte into Egypt, joined to the opposition he had there encountered, and the recent disaster of the French navy, rendered a new contest on the Continent unavoidable.—At this juncture too, and, partly from the same causes, the Turks declared war against France; and Russia, under the government of the Emperor Paul, became an efficient member of the new coalition preparing against the French nation. This alliance was strengthened rather by the activity than the power of the King of Naples, who, after issuing a declaration of war against the republic on the 22d of November, put his army in motion against the French on the 23d of that month, and on the 29th succeeded in making himself master of the Roman capital.—But this success was of short duration, for on the 15th of December, the Neapolitan troops sustained a signal defeat at Civita Castillana.—This disaster was followed by the immediate evacuation of Rome, and such was the hard fate of Ferdinand IV. that, on the last day of the year, he was obliged to abdicate all his continental dominions, and to take refuge on board an English man of war.

It is now proper to advert to the affairs of Ireland.—It had some time been evident, that a dark and dangerous connection was carrying on between the heads of the society of United Irishmen and the French government, which a short time matured into a treasonable conspiracy, and which had for its aim nothing less than the subversion of the government of Ireland, and the entire dissolution of its connection with the sister kingdom. It is due, however, to the catholics, to observe, that the conspirators were by no means exclusively of that community; and that, reform, and catholic emancipation, were, by the leaders of the mal-contents, used rather to entrap the unwary, than as the true object of those under whose banners the great mass of the disaffected were preparing to shed their blood, and to sacrifice every enjoyment, personal and domestic. So early as the year 1794, the French government had sent an agent, a clergyman of the established church of England, and a native of Ireland, into these kingdoms, to acquire intelligence; and Jackson, the agent of the republic, at first took up his residence at the house of a British merchant, of the name of Stone, at Old-ford, near London. Finding, however, that the project of an invasion of England was hopeless, he repaired to Ireland, whence he carried on a correspondence with his friend, the English merchant; but they were both soon afterwards apprehended, and tried on a charge of high treason; when Stone was pronounced not guilty; but Jackson was convicted, and at the moment when sentence of death was about to be passed upon him, he fell down suddenly, and expired in the court. The conviction of Jackson served as an intimation to Mr. Theobald Wolfe Tone, a barrister-at-law, and the reputed founder of the society of United Irishmen, to abscond to France, along with Mr. Hamilton Rowan, and some other distinguished members of that dangerous association. In 1795, soon after the departure of Earl Fitzwilliam from Ireland, the society of United Irishmen received an important accession of men of talents and influence, among whom are to be enumerated, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, late a member of the Irish Parliament; the nephew and presumptive heir of Lord Longueville; Dr. M'Nevin, chairman of the catholic committee; Mr. Oliver Bond, an opulent Dublin merchant; and Mr. Emmet, a barrister.—About the close of that year, a regular communication was opened by the leaders of the society, with the French Directory, through the medium of

* The victory of the 1st and 2d of August was celebrated throughout England with bonfires and illuminations. His Majesty conferred the dignity of Baron of Great Britain, with a pension of three thousand a year, on the Admiral, who was called to the House of Peers, by the style and dignity of Baron Nelson of the Nile. The Grand Signior also transmitted a superb diamond chelengk, or plume of triumph, taken from one of the imperial turbans, and the King of Naples, at a latter period, granted the title of Duke of Bronte, with an estate in Sicily. Captains Berry and Thompson received the honour of knighthood, and the other commanders were presented with gold medals. The Turkish Sultan sent a purse of two thousand sequins to be distributed amongst the wounded, and the English nation did themselves the honour to raise by public subscription a much larger sum for the widows and children of those who perished in the action.

† In England, this year, during the spring, an expedition was fitted out against Maritime Flanders, for the express purpose of blowing up the bason, gates, and sluices of the Bruges canal, as well as destroying the internal navigation, by means of which, transport-schuyts, instead of risking a sea voyage, were enabled to keep up an internal intercourse between Holland, France, and Flanders.—An armament accordingly sailed for the purpose, from Margate roads, on the 18th of May, under Captain (now Sir Home) Popham, with a body of troops, consisting of twelve hundred men, commanded by Major-General Coote. On the arrival of the expedition before Ostend, the necessary preparations were made for a descent, and while the Woolvereen, Asp, and Biter, returned the fire of the batteries, the Hecla and Tartarus bombs threw their shells with so much rapidity and precision, that the town was set on fire in several places, and the shipping did not escape without damage. On the 19th, a landing was effected to the north west, without opposition, and as soon as the soldiers had formed, they proceeded to burn several boats, demolish the sluice-gates, and effect a grand explosion, by which it was intended to destroy a great national work, which had cost the states of Bruges an immense sum of money, and had not been completed with a labour of five years. Thus having, as was supposed, rendered the Bruges canal unserviceable, the commander-in-chief attempted about noon to return on board the shipping, but he soon discovered that the wind was so high, and the surf so much increased, that the attempt was impracticable. Upon this it was deemed proper to occupy a position upon the sand hills, at a little distance from the beach, and by way of gaining time, the governor of Ostend was summoned to surrender; but this fate was unhappily reserved for the invaders themselves, as that officer found means in the course of the night to assemble a great force, with which he hemmed in the English early in the morning, and all resistance being in vain, they surrendered, after a gallant defence, in the course of which, Major-General Coote himself was wounded. Captain Popham endeavoured without effect to obtain an exchange of prisoners, and it appears at first to have been the intention of the French government to oblige the British troops to labour at the reparation of the works they had destroyed; but it was found on inspection, that the damage was but trifling, every thing being in a short time restored to its former state.

In the month of November, a small armament was dispatched against Minorca, under the command of Admiral Duckworth, and General Stuart. After a short and feeble resistance, the garrison surrendered to the British force, which did not sustain the loss of a single man.

The British government, finding that no portion of the island of St. Domingo could be restrained without immense sacrifices, instructed Major-General Maitland to agree with Toussaint L'Ouverture, now Commander-in-Chief in that colony, where he had formerly been a slave, to leave the island, on condition that he would guarantee the lives and property of all the inhabitants who might choose to remain; and these conditions being readily accepted, the British force sailed from the island on the 9th of May.

Mr. Tone and other Irish refugees; and early, in the following year, a proposition was received from the French government, and accepted by the secret committee of the society of United Irishmen, to send over an army to Ireland to assist in the projected effort to subvert the monarchy, and to separate Ireland from her British connection. The first agents of the insurgents demanded from France any number of troops not more than ten nor less than five thousand; but the French shewed a decided inclination, to send an army sufficient to conquer and to retain possession of the country—fifty or sixty thousand at least. Three armaments, one from Spain, a second from France, and a third from Holland, were destined to sail for the coast of Ireland, in the same year; but the defeat of the Spanish fleet by Earl St. Vincent, and that of the Batavian fleet by Lord Duncan, entirely disconcerted this plan of invasion. These disasters by no means discouraged the insurgents, who had their expectations buoyed up by an assurance, on the part of the French Directory, that such succours as circumstances would admit should arrive in Ireland from France, in the month of April, or May, 1798. At the commencement of this year, a grand effort was resolved upon:—In the month of February, a military commission was appointed by the executive council of the insurgents, and nocturnal assemblies were held in various parts of the kingdom, where the people were trained to the use of arms, to be directed in open warfare against government. At the same time, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, one of the pretended Executive Directory, repaired to London with an intention of proceeding to France, in company with one Binns, a very active member of the London Corresponding Society, James Quigley, an Irish priest, and two attendants of the names of Allen and Leary. Attempts had been recently made, with some success, to form a society of United Englishmen, on the model of the United Irish, and Quigley and Binns were the chief promoters of this design. In and about the town of Manchester only, the association had extended itself to no fewer than eighty divisions, containing from fifteen to thirty-six members each, and an association of the same nature was also established in Scotland, both of them maintaining an intimate intercourse with the original Corresponding Society in London, and acting upon the system marked out by the affiliated societies of Ireland. Government having received accurate intelligence relative to the motions and designs of O'Connor and his associates, these conspirators were taken into custody at Margate, in the attempt to obtain a passage to France, on the 28th of February. After being confined some time in the Tower, they were removed to Maidstone, where they were tried by a special commission, on the 21st and 22d of May, two days before the breaking out of the rebellion in Ireland; and Quigley, on whose person was found a paper, purporting to be an address "from the Secret Committee of England to the Executive Directory of France," was capitally convicted; and such was his devotion to the principles he had espoused, that he died with heroic fortitude, in what he considered the cause of his country. No evidence appearing against Allen and Leary, they were immediately set at liberty; but O'Connor and Binns, notwithstanding their acquittal, were detained on another charge of high-treason, preferred against them by the British government. After the proclamation of many districts in the southern and midland counties, the imprisonment and transportation of several persons implicated in the conspiracy, and other acts of power, a very severe wound was inflicted, on the 12th of March, upon the union, by the arrest of the thirteen members composing the provincial committee of Leinster, with other principals of the conspiracy, at the House of Mr. Oliver Bond, in Dublin. This arrest was grounded on the information of Thomas Reynolds, a Roman Catholic gentleman, of Kilkea Castle, in the county of Kildare, colonel of a regiment of United Irishmen, treasurer of the county in which he resided, and provincial delegate for Leinster. In these arrests were included the most active and efficient leaders of the union, and among others, Thomas Eddis Emmet, Doctor William James M'Niven, and Oliver Bond.

At the same time, a warrant was issued against Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and a thousand pounds offered for his apprehension; but his Lordship for some time eluded the vigilance of the police, and remained for several weeks concealed in the city of Dublin. At length, however, he was discovered, on the 19th of May, in the House of Nicholas Murphy, a merchant, in Thomas-street, Dublin, in consequence of a hint given by Murphy's servant maid to a military suitor. On the police officers entering the room, the infatuated nobleman made a desperate, but hopeless effort to effect his escape, in which he wounded Mr. Justice Swan and Captain Ryan dangerously—the latter mortally; and was himself so desperately wounded in the shoulder by the shot of a pistol from Major Sirr, that, after languishing till the third of the following month, he died in extreme agony. This young nobleman, who was brother to the Duke of Leinster, and married to a French Lady of the royal blood of the Capets, a daughter of the late Duke of Orleans, was eminently qualified for the excitement and direction of revolutionary commotions, being a man of daring courage, a most active spirit, considerable powers of mind, and of a family highly respected for its ancient greatness by the lower classes of the Irish—the loss of such a man to the insurgent cause, and at such a juncture, cannot be estimated. The vacancies created in the directorial and other departments, by these arrests, were supplied without difficulty, but with men much less fit for the arduous task of overturning a settled government. Among the members of the new Directory were two brothers, of the name of Sheares, barristers by profession, and, politics apart, of unsullied reputation. To these new Directors, a government agent of the name of Captain Armstrong found ready access, and by a shew of great zeal in the cause, he had the address to obtain the confidence of the leaders, from whom he learned, "that a general rising must immediately take place; that the impatience of the people since the criminal prosecutions could no longer be restrained; and that it was become necessary to make a great and immediate national effort, and to relinquish the original plan of waiting for French succours." The project proposed was to seize the camp of Loughlin's-town, the artillery at Chapelizod, and the castle of Dublin, all on the night of the 23d of May: and it was further determined, that a simultaneous rising should take place at Cork. On the 21st of that month, however, the two brothers John and Henry Sheares, with some others of the principal conspirators, were apprehended; the city and county of Dublin were declared by the Lord-Lieutenant and council to be in a state of insurrection; the guards at the castle, and at all the great objects of attack, were trebled; and the whole city was in fact converted into a garrison. Amongst the precautions taken on this occasion by government, was the augmentation of the several corps of armed yeomanry, a species of force that was first embodied in the month of October, 1796, in a kind of independent companies. These yeomanry corps were each composed of about fifty men, mostly cavalry, with a much smaller body of infantry attached to them, and were generally commanded by a captain and two lieutenants; the infantry being armed like a regular army, and the cavalry furnished with a pistol and sword each, to which sometimes a carbine was added. In six months from their first establishment, the numbers increased to thirty-seven thousand; and during the rebellion the yeomanry force exceeded fifty thousand.*

Of the means accumulated by the disaffected for carrying

* In 1759, under the administration of the Duke of Bedford, an alarming spirit of insurrection appeared in the south of Ireland, which manifested itself by numerous and frequent risings of the lower class of Roman Catholics, dressed in white uniforms, whence they were rying their revolutionary enterprises into effect, some estimate may be made from the following facts: a paper, in his own hand writing, was given by Lord Edward Fitzgerald to Mr. Reynolds, the informer, which purported to be a return made by a national committee meeting, held the 26th of February, 1798, and from which it appeared, that the number of armed men in Ulster, Leinster, and Munster, amounted to two hundred and sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and ninety-six! and that the sum of 1485*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* was in the hands of the treasurer. Another return made by a meeting of Colonels, held on the 28th of March, 1798, reported, that their adherents, even among the King's troops, were in the proportion of one in every three, and that the insurgents were in sufficient force to disarm all the military within the bounds of their own counties. That the armoury of the rebel force was at one time most extensive cannot be doubted, when it is stated, that the following number of arms was seized by the different general officers in the year 1797, in the provinces of Leinster and Ulster alone; guns, 49,109—bayonets, 1,756—pistols, 4,463—swords, 4,183—blunderbusses, 248—musket-barrels, 119—sword-blades, 106—ordnance, 22—pikes, 70,630—exclusive of many arms seized or surrendered, which are not included in this return. In the same year, 14,973 pikes were surrendered in the county of Kildare alone, in consequence of the pardon offered by government to the repentant. And, in Dublin, on the 11th of May, 1798, five pieces of cannon, and five hundred pike-handles, were seized.

Sir Ralph Abercrombie having been appointed on the 12th of December, 1797, commander-in-chief of the forces in Ireland, his first step in the discharge of his public duty was to make a tour of observation throughout the island. The excesses committed by the military in the provinces called down the General's severe reprehension, and on his return to the capital, he caused it to be notified in general orders, "That the irregularities of the troops in Ireland had too unfortunately proved the army to be in a state of licentiousness, which must render it formidable to every one but the enemy." The General, after the publication of his general orders, and under the influence of the observations he had made in his recent view of the country, endeavoured to impress the minds of those in power with his own opinions, that coercive measures to the extent determined upon were by no means necessary in Ireland. But not having succeeded in producing the effect he intended by these representations, and unwilling to tarnish his military fame, or to risk the loss of his humane and manly character, by leading troops to scenes of civil desolation, he resigned the chief command of the army in Ireland on the 29th of April, 1798, after holding that appointment little more than four months, and was succeeded by General Lake. In the month of March, orders were issued to the army by the Lord-Lieutenant, to proceed into the disturbed counties; and a manifesto, dated from head-quarters at Kildare, was on the 3d of the ensuing month addressed to the inhabitants, requiring them to surrender their arms in the space of ten days from the notice, on pain of large bodies of troops being distributed among them to live at free quarters; promising at the same time rewards to such as would give information of concealed arms or ammunition, but denouncing exemplary severities if the country should continue in a disturbed state. On the advance of the military into the other counties, a similar notice was given to the inhabitants, and the troops in the county of Kildare, and part of those in the counties of Carlow and Wicklow, were quartered in the houses of the disaffected or suspected, in numbers proportioned to the supposed guilt and ability of the owners. Great numbers of houses with their furniture were burnt, where concealed arms were found, or whose occupants had been guilty of the fabrication of pikes, or other illegal practices for the promotion of the conspiracy. Many irregularities were of course committed by common soldiers, without the approbation or knowledge of their officers, and many other acts of severity by persons not in the army—some from an unfeigned zeal for the service of the crown, and others to promote sinister purposes, or to gratify a spirit of personal animosity.

It now became evident, that nothing short of one of those tremendous convulsions, which shake states to their centre, could clear the political atmosphere of Ireland. The rebel chiefs had decided on open war, and the 23d of May was the day appointed for the general rising of the country.

Subsequently to the arrest of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, the command of the rebel army devolved upon Mr. Samuel Neilson, who meditated an attack upon Newgate, in the city of Dublin, for the purpose of rescuing Lord Edward. With this view he assembled, at a house in Church-Lane, fifteen of the insurgent Colonels, on the night of the 22d of May, and having produced a map of the city, he assigned to each of them the post which they and their regiments were to occupy. In this operation Neilson was to have been seconded by a large body of rebels, headed by a chief of the name of Seagrave, by whose division a constant fire was to be kept up in front of the prison, while another party scaled the walls in a different quarter. Having carried the prison, the vice-regal residence, usually called the castle, was marked out as the next object of attack. This edifice was to be assailed in front and rear by different parties, while a select band was to ascend by ladders into the apartments of the principal members of government, and to secure their persons. Nor was it intended that the insurrection should be confined merely to the metropolis; the plan embraced the whole kingdom, and the signal for the general rising was to be the stoppage of the mail were denominated "White Boys." The alledged object of these illegal proceedings, was, to prevent the inclosures of commons, the extortions of tythe proctors, and the exorbitant fees exacted by their own clergy. As soon as the excesses committed by these disturbers of the public peace had begun to subside, two rival factions arose, in 1784, and became distinguished by the names of "Defenders," and "Peep-of-day boys." These associations, originating, in a violent quarrel between two obscure individuals, soon assumed a religious distinction, and as the Roman Catholics, or Defenders, shewed uncommon zeal in collecting arms, the presbyterians, or peep-of-day-boys, began to disarm them, by visiting the houses of their antagonists at an early hour in the morning, when they often committed the most wanton outrages. The excesses on both sides at length became so intolerable, that it was found necessary to interpose the strong arm of the law. In the autumn and winter of 1792, so many barbarous outrages were committed by the defenders, whose numbers had enabled them to triumph over their adversaries, that, at the spring assizes in the county of Louth, in 1793, twenty-one defenders were sentenced to die, twenty-five to be transported, twelve to be imprisoned a certain time, for having conspired to murder different persons, thirteen indicted for murder traversed their trials, and bench warrants were issued against eighty other offenders who had all absconded. Nor were the crimes or the punishments all confined to one party, for at the assizes of Armagh, in the year 1795, three defenders, and two peep-of-day-boys, were all tried before Baron Power, and being convicted of the crimes laid in the indictment, his Lordship awarded against the whole number the punishment of death, which was promptly executed. The society of United Irishmen, which for some time was quite of a civil nature, is represented as having commenced in the spring of 1792, and as formed on the suggestion of Mr. Theobald Wolfe Tone. The organization of this society was completed in Ulster, on the 10th of May, 1795; and it was not till the autumn of the following year, when Catholic emancipation and a reform in Parliament, the ostensible wish of all, were regarded as not otherwise attainable than by force, that the association began to assume a military form. Such, however, was its rapid progress, that in April, 1797, the number of men in Ulster alone, enrolled for insurrection, amounted to nearly one hundred thousand, provided, some with fire-arms, others with pikes, a store of ammunition, and a number of cannon. The spring of action with the defenders was religious animosity. The main object of the United Irishmen, when they became an organized military body, was, to combine all sects and parties in an alliance for the purpose of overturning the existing government. About the period when the society of United Irishmen began to assume a military character, another community arose, the object of which was declared to be "the preservation of public order, of the existing system of government, and the protection of all persons who conduct themselves with loyalty, without regard to difference of religion." Between the United Irishmen and this society, which was founded by the protestants of Armagh, in the year 1795, and took its name from William III. Prince of Orange, the zealous supporter of the reformed religion in Ireland, mortal animosities almost instantly arose; and, for some time previously to the breaking out of the rebellion, both parties had disgraced themselves by the commission of the most dreadful excesses.

coaches. This part of the project was indeed carried into effect, for, on the 23d, the Belfast mail coach was detained and burnt at Santry, the Cork mail at Naas, and that travelling in the direction of Athlone, at Lucan; but the rebels, not satisfied with detaining the Limerick mail, barbarously murdered both the guard and coachman near the Curragh of Kildare. Early in the morning of the 23d, all the yeomen in the city, amounting to about 3,500, and the few military in the garrison, were ordered by General Lake to repair to the respective alarm posts, while the Lord Mayor, Alderman Thomas Fleming, placed the city of Cork militia, with two battalion guns, at the north side of Stephen's green. It fortunately happened, that the royal canal and the grand canal, each fifty feet broad, and twelve feet deep, formed a complete fortification on the north and south sides of the city, and all the bridges of the city being occupied by military, the communication with the disaffected from without was in a considerable degree cut off.

This operation was not however carried into complete effect, as nearly 3000 men entered the city to the north, on the evening of the 23d, for the purpose of joining the insurgents. A large body of rebels, armed with pikes and muskets, assembled in Eccles-street, and its environs, as well as in various other parts of the city, and great numbers were advancing towards Dublin, with an intention of rushing into the city, as soon as the insurgents had carried the castle. At this crisis, Neilson, the rebel chief, was apprehended in the streets, by Mr. Gregg, after a desperate struggle; and on their leader being committed to prison, several thousand rebels, who were waiting with impatience the signal of attack, dispersed in various directions. By this means, the city was saved from the horrors of the impending struggle, for it appeared, on the evidence of two united Irishmen, that they were waiting for the orders of Neilson to rise in arms that night, with some thousands of the disaffected, to liberate the prisoners in Newgate and Kilmainham, and to surprise the castle and the city.—On the information of the same men, a great quantity of pikes were discovered, together with a travelling forge, on which was inscribed a disloyal and inflammatory motto. The plan of the rebels was, it appeared, to assemble by beat of drum; and it is well known, observes Sir Richard Musgrave, in his Memoirs of the Rebellion, "That, in another hour, the fate of the city and its loyal inhabitants would have been decided; for the mass of the people, armed with pikes and other weapons, were lurking in lanes and bye-places, ready to start forth on the first beat of their drums, and would have occupied all the streets, and assassinated the yeomen, before they could have reached their respective stations."—On the night of the 23d, and during the following day, several skirmishes were fought in the counties adjoining the seat of government, and the towns of Naas, Clane, Prosperous, Ballymore, Eustace, and Kilcullen, were attacked by the insurgent force; and Carlow, Hacketstown, and Monastereven, had to withstand similar assaults on the two following days. These feeble and unconnected efforts were not countenanced by a general rising; for Ulster, in which province alone 150,000 United Irishmen are said to have been enrolled and mustered, declined the contest, in consequence of the unpromising state of their affairs; and the progress of rebellion, unsanctioned even by the formality of a manifesto, had hitherto rather resembled the capricious freaks of a discontented mob, than the united efforts of a large portion of the nation.* War being openly commenced by the conspirators, the Lord Lieutenant issued a proclamation on the 24th, giving notice that orders were conveyed to all his Majesty's general officers in Ireland, to punish according to martial law, by death or otherwise, all persons acting or in any manner assisting in the rebellion. The day following presented an opportunity for carrying into effect these heavy denunciations. On the 24th of May, an unusually large assemblage of the insurgents in the neighbourhood of Carlow, forty miles south-west of Dublin, indicated that an attack upon that place had been decided upon. On the 25th, the garrison, consisting of about four hundred and fifty, regular and militia force, under the command of Colonel Mahon, was attacked at two o'clock, by a body of the insurgents, amounting to 1000 or 1500 men. The rebels had assembled at the house of Sir Edward Crosbie, a mile and a half from Carlow, and on their advance into the town, they received so destructive a fire from the garrison, that they recoiled, and endeavoured to retreat, but finding their flight intercepted, numbers took refuge in the houses, which being immediately fired by the soldiery, they met a miserable fate. About eighty houses were consumed in the conflagration, and for some days the roasted remains of human beings were falling down the chimnies, in which many of them had perished. The total loss of the rebels, on this occasion, could not be estimated at fewer than five hundred, while not an individual on the side of the loyalists was even wounded. After the defeat, the executions commenced, and about two hundred of the insurgents were hanged or shot.

While, by the successful operations of the loyalists, the communication was laid open between the various parts of the kingdom and the capital, which had for some days actually sustained a species of blockade, an insurrection burst out in a part of the kingdom where it was least expected, and in a few days the county of Wexford was in a flame. On the night of the 26th of May, the standard of rebellion was hoisted between Gorey and Wexford, and Father John Murphy, a Romish priest, of Boulavogue, placed himself at the head of the insurgents. Unfortunately, government, influenced by the representations of Earl Mountnorris, had not placed more than six hundred troops in the county of Wexford. On the 27th of May, being Whit-Sunday, two large bodies of the insurgents, both men and women, were collected, one on the hill of Oulart, mid-way between Gorey and Wexford, the other on Kilthomas-Hill, an inferior ridge of Slyieve-Bevee mountain, about nine miles west of Gorey. On the morning of the 27th, a body of yeomen, not exceeding three hundred, attacked the insurgents on the hill of Kilthomas, amounting to from two to three thousand, and commanded by Michael Murphy, another Romish priest. The infantry of the loyalist army, flanked at a considerable distance by the cavalry, advanced intrepidly up the hill, when the rebel force, notwithstanding their superior numbers, became panic-struck, and retreated in disorder, leaving one hundred and fifty of their companions dead on the field. The assailants, not satisfied with a victory so honourable to their skill and courage, tarnished the laurels of the day, by burning two Romish chapels, and about one hundred cabins and farm-houses, belonging to persons of that community, in their line of march. Very different from the battle of Kilthomas was the result of another action fought on the same day, on the hill of Oulart, and where Father John Murphy commanded in person. The insurgents, finding their retreat cut off, attacked their opponents with an impetuosity that overthrew all opposition, and so successful were their efforts, that a whole picked detachment of 110 men, from the North Cork militia was slain, with the exception of Colonel Foote and four of his men; while the loss of the rebels was only three men killed and six wounded. Father John marched from Oulart, flushed with victory. Passing through Camolin and Ferns, his force advanced to Enniscorthy, and that place was attacked about one o'clock in the afternoon of Monday, the 28th of May, by a rebel force amounting to seven thousand, of which about eight hundred were armed with muskets. Victory, which fluctuated for three hours, at length took her stand in the rebel ranks, and the military having no cannon to support them, were at length so completely overpowered as to be driven to the necessity of sounding a retreat. On this occasion, the loss of the garrison, including volunteers, amounted to about ninety. The loss of the rebels is differently estimated, but the probability is that at least three hundred of them fell.

* The insurrection prevailed principally in the counties of Kildare, Wicklow, Carlow, and Wexford, in the province of Leinster, and to the south of Dublin. Maynooth, Clane, Prosperous, and Naas, all in the county of Kildare, are none of them at a greater distance than 17 miles from the metropolis. Tinehaly and Arklow, in the adjoining county of Wicklow, are each about 35 miles from Dublin. Continuing the route southward, Hacketstown, Carlow, and Tullow, in the county of Carlow, are all within about 40 miles of that city. And passing into the still more southern county of Wexford, the principal seat of insurrectionary warfare, Gorey, in the N. E. and Newtownbarry or Buncludy, in the N. W. are each about 45 miles S. of Dublin, and 15 miles N. of Enniscorthy, which latter place, situated in the centre of the county of Wexford, at the western base of Vinegar-hill, is 58 miles S. of Dublin, 15 miles N. E of New Ross, and 11 miles N. of Wexford, where the standard of insurrection was so long unfurled. Wexford, the shire town of the county of that name, is 3 miles to the E. of the rebel station of Three Rocks, 19 miles E. of New Ross, and 67 miles S. of Dublin.

On the part of the insurgent force, the next movement was to Vinegar hill, near Enniscorthy. While they halted at this place on the 29th, Mr. John Henry Colclough, of Battyteig, and Mr. Edward Fitzgerald, of Newpark, who, with Mr. Beauchamp Bagnel Harvey, of Bargycastle, had previously been committed by the loyalists to the prison at Wexford, on suspicion of having favoured the rebel cause, were dispatched with a commission to endeavour to prevail on them to disperse. This unpromising mission entirely failed; and Mr. Colclough was ordered to return to Wexford, while Mr. Fitzgerald was detained by the enemy. So prompt were the rebels in their movements, that before the evening of the same day, their advanced guard was pushed forward to Three Rocks, within three miles of Wexford, and fixed upon that eminence as one of their future military stations. On the approach of the enemy, the consternation of the inhabitants of Wexford became extreme: suspicion haunted every bosom; and as a measure of precaution, orders were issued to extinguish all the fires, even those of the bakers, and to unroof all the thatched houses in the town, to prevent the incendiary operations of the disaffected. In this extremity, multitudes repaired for refuge on board the ships in the harbour; the shops were all shut, and many of the affrighted inhabitants sought security in flight. The military force at this time in Wexford consisted of three hundred of the North Cork militia, commanded by Colonel Foote; two hundred of the Donegal militia, under Colonel Maxwell; and five troops of yeomen cavalry; which, with two hundred armed inhabitants, principally Roman Catholics, amounted in the whole to about twelve hundred men. The command of this force devolved upon Colonel Watson, of the Shilmalier cavalry, who had formerly filled the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel in the army, and who discharged the arduous duties of his present situation with activity and skill.

The whole of the 29th was employed in preparation for the expected attack of the rebel force, amounting in number to at least fifteen thousand men, and now assembled at the Three Rocks station. In the course of the evening of that day, it was announced to the garrison, that General Fawcett was marching to Wexford from the fort of Duncannon, and that his arrival with a strong reinforcement of troops might be hourly expected. The General, having arrived in the night at Taghmon, pushed forward a detachment of eighty-eight men, including eighteen of the artillery with a howitzer, under the command of Captain Adams, of the Meath militia; but this detachment was unfortunately intercepted on the morning of the 30th, near the camp at Three Rocks, and after a sharp engagement, in which a majority of their number was killed, the survivors with their howitzer, fell into the hands of the enemy. The General, who had halted at Taghmon, on receiving the account of this disastrous affair, retreated precipitately towards Duncannon. The defeat of this detachment, and the subsequent retreat of the force under General Fawcett, remained unknown to the troops in Wexford for several hours; and Colonel Maxwell, acting upon the supposition that the General would be able to take the rebels in the rear, while he attacked them in front, sallied forth from the town on the morning of the 30th, taking with him the principal part of the regular force at that time in the garrison: but this operation proved altogether unsuccessful, and the Colonel was glad to secure his retreat, with the loss of Lieutenant-Colonel Watson killed, and two privates wounded. On the return of the military from this unfortunate enterprise, a council of war was hastily assembled, at which it was determined to evacuate the town, and Mr. Counsellor Richards and his brother were appointed to proceed to the enemy's camp, for the purpose of informing their chiefs that the town would be surrendered into their hands without further resistance, on condition that the persons and property of the inhabitants should be respected. In the mean time the military, without apprising the inhabitants of their intention, had commenced their retreat, taking the route for Duncannon fort; and the insurgents, after some further parley, poured into the town over the wooden bridge by thousands, shouting, and exhibiting every mark of extravagant exultation. Their first step was to proceed to the prison, whence they instantly liberated Mr. Harvey, and insisted that he should become their commander. The inhabitants, rendered hospitable by their fears, entertained the rebels with great profusion, and every house in the town, not previously deserted, soon became decorated with green. After various scenes of disorder naturally attendant on such an occasion, parties were dispatched in boats to bring on shore all the men, arms, and ammunition, they could find in the ships and other vessels in the harbour. Among the persons brought on shore was Mr. John Boyd, the brother of Captain James Boyd. This unfortunate gentleman being immediately recognized, he was piked upon the beach; and a butcher of the name of George Sparrow, who had in some way rendered himself obnoxious to these sanguinary wretches, shared the same fate.

The inhabitants of Wexford enjoyed a temporary repose on the night of the 30th, which passed in comparative tranquillity; but early on the morning of the 31st, the streets were again crowded, and the confusion and plunder of the preceding day re-commenced. After much intreaty, the insurgent force was induced to move out of the town and encamp on Windmill-hills, where they divided into two bodies. After the main body had quitted the town, however, there remained a kind of rebel authority in the place, which assumed the office of supplying the camps, and issuing proclamations. The office of military commander was confided to Captain Keugh; and each of the wards had a company of guards, who performed the garrison duty of the place, and held a regular morning and evening parade.

By this time, the insurrection had become general throughout the country, except where the people were kept down by the presence of the military: all the forges, both in town and country, were in consequence continually employed in fabricating pike-blades; and timber of every description, fit for handles, was procured for that purpose. Four oyster smacks were fitted out in the harbour, and manned with five-and-twenty men each, to cruise off the bay, and to bring in vessels laden with provisions, to supply the markets, which were totally deserted by the farmers. All specie seemed to have vanished during the insurrection, and bank notes were held in such low estimation, that great quantities of them were destroyed in lighting tobacco-pipes, and in wadding for fire-locks. So much indeed was the value of paper money depreciated, and of specie advanced, that a pound of beef was regularly sold in the market of Wexford for one penny in cash, when a bank note of the nominal value of twenty shillings would not purchase the same weight of that commodity. Whilst the southern part of the county of Wexford was in this horrible state of commotion, the northern baronies towards Gorey were all frightfully agitated. On the morning of the 1st of June, the beautiful little town of Bunclody, three miles north-west of Enniscorthy, was attacked by a detachment of rebels, from the camp at Vinegar-hill, amounting to about five thousand in number, and commanded by Father Kern, a man of extraordinary stature, strength, and ferocity. The garrison, consisted of about five hundred, of whom three hundred were militia, under Colonel Lestrange, of the King's county regiment. After a sharp engagement, during which the loyalists were at one time obliged to quit the town, the rebels were at length defeated, with a loss of about two hundred slain, while the loss on the side of the victors amounted only to two privates. This victory was of no small importance, as a different result would have opened a way for the Wexford rebels into the county of Carlow, the rising of whose inhabitants to co-operate with those of Wicklow and Kildare, already in arms, must have given great embarassment to government.

Whilst one division of the Wexfordian army, under Father John Murphy, were prosecuting their victorious career in the north; the other division, under Beauchamp Bagnel Harvey, advanced to the west for the purpose of attacking New Ross, and took up their station on Carrickbyrne-hill, within six miles of that place. From Carrickbyrne they advanced on the 4th of June to Corbet-hill, an eminence about a mile and a half from Ross, and formed on its summit with some appearance of regularity. But the capture of the town was an object of considerable difficulty, as the garrison, which was commanded by Major-General Johnson, consisted of twelve hundred effective men, exclusive of one hundred and fifty yeomen, who had been for some time prepared for the attack, and were all judiciously stationed. About five o'clock in the morning of the 5th, 30,000 insurgents advanced against the town, in an irregular manner, uttering hideous yells: of this motley phalanx about one-fourth part was armed with muskets, and the remainder with pikes, in addition to four small field-pieces, and a few swivels. The rebels having marched up to the place with great bravery, drove in the advanced guard, and took possession of the alarm post. The first onset was furious, but they were repulsed at the Three-bullet gate, and charged with impetuosity by a detachment of the fifth dragoons: they, however, instantly rallied, and seized on a piece of artillery which they immediately turned against the troops. Having succeeded in this enterprise, they entered the town in great force, and, notwithstanding cannon were planted at the cross lanes, so as to sweep the streets as they advanced, such were the weight and impetuosity of the column formed by the assailants, that the main body of the garrison, overpowered by numbers, and intimidated also perhaps by the late successes of the rebels, fled over the bridge with great precipitation, to the right bank of the Barrow, taking the road to Kilkenny. The commanding officer, who had served during the war on the Trans-atlantic continent, indignant at beholding the success of the revolters, and the sudden panic of his own troops, rode up to the fugitives, and demanded if they meant to forsake their leader and their country? Being received with three cheers, he placed himself at their head, and advanced towards the Three-bullet gate, where a post was still maintained by the English. Having thus re-animated his men, he advanced against the dissipated column of the enemy; and that nothing might be wanting to secure the fortune of the day, he contrived to turn their rear, at the same time manning the trenches on the outside so far as to prevent the arrival of reinforcements. The assailants, who had not improved their first advantage, were now dispersed and overcome; and as raw troops can never be rallied, they retreated with the utmost speed, first to Corbet, and then to Carrickbyrne-hills, leaving 2,600 dead behind them. Lord Mountjoy, Colonel of the Dublin militia, fell in the first onset, and in the course of the battle, which was of ten hours duration, one ensign, four sergeants, and eighty-four of the King's troops, were killed, and one captain, and fifty-seven men, wounded.*

The army under Father Michael Murphy advanced to the attack of Arklow, on the 9th of June, the first day in which that post had been prepared for defence. Their numbers amounted to from 20,000 to 30,000 men, of whom nearly 5,000 were armed with guns; the rest being principally armed with pikes, exhibited, in some points of view, as they advanced to the attack, the appearance of a moving forest. This army was supported by two six-pounders, formerly taken from the regulars, and preceded by an advanced guard composed of horse and foot. The attack, which commenced at four o'clock in the afternoon, and continued for upwards of two hours, was fierce and irregular; but the steady continuance and incessant fire of the troops, together with the destruction occasioned by the cannon, rendered all their efforts abortive, and they were never able to penetrate into the place. One body was soon defeated, and charged by the cavalry under Colonel Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, who appears to have given no quarter; but the other, which had advanced to the side of the Charter School, and was led by the rebel chief, made a number of successive but abortive attacks on a barricade, whence they were driven by showers of musquetry and grape shot. At length Father Michael, after haranguing his followers, advanced with a standard on which a cross had been emblazoned, but though he had represented himself to be invulnerable, he was killed by a cannon shot; on which his troops instantly dispersed, and retreated, about eight o'clock at night, in a disorderly manner, towards Coolgrency.† This battle, though not altogether the most bloody, was perhaps the most important of the revolutionary war, since it probably decided the fate of Ireland. As the rebels were not pursued, their loss was not accurately ascertained, but it could not amount to less than three or four hundred, while the loss of the Durham fencibles, under Colonel Skerret, which supported the weight of the action, was only twenty privates killed and wounded. After the defeat of the rebels at Arklow, the insurgent army, now under the command of General Byrne, and anxiously awaiting the long promised succours from France, retreated to Limerick-hill, where they meditated an attack on Hacketstown, but the approach of General Lake compelled them to abandon that design, and to commence their retreat, on the 20th, for Vinegar-hill. The army under General Needham moved from Arklow to Gorey, on the 19th, and from thence towards Enniscorthy, on the 20th, for the purpose of co-operating with others of his Majesty's forces in a plan formed by General Lake, for surrounding the rebel station at Vinegar-hill. For this purpose different armies moved at the same time, from various quarters—that under Lieutenant-General Dundas, from Baltinglass; another under Majors-General Sir James Duff, and Loftus, from Tullow; that from Arklow, under General Needham, and a fourth from Ross, under Majors-General Johnson and Eustace. The march of the army from Ross served to surprise the rebel bands under Father Philip Roche, on Lacken-hill, who fled in the utmost confusion on the approach of the King's troops, leaving their tents, and a great quantity of plunder. This army separated into two bodies, one of which directed its march to Wexford, and the other to Vinegar-hill, where the Wexfordian insurgents were concentrating their force. This famous

* Some dastardly rebels, who had not dared to hazard their persons in the battle, turned their fury against objects equally void of criminality, and incapable of resistance. During the encampment of the rebels at Carrickbyrne-hill, a party of them were posted at Scullabogue, within half a mile of the camp, where a barn, thirty-four feet long, and fifteen feet wide, had been converted into a gaol for the confinement of their prisoners. In this horrible receptacle were immured 184 prisoners, Catholics and Protestants, but chiefly of the Protestant persuasion. When the rebel army began to give way at Ross, an express was sent, to put the prisoners to death. This sanguinary mandate, John Murphy, the Captain of the rebel guard, refusing to obey, it was repeated again and again; till at length the rebels set fire to the barn, while the wretched prisoners, consisting of men, women, and children, shrieking and crying out for mercy, crowded to the back door of their prison, which they forced open for the purpose of admitting air, or of effecting their escape; but the merciless assassins, some of whom continued to feed the flames by casting straw and other combustible matter into the barn, piked or shot the victims as they appeared in succession at the door; till at length their moans and cries gradually subsided in the silence of death, and every soul in the prison perished.

† This ecclesiastical chief had been supposed by his followers to be proof against all kinds of weapons, and even to be impervious to cannon shot. To favour this delusion, he frequently exhibited musket-balls, which he said he caught in his hands, as they flew from the guns of the enemy!

eminence, with the town of Enniscorthy, at its foot, and the country for many miles in circumference, had been in possession of the rebels ever since the 28th of May, during which period, continual apprehension of death had attended the hapless loyalists, who had not succeeded in effecting their escape. The army commanded to march from different quarters, to surround the rebel post at Vinegar-hill, consisted, in the whole, of a force amounting to about 13,000 effective men, with a formidable train of artillery. With such a strength, judiciously directed, the whole insurgent army, estimated at 20,000, might have been taken or destroyed. The troops being divided into four distinct columns, advanced, early in the morning of the 21st, against the insurgents, while a fifth, under General Johnson, having carried the town of Enniscorthy, scaled the heights in different directions. But notwithstanding these formidable preparations, the revolters were enabled, from the strength of their position, to defend the line, during an hour and a half, and it was not till they were out-flanked, and nearly surrounded, that they gave way, leaving behind them thirteen light field-pieces. The slaughter was immense; for no quarter seems to have been given upon this occasion; and those who escaped the musket, when overtaken, perished by the bayonet; whilst the King's troops had not above one hundred either killed or wounded. The action was less bloody than might have been supposed, as the troops under General Needham, being unable to reach the position assigned them, left an opening through which the rebels retreated, and which from that circumstance was ludicrously called "Needham's gap." Through this opening an immense column retreated by the east side of the Slaney, part of which entered Wexford; while another, and more numerous detachment, headed by the chiefs, Murphy and Roche, reached the Three Rocks, and having held a hasty council of war, marched across the mountains to the county of Kilkenny. The town of Wexford was relieved on the same day as Enniscorthy. Brigadier-General Moore, whose troops had on the preceding day fought, and vanquished a rebel force of five or six thousand men at Goffs-bridge, near Horetown, received, on the morning of the 21st, a proposal from the inhabitants of Wexford to surrender the town, and to return to their allegiance, provided he would guarantee their lives and property. This proposal General Moore felt it his duty to transmit to General Lake, and marching directly for Wexford, he stationed his army within a mile of that place. The loyalists of Wexford, like those of Enniscorthy, had, since the fall of that place into the hands of the insurgents, been in a state of incessant apprehension and suffering.*

The Wexford insurgents, in the hope that their offer of surrender would be acceded to by General Lake, and conscious that it was impossible to oppose any effectual resistance to the overwhelming force brought against them, liberated Lord Kingsborough, (vide preceding note) and on the 21st, surrendered the town into his hands. Contrary to their hopes, General Lake insisted upon the unconditional surrender of the place, and in his answer to the proposal of the 21st, informed the inhabitants, that no terms could be granted to rebels in arms against their sovereign.

On the evacuation of the town by the main body of rebels, part of them, under Messrs. Fitzgerald, Perry, and Edward Roche, passed over the bridge to the eastern side of the river Slaney, and the rest, under Father Philip Roche, in an opposite direction, into the barony of Forth.†

The body of rebels which had retreated from Vinegar hill, and penetrated into the county of Kilkenny by the Scullagh gap, which separates the counties of Carlow and Wexford, burnt the village of Killedmond, and proceeded to Goresbridge, under the command of Father John Murphy, of Boulavogue. Having advanced in column, they were opposed by Lieutenant Dixon, who was posted there with a party, chiefly composed of dragoons; but he was at length obliged to retreat, as they had brought a swivel, and several pieces of cannon, to bear on his post, which he in vain endeavoured to maintain against such an overwhelming disparity of force. But their success was of short duration, for they were pursued by General Dunn and Sir Charles Asgill, and totally defeated, on the 26th of June, at Kilcomney-hill, with a loss of from two to three hundred slain, and ten light pieces of cannon taken, with seven hundred horses, and all the rest of their plunder. Murphy, the commander-in-chief, who fled from the field of battle, was taken soon after, and being conducted to the head-quarters of General Sir James Duff, at Tullow, was hanged the same day, and his head placed on the market-house.

In the south, the spirit of rebellion was now happily approaching to its termination; and in the north, this revolutionary contest never exhibited a very formidable shape, for the disaffected Protestants in that quarter, shocked at the enormities perpetrated, and the intolerance displayed, and scandalized by the pretended miracles wrought by the blood-stained priests, Roche and Murphy, determined to resist the seduction. They indeed found means to keep possession of Antrim for a few days, though, on being attacked with cannon and musquetry, on the 7th of June, they were driven out of the town, with the loss of about two hundred slain, but not till Lord O'Neill, who commanded a regiment of Irish militia, had been mortally wounded. They were also re-

* Of this description of persons two hundred and sixty were confined in the gaol and other places of imprisonment, while the rest were prisoners in their own houses, under perpetual dread of being shot, piked, or famished. Several of the leaders of the rebellion exerted their utmost endeavours to prevent violence being offered to the prisoners, but there were others of their number that instigated, rather than restrained the sanguinary disposition of the rabble. Of the latter description appears to have been Thomas Dixon, (the brother-in-law of General Edward Roche) who, from a Captain of a trading vessel, had become a chief in the rebel army. During the occupation of the town by the revolters, a general slaughter of the prisoners was twice attempted in vain by this monster. Persisting in his bloody design, and choosing a moment of extreme agitation for its accomplishment, he contrived, on the 20th of June, to set on foot a great massacre. The prisoners being brought from the prison, were led to slaughter in successive tallies, surrounded by a guard of inhuman butchers; and preceded to the place of execution by a black flag, marked with a white cross, where they were put to death by various means, but principally by four men at once, who standing two before, and two behind each victim, thrust their pikes into his body, and elevating him from the ground, held him writhing in the air, till all signs of life were extinguished.—Some of the prisoners were slaughtered at the gaol, and others at the market-house, but the great butchery was on the bridge—a magnificent wooden fabric, ill adapted for such a hideous exhibition. This horrible spectacle was, it is said, regarded by a multitude of wretches assembled on the occasion, the greater part women, as a gratifying sight, and the congregated multitudes rent the air with shouts of exultation on each fresh arrival of victims at the fatal spot! The slaughter, which had commenced at two o'clock in the afternoon, continued till seven o'clock at night, when ninety-seven men had been deliberately massacred, and the news had arrived that the post of Vinegar-hill had been carried by the King's troops. Father Curran having in vain

† While the loyalists of Wexford were rejoicing in their deliverance, a most tragic scene was acting in Gorey. On the 20th of June, a party of the Gorey cavalry, about seventeen in number, on their return home to that place, in resentment for the injury the town had suffered, killed about fifty men, whom they found in their houses, or straggling home from the rebel army. On the 22d, a body of about five hundred rebels, retreating from Wexford, and directing their march to the mountains of Wicklow, on hearing of this slaughter, and being informed of the weakness of the party by whom it was perpetrated, determined on vengeance. With this view they marched towards Gorey, where a smart skirmish took place, which terminated in favour of the rebels, who, in pursuing the military, overtook a number of refugees flying from the place, and slaughtered thirty-seven of them upon the road, exclusive of some others who were dreadfully wounded but afterwards recovered. On this sanguinary day, which is yet remembered in Gorey, under the designation of Bloody Friday, no women or children were injured, because, as the rebels, who affected to act on a system of retaliation, said, no women or children had, on the 20th, been hurt by the loyalists.

supplicated the assassins to desist, commanded them to pray before they proceeded further in this work of death; and when he had thus brought them to their knees, he ordered them to cry, "O God! shew to us the same mercy that we shew to these surviving prisoners!" Lord Kingsborough, Colonel of the North Cork regiment of militia, who had been taken prisoner in the harbour of Wexford at the breaking out of the rebellion, and detained ever since, narrowly escaped from swelling the number of the victims, through the endeavours of Dr. Caulfield, the Romish Bishop. The only charge urged by Dixon and his bloody associates, against the objects of their diabolical fury, was, that they were orangemen, and the proof of their guilt rested upon the evidence of two wretches, of the names of Jackson and O'Connor, who were themselves confined in the gaol at Wexford, and became informers to save their own lives.

pulsed in an ill-concerted attack on Carrickfergus; and at Ballynahinch, where they had determined to make a stand with six thousand men, under Munroe, the northern chief, they received a total overthrow. On the subsiding of this minor rebellion, in Ulster, another local rising took place in Munster, much inferior in vigour, and much more easily suppressed than that in the north. The principal action took place in the county of Cork, on the 19th of June, near the village of Ballynascarty. At this place, a division of two hundred and twenty men of the West Meath militia, provided with two six-pounders, and commanded by Sir Hugh O'Reilly, were attacked on their march from Cloghnakilty to Bandon, by a body of about three or four hundred rebels in ambush, principally armed with pikes. After a smart engagement, during which the rebels were joined by two reinforcements, and the West Meath militia by about one hundred men of the Caithness legion, the assailants dispersed, with a loss of from fifty to one hundred men, while the loyalists lost only a sergeant, and one private.

The insurgent chiefs, Fitzgerald and Byrne, at length surrendered to Generals Dundas and Moore; and this sanguinary insurrection, which broke out on the 23d of May, and raged with intense fury till the 22d of the following month, was finally extinguished on the 12th of July.

Dublin, having escaped the horrors of insurrection, now became the theatre of public justice. The first person brought to trial was a rebel chief of the name of Bacon, in an extensive line of business, in the metropolis, and of the protestant persuasion. He was apprehended on the 2d of June, disguised as a female, and proceeding in a chaise to the country to join the insurgents. Being found guilty of high treason, he was executed on the 14th, on the same scaffold with Lieutenant Esmond, a Roman Catholic, convicted of heading the rebel forces. Henry and John Sheares, the sons of a banker at Cork, and educated for the bar, were condemned on the clearest evidence, and executed in the front of Newgate. The trial of John M'Cann, Secretary to the provincial committee of Leinster, followed on the 17th of July, and he suffered with Michael William Byrne, delegate for the county committee of Wicklow. Oliver Bond, a man of considerable fortune, and one of the principal conspirators, at whose house the Leinster delegates had been arrested on the 12th of March, was arraigned for high treason on the 23d of July, and his trial continued till seven o'clock on the morning of the 24th, when he was convicted. These trials were all by jury; but in Wexford, and other parts of the country, the more summary tribunals of courts-martial were resorted to. On the 25th of June, Matthew Keugh, the rebel governor of Wexford; the Rev. Philip Roche, the general; and seven others having been previously tried and convicted, were brought to the bridge at Wexford, and executed. Among the persons who suffered for high treason on the same bridge, were Beauchamp Bagnel Harvey, John Henry Colclough, and Cornelius Grogan. Grogan died possessed of an estate of eight thousand a year. In the town of Wexford alone, not fewer than sixty-five persons were executed for the crimes of rebellion and murder.

The Marquis Cornwallis, having been appointed to succeed Earl Camden, in the Lord-Lieutenancy of Ireland, made his entrance into the capital of that country, on the 20th of June. On the 3d of July, a proclamation from the new viceroy appeared in the Dublin Gazette, authorizing his Majesty's generals to afford protection to such insurgents as, having been simply guilty of rebellion, should surrender their arms, abjure all unlawful engagements, and take the oath of allegiance. To give the full sanction of law to this measure of consummate wisdom, a message was delivered from his excellency to the Irish Parliament, on the 17th of July, on which was grounded an act of amnesty to all, who, not being leaders, had not committed manslaughter, except in the heat of battle, and who should comply with the conditions of the proclamation. This act was followed by a treaty between the government and the chiefs of the United Irishmen, negociated by Mr. Counsellor Dobbs, a member of the House of Commons, bearing date the 29th of July, and expressed in the following terms:—"That the undersigned state prisoners, in the three prisons of Newgate, Kilmainham, and Bridewell, engage to give every information in their power of the whole of the internal transactions of the United Irishmen; and that each of the prisoners shall give detailed information of every transaction that has passed between the United Irishmen and foreign states; but that the prisoners are not, by naming or describing, to implicate any person whatever; and that, they are ready to emigrate to such country as shall be agreed on between them and government, and give security not to return to this country without the permission of government, and not to pass into an enemy's country;—if, on so doing, they are to be freed from prosecution: and also Mr. Oliver Bond, (then under sentence of death) be permitted to take the benefit of this proposal. The state prisoners also hope, that the benefit of this proposal may be extended to such persons in custody as may chuse to benefit by it."

Some of the rebel chiefs who had hitherto remained in arms, among whom was Aylmer, now surrendered their persons. Arthur O'Connor, Thomas Eddis Emmett, Dr. M'Nevin, Samuel Neilson, and other principals of the conspiracy, gave details on oath, in their examinations before the secret committees of the two Houses of Parliament; from which it appeared, that the rebellion originated in a system, formed, not with a view of obtaining either Catholic emancipation, or any reform compatible with the existence of the constitution, but for the purpose of subverting the government, separating Ireland from Great Britain, and forming a democratic republic; that the means resorted to for the attainment of these designs was a secret systematic combination, fitted to attract the multitude, and artfully linked and connected together, with a view of forming the mass of the lower ranks into a revolutionary force, acting in concert, and moving as one body, at the impulse, and under the direction of their leaders; that, for the further accomplishment of their object, the leaders of the conspiracy entered into a negociation in 1796, and finally concluded an alliance with the French Directory, in the summer of the same year, by which it was stipulated, that an adequate force should be sent for the invasion of Ireland, as subsidiary to the preparations that were making for a general insurrection; that, in pursuance of this design, measures were adopted by the chiefs of the conspiracy for giving to their societies a military form; that, for arming their adherents, they had recourse to the fabrication of pikes; that, from the vigorous and summary expedients resorted to by government, and the consequent exertions of the military, the leaders found themselves reduced to the alternative of immediate insurrection, or, of being deprived of the means on which they relied for effecting their purpose; and that, to this cause was to be attributed the premature breaking out of the rebellion, and probably its ultimate failure.

The principal prisoners, however, being found to abuse the lenity of government, by secretly labouring to revive the expiring flame of rebellion, were not liberated, but sent to Fort George, in the north of Scotland, where they continued in confinement till the conclusion of the war. They were then permitted to enjoy their liberty, on condition of withdrawing from his Majesty's dominions. Oliver Bond died, by a stroke of apoplexy, in prison.

Robberies and assassinations, would probably have ceased on the granting of protections, if some desperate marauders, reinforced by deserters from several regiments of Irish militia, had not remained in arms in the mountains of Wicklow, and the dwarf woods of Killaughrim, near Enniscorthy. These Banditti continued for many months to infest those parts of the country; but, after a little time, the woods, being scoured by the army, were cleared of their predatory inhabitants, who had ludicrously styled themselves

"The Babes in the Wood." The party in the Wicklow mountains continued under two chiefs of the name of Holt and Hacket, to annoy the country for a longer time, and in a more formidable degree, till a principle of retaliation was resorted to by the yeomen.*

Hitherto, the French Directory had contemplated the progress of the civil war in Ireland in perfect tranquillity; but, at a period when the arts of peace began once more to be cultivated, an expedition under General Humbert, consisting of 1030 privates, and 70 officers, embarked from Rochelle, in three frigates, and landing on the 22d of August, in the bay of Killala, in the county of Mayo, took up their head-quarters at the bishop's palace. Although a green flag was erected, accompanied by the emblem of a harp, incircled with the motto of "Erin go Bragh"—Ireland for ever, but few of the peasantry could be prevailed on to join the invaders, and of those few, scarcely an individual of any note was of the number.

Having left a small garrison under Colonel Charost behind him at Killala, to keep up the communication, and receive supplies, General Humbert clothed and armed all those who repaired to his standard, and immediately marched towards Castlebar. Advancing through Barnahgecby, instead of Foxford, he experienced no obstacle in his route from Ballina. The army collected at Castlebar, under General Lake, whom the Lord-Lieutenant had appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Connaught, consisted of from two to three thousand regular troops. Although Humbert relied chiefly for success on his own troops, yet, being desirous to magnify the appearance of his little army, he dressed up a number of the natives in uniforms, and afterwards contrived to post his new levies on the flanks, in such a manner as to protect his column from the fire of the enemy. The field of battle to which he advanced, on the morning of the 27th, consisted of a hill, at the north-west extremity of the town, where the English forces were drawn up in two lines, which crowned its summit; a small reserve was stationed in the rear, in a valley; and two curricle, and some battalion guns, were posted in front, and commanded a rising ground, over which the enemy must necessarily pass. About eight o'clock in the morning, the French, with their native allies, were seen advancing in column, driving a number of cattle before them to divert the fire of the artillery, which was extremely well served. Humbert, after reconnoitering, halted under cover of a rising ground, and pushed forward a body of his best marksmen, who advanced rapidly, and occupied some hedges in front, where they extended themselves, with a view of out-flanking the adversary. By an unfortunate precipitancy, the fire of the English lines, instead of being reserved, was expended before it could be available—a mistake of which the enemy taking advantage, rushed forward with his main body, and the sharp-shooters evincing a design to penetrate into the rear, the detachment posted for the purpose of supporting the guns retired in a panic, and abandoned their charge to the enemy. The Earls of Ormond, Longford, and Granard, endeavoured to rally their men, and they so far succeeded as to impede the progress of the assailants, but they were pursued with alacrity, and the royal Irish artillery, who had gallantly defended the bridge by means of a single gun, were at length charged by the horse, and nearly cut off.

The loss sustained by the British army upon this occasion has been vaguely estimated at five hundred men, and fourteen pieces of cannon, including four curricle guns; and the suspicion of disaffection among part of the troops, served to aggravate the disaster. The loss of the enemy in killed and wounded exceeded two hundred. Castlebar, a place of some importance, on account of its situation, now became the head-quarters of the invaders, and a number of deserters from the Irish militia regiments, chiefly actuated by the hopes of a booty, joined this force; but to the honour of the French commander, he acquired the odium of many of his new allies, by his scrupulous regard to the lives and property of individuals. The British force, after the defeat of Castlebar, retreated the same night to Tuam, a distance of thirty miles from the scene of action, whence they proceeded towards Athlone.

Aware of the danger that might arise to the country, from the presence of an invading army, Lord Cornwallis came to the determination to take the field in person. He accordingly quitted Dublin on the 24th of August, and advancing by the way of the Grand Canal, through Philipstown and Kilbeggan, arrived on the 28th at Athlone, in the county of Westmeath, having performed a march of eighty English miles in little more than three days. Here he received the unwelcome intelligence of the defeat of his Majesty's forces under General Lake, on the 27th, and after a halt of two days, he proceeded, in the direction of Holly-mount, where he arrived on the 4th of September.

General Humbert, hoping to obtain succours, quitted Castlebar on the morning of the 4th, and moved with his whole force in the direction of Sligo. Finding his march impeded by the force under Colonel Crawford, and General Lake, on his rear, he relinquished his design on Sligo, and, after a number of skirmishes, arrived on the 8th, at Ballynamuck, so closely followed, that his rear-guard was unable to break down the bridge at Ballintra. The Marquis Cornwallis, on finding that the invader had quitted Castlebar, measured back his march from Holly-mount, and repassing the Shannon at Carrick, marched by Mohill to St. Johns-town, in the county of Longford, to intercept the enemy in front. By these skilful movements, the French General found his forces surrounded by a British army, amounting to upwards of 20,000 men. The rear-guard, consisting of about 200 infantry, being attacked by Colonel Crawford, was obliged to surrender.

The remainder of the troops under Humbert, continued to defend themselves for about half an hour; when, on the appearance of the main body of General Lake's army, they all surrendered, prisoners of war. The rebel auxiliaries, now accumulated to about 1,500, who had accompanied the French to this fatal field, being excluded from quarter, fled in all directions, and about 500 of their number were slain in the pursuit, exclusive of about one hundred taken prisoners, among whom were found Teeling, Blake, and Roach, three of their chiefs. The number of French troops who surrendered on this occasion, amounted to 96 officers, and 748 non-commissioned officers and privates; having sustained a loss of 288, since their first landing at Killala. The quantity of ordnance, arms, and ammunition, taken this day, was officially stated at three light four pounders; five ammunition waggons, nearly full; one tumbril; 700 stand of arms, with belts and pouches,

* It would be difficult to estimate, with any degree of accuracy, the detriment sustained by the country from the rebellion; but some data are afforded in this inquiry, from the conflagrations that took place in the different towns, and from the compensation claimed by one class of sufferers: the towns of Carnew, Tinealy, Hacketstown, Donard, Blesington, and Kiledmond, were all destroyed by fire; in Ross, about three hundred houses, mostly those of the labouring classes, were consumed, and the greater part of Enniscorthy was laid in ashes. Such was the desolation committed in the towns, while a vast number of cabins, farm houses, and gentlemen's seats, were destroyed in the open country. By a message delivered to the House of Commons by Lord Castlereagh, on the 17th of July, it was proposed to afford compensation to the suffering loyalists, on their claims being duly verified before commissioners; and an act of Parliament soon after passed, for giving to this measure of justice and humanity the force of law. Under this act, the claims of the loyalists alone amounted to upwards of one million pounds sterling! a sum of great magnitude, but it is supposed not equal to more than one third of the entire property destroyed by this ruinous conspiracy. Though the point has never been ascertained, how many rebels were in arms at any one time during the rebellion, it is generally believed, that the number of men at the posts of the Three Rocks, Lacken-hill, Vinegar-bill, and Gorey, amounted in the early part of the month of June, to 50,000, of whom four-fifths at least were Wexfordians; and to these may be added, about 20,000 assembled about the same period in the provinces of Ulster and Munster. That the number of human beings sacrificed was immense, may be supposed from the well known facts, that the male population in the county of Wexford and Wicklow experienced a very perceptible diminution; and that, during this sanguinary contest, 68 loyalists were massacred in the latter, and 450 in the former county, exclusive of the numbers that fell in battle.

and a great number of pikes: and the loss of the King's forces, was only three privates killed; twelve wounded, among whom was Lieutenant Stephens, of the carabineers; and three missing. Most of the towns which had fallen into the hands of the rebels, were about this time recovered, but Ballina and Killala still remained in their possession.

Previously to the march of General Humbert from Castlebar, on the 4th of September, he had called in all his forces, with the exception of three officers left at Killala, and one at Ballina, in command of the rebel garrisons at those places. At length, on the 22d of September, thirty-one days after the landing of the French army in Ireland, and fourteen days after its capture at Ballynamuck, the King's forces arrived at Ballina, and obliged the garrison to retreat to Killala. On the 23d, a large body of troops, under Major-General Trench, arrived at Killala; and "the peaceful inhabitants," says an eye-witness, "were now to be spectators of a scene they had never expected to behold—a battle! a sight which no person who has seen it once, and possesses the feelings of a human creature, would choose to witness a second time. A troop of fugitives in full race from Ballina—women and children tumbling over one another to get into the castle, (the bishop's residence,) or into any house in the town, where they might hope for momentary shelter—continued, for a painful length of time, to give notice of the approach of an army. The rebels quitted their camp to occupy the rising ground close by the town, on the road to Ballina, posting themselves under the low stone walls on each side, in such a manner as enabled them, with great advantage, to take aim at the King's troops; yet (strange to tell!) they were able only to kill one man, a corporal, and wound one common soldier. They had a strong guard also on the other side of the town towards Foxford, having probably received intelligence, which was true, that General Trench had divided his forces at Crosmalina, and sent one part of them by a detour of three miles, to intercept the fugitives that might take that course in their flight. The two divisions of the royal army were supposed to make up about 1200 men, and they had five pieces of cannon. The number of the rebels could not be ascertained; many ran away after the engagement, while a very considerable number flocked into the town, in the very heat of it, passing under the castle windows in view of the French officers, on horseback, running upon death with as little appearance of reflection or concern as if they were hastening to a show. About 400 of these misguided men fell in battle, and immediately after it. Whence it may be conjectured, that their entire number scarcely exceeded eight or nine hundred. The French officers thought it their duty to lead the rebels, as many as they could bring forward, to the onset, though they were sure it was in vain. A regiment of highlanders (Fraser's fencibles) filed off to the right and left, to flank the fusileers behind the hedges and walls; they had a hard marshy ground on their left to surmount before they could come up with their object, which occasioned some delay, but at length they reached them, and made sad havoc among them. After a resistance of about twenty minutes, the rebels began to fly in all directions, and were pursued by the Roxburgh cavalry into the town in full cry. A considerable number were cut down in the streets, and of the remainder, but a few were able to escape into the Houses, being either pushed through the town till they fell in with the Kerry regiment, from Crosmalina, or obliged to take to the shore, where it winds round a promontory, forming one of the horns of the bay of Killala. And here too the fugitives were swept away by scores, a cannon being placed at the opposite part of the bay, which did great execution. A flying rebel having burst through the door of Mr. William Kirkwood, the magistrate, followed by six or seven soldiers, they poured a volley of musquetry after him, that proved fatal to Mr. Andrew Kirkwood, a most loyal and respectable citizen, while he was rejoicing at the victory, and in the very act of shouting out 'God save the King.' In spite of the exertions of the General and his officers, the town exhibited almost all the marks of a place taken by storm. Some Houses were perforated like a riddle; most of them had their doors and windows destroyed; the trembling inhabitants scarcely escaped with life, by lying prostrate on the floor, during the battle. Nor was it till the close of the next day, that their ears were relieved from the horrid sounds of muskets discharged every minute at flying and powerless rebels." The courts-martial assembled the day after the battle of Killala, and these tribunals were not dissolved till they had disposed of 185 prisoners. Among the number of the accused was General Bellew, of an ancient Irish family, who had served eighteen years in Germany.*

The French officers taken at Killala, all of whom had conducted themselves with humanity and honour, were sent to Dublin, and thence to London, where three of their number, Charost, Boudet, and Ponson, were, on the favourable report of Dr. Stock, the Bishop of Killala, set at liberty, and sent home without exchange. A number of rebel chiefs, and inferior insurgents, were tried and executed at Killala, and in other parts of the country; among whom were two Irishmen by birth, who had been in the military service of France before the invasion, and had come to Ireland in the French fleet. These were Matthew Tone and Bartholomew Teeling, made prisoners at Ballynamuck. These ill-fated men were tried at Dublin barracks, by a military tribunal, and, being found guilty of high treason, were executed, the latter on the 24th of September, and the former a few days afterwards. The little army landed at Killala, had been intended, it appears, only as a van-guard to a much more formidable force, which was in a short time to follow. Providentially for the safety of the British empire, the French government had been as tardy in seconding the operations of Humbert, as they had been in sending succours to the support of the rebel force in the south of Ireland.

The want of money is assigned as the cause of delay in the equipment of the second fleet, and, in the interim, before its appearance on the Irish coast, the Anacreon brig from France arrived at the little island of Rutland, from which were landed three boats full of men, and a number of officers, among whom was James Napper Tandy, one of the Irish emissaries to the French Directory, and who had attained the rank of General of brigade in the French service. This brig was full of arms and accoutrements, and contained a park of artillery; but when the adventurers found that the people, instead of joining them, fled to the mountains, and that the rebellion in Ireland was entirely suppressed, they reembarked, after distributing a number of inflammatory papers, and steered again for the French coast.

Some time afterwards, Napper Tandy, and two other Irish rebels, were apprehended by the agents of Great Britain, at Hamburgh, and conveyed to Ireland, where Tandy was indicted for high treason, in the year 1801, when, having pleaded guilty, by previous arrangement, he was suffered to leave the kingdom, and take up his residence in France. On the 17th of September, the day after General Rey quitted the coast of Ireland in the Anacreon, an expedition, consisting of one ship of the line, eight frigates, a schooner, and a brig, sailed from Brest, with a strong reinforcement, intended to co-operate with the force under General Humbert in Ireland.

Sir John Borlase Warren, who was cruising with seven sail of the line, in the Canada, off Lough Swilly, discovered the enemy's squadron about noon, on the 11th of October, in the N. W. quarter. The Bri-

* This infatuated man, having joined the invaders, was dignified with the pompous title of Generalissimo of all the allies of France, in the district from Ballina to West Port; but it soon became obvious, that his habits of intemperance were so inveterate, as to incapacitate him for all duty, and he was dismissed from the service. He had, however, proceeded so far as to incur the guilt of treason against his sovereign, and being found guilty, he was executed the next morning, along with Mr. Richard Bourke, of Ballina, another of the rebel chiefs.

tish Admiral instantly threw out the signal for a general chase, and gave orders to form in succession as each ship of war reached her antagonist; but, from the great distance, and a hollow sea, it was found impossible to commence the action before the next morning, at which time it was discovered that the enemy's large ship had lost her main-top-mast. Still confident in their own strength, the French squadron bore down and formed a line of battle in close order upon the starboard tack; on which, the Canada threw out a signal for the Robust to lead, and the rest of the ships to form in succession in the rear of the van. An action of three hours and forty minutes ensued, at the end of which period, the enemy's three-decker, which proved to be the Hoche, struck, and three of the frigates following her example, hauled down their colours after a long and gallant resistance. The whole squadron, it appeared, was entirely new, and full of troops, stores, and every other equipment for the support and establishment of the invading force in Ireland. Five of the frigates, the schooner, and the brig, escaped, but three of the former were afterwards captured, and the armament being thus in effect destroyed, the object of the expedition was completely frustrated. Amongst the prisoners taken in the Hoche, was Theobald Wolfe Tone, the projector of the society of United Irishmen, long considered as the most active and able negociator among the Irish fugitives at Paris, and as the great adviser of most of the measures pursued by his rebellious countrymen. He was no sooner landed in Ireland than he was conveyed to Dublin, and put upon his trial by a court-martial, before which he defended himself with considerable ability and firmness, not attempting either to deny or to palliate his offence. The plea on which he rested, was that, of being a denizen of France, and an officer in the service of the republic; but when he found that this defence was unavailing, he requested that he might die like a soldier, and not as a felon: and be shot, according to military usage, rather than hanged. The court, however, did not judge it proper to accede to his request, and the unhappy culprit attempted to escape the ignominy that awaited him by cutting his throat in the prison. The wound was at first supposed not to be mortal, but, after languishing a short time, it terminated his existence. Holt, the last and most intrepid of the rebel chiefs, was glad to obtain the boon of his forfeited life, by exiling himself for ever from his native country.

Thus ended the insurrection in Ireland; in which more than 30,000 lives were sacrificed, and property to the amount of upwards of two millions sterling destroyed.

A. D. 1798.] On the meeting of Parliament, on the 20th of November, the speech from the throne spoke with just exultation of the late splendid triumphs of our navy under Lord Nelson, "which had turned an extravagant enterprise to the confusion of its authors, and afforded an opening which might lead to the general deliverance of Europe." The address moved in the Lords by the Earl of Darnley, and seconded by Lord Craven, was animadverted upon by the Marquis of Lansdowne, who exhorted the ministers "to draw from these victories, so justly celebrated, the advantages they were calculated to secure, and to make them the means of obtaining that most desirable of all objects, a safe and honourable peace."

The question upon the address, however, was carried in both Houses, without a division. On the 11th of December, Mr. Tierney moved, in the Commons, "That it is the duty of his Majesty's ministers to advise him not to enter into any alliance with foreign powers, that may hinder his Majesty from negociating a peace with France, whenever she may be disposed to enter upon a fair and equitable negociation." This motion was negatived. The bill for the renewal of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act was the next measure of importance that came under discussion; and it was agreed to, by both Houses, that the suspension should continue till the 21st of May, 1799.

The large and continually increasing expense of the war had induced the minister, in the course of the last session of Parliament, to bring forward for the sanction of the House, a new system of finance; the principle of which was to raise within the year a large proportion of the necessary supplies, which, aided by the operation of the sinking fund, should prevent any material addition being made to the public debt. The tax proposed for this purpose, called the triple assessment tax, was, however, found so inadequate to the purpose proposed, that the minister determined to abandon that unequal and oppressive impost, and to substitute in its stead a tax on income. Accordingly, on the 3d of December, the House having formed itself into a committee, Mr. Pitt rose, and said, that before he proceeded to open to the committee the important subject to which their attention would in the course of the evening be directed, it would be proper to state, that the supplies which would be necessary for the service of the present year, amounted to the sum of thirty-one millions, towards which the usual ways and means would produce six millions one hundred thousand pounds. It remained then to be considered in what way the deficiency should be raised. Here two leading principles occurred for the guidance of the House—either to raise the whole by loan upon the old funding system, or to raise a considerable part of the supplies within the year, upon the principle adopted in the last session of Parliament. Mr. Pitt then proceeded to state his new plan of finance, which was a tax on income. The commissioners, who should be vested with the power of determining upon the rate of every one's income, should be persons of respectable situations in life, removed from any suspicion of partiality; men of integrity and independence, and in case the party was dissatisfied with the decision of these commissioners, another body of commissioners should be formed, to whom an appeal might be carried. The next point for consideration was the mode of contribution that should be adopted. Under this head, it was his intention to propose, that no income under sixty pounds a year should be called upon to contribute, and that the scale of modification, up to two hundred pounds a year, as in the assessed taxes, should be introduced with restrictions. The quota which should then be called for should amount to full a tenth of the contributor's income. The returns to be made by the person assessed, subject to the inspection of a surveyor, who should lay before the commissioners such grounds of doubt as might occur to him on the fairness of the rate at which a party might have assessed himself. The party, however, should not be compelled to answer; his books should not be called for, nor his confidential clerks or agents examined; but, if he declined to submit to the investigation of his books, and the examination of his clerks, it should be competent for the commissioners to fix the assessment, and their decision should be final. In forming a rough estimate of the product of the proposed tax, he should state, on the authority of the board of agriculture, that forty millions of acres of land were at present in cultivation in this kingdom, the average rent of which he should estimate at twelve shillings and sixpence an acre, which would give twenty-five millions a year. In this, as in every other denomination of property, he should propose that every thing under sixty pounds a year should be exempt, and that modifications up to two hundred pounds a year should be admitted, for which he had in his calculation made a deduction of one-fifth. The sums to which the tax of ten per cent would apply would then stand thus:—

The land rental, after deducting one-fifth he estimated at	20,000,000
The tenant's rental of land, deducting two-thirds of the rack rent, he took at	6,000,000
The amount of the tithes, deducting one-fifth	4,000,000
The produce of mines, canal navigations, &c. deducting one-fifth	3,000,000
The rental of houses, deducting one-fifth	5,000,000
The profits of professions	2,000,000
The rental of Scotland, taking at one-eighth that of England	5,000,000
The income of persons resident in Great Britain, drawn from possessions beyond the seas	5,000,000
The amount of annuities from the public funds, after deducting one-fifth	12,000,000
The profits of the capital employed in our foreign commerce	12,000,000
The profits on the capital employed in our domestic trade, and the profits of skill and industry	28,000,000
	L. 102,000,000

A tax

A tax of ten per cent upon this amount would produce ten millions a year. The House would recollect that the assessed taxes were assigned to the payment of that part of the sum raised for the service of last year, which was not made a permanent debt, and of course this new tax upon income would be substituted in the room of those assessed taxes, and would be made applicable to the same purpose.

Mr. Tierney contended, that, by this bold measure a tenth part of the property of England was put in requisition—a measure which the French had followed in their career of revolutionary rapine, and which the Chancellor of the Exchequer first condemned, and then imitated; and, as a prelude to the project, a general disclosure of property must take place. The scale of taxation was also manifestly inadequate and unjust. If it were right that the scale should rise from sixty pounds to two hundred pounds per annum, why should it not continue to rise from two hundred upwards? The man of two hundred per annum would be deprived of a part of the comforts he possessed, while the man of twenty thousand per annum would still riot in the enjoyment of all his luxuries.

The bill having been committed, and the report brought up, Sir Francis Baring affirmed, that under the veil of secrecy, which covered the commercial returns, the bill would be evaded and frauds committed, beyond any thing it was possible to conceive. But, supposing the bill carried into effect, it was a tax upon industry and upon enterprise. Mr. William Smith declared his decided approbation of the principle of raising the supplies within the year, which could alone preserve the public finances from impending ruin; but the provisions of this bill he deemed in the highest degree exceptionable. By what criterion could it be adjudged fair and honest, to tax, in an equal degree, industry and indolence? A stock-holder, who received five hundred pounds per annum from his capital in the funds, and a shop-keeper of small property, who by active exertions made the same sum in his business, were similarly rated! Even in the funds, proprietors of the long annuities, of perpetual annuities, and of the exchequer annuities, which expire in five years, were, by this sweeping and indiscriminate mode of taxation, placed precisely upon a level. Mr. Pitt, in reply, observed that an hon. gentleman had said, that if two persons had each five hundred pounds per annum, one of whom derived his income from land, and the other from industry, they ought not both to be taxed equally at fifty pounds: but to complain of this inequality was to complain of the distribution of property; it was to complain of the constitution of society. Mr. Pitt concluded with observing, that the consequence of this tax would be to all alike, and that whoever contributed a tenth of his income, under the bill, would have a tenth less to spend, to save, or to accumulate. The House then divided,—for the further consideration of the report, 183; against it 17, —majority, 166. After undergoing several amendments, the bill was passed into a law on the 18th of March, and the 5th of April (1799) was fixed as the time for making the returns. The remaining supplies were to be made up from the new imposts on sugar, coffee, and stamps, aided by the recently imposed convoy-tax. One hundred and twenty thousand seamen and marines, and about 250,000 land forces, of different descriptions, were also voted. A bill to enlarge the time prescribed by an act of the last session, for the redemption of the land tax, and to make certain regulations respecting ecclesiastical property, and the property devised for lives and for long terms, was also carried into a law.

On the 22d of January, a message from the crown was delivered by Mr. Secretary Dundas; expressed in the following terms:—"His Majesty is persuaded that the unremitting industry with which our enemies persevere in their avowed design of effecting the separation of Ireland from this kingdom, cannot fail to engage the particular attention of Parliament, and his Majesty recommends it to this House to consider of the most effectual means of finally defeating this design, by disposing the Parliaments of both kingdoms to provide, in a manner which they shall judge most expedient, for settling such a complete and final adjustment, as may best tend to improve and perpetuate a connection essential to their common security, and consolidate the strength, power, and resources of the British empire."

This message was taken into discussion on the following day, when Mr. Dundas moved an address, importing that the House would proceed with all due dispatch to the consideration of the several interests recommended to their serious attention in the message. Mr. Sheridan declared, that he was perfectly ready, on this occasion, to give credit to ministers for purity of intention, as they could not be suspected of proposing a measure, which, in their own opinion, tended ultimately to the separation of Ireland from Great Britain. He said, that the object of this message was evidently an Union, though the word itself was not to be found in it. But, did the people of Ireland manifest any wish to unite? On the contrary, they had unequivocally declared themselves hostile to this design; and, if it were carried, it would be an union effected by fraud, corruption, and intimidation. Before the recommendation contained in the message was attended to, it was incumbent upon ministers to shew, that the last pledge of the English Parliament to the people of Ireland, by which their independence was recognized, and their rights acknowledged, had not produced that unanimity which the Parliaments of the two countries sought to cherish. And he concluded with moving, as an amendment to the address proposed, "that the House, for the first time, learned from his Majesty, with surprise and deep regret, that the final adjustment, which, upon his majesty's gracious recommendation, took place between the two kingdoms in 1782, had not produced the effects expected from that solemn settlement: and further, humbly to express to his Majesty, that his faithful Commons had strong reasons to believe, that it was in the contemplation of his Majesty's ministers to propose an union of the legislatures of the two kingdoms, notwithstanding that final and solemn adjustment; humbly imploring his Majesty not to listen to the counsels of those who should advise such a measure at the present crisis."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer contended, that a permanent connection between Britain and Ireland was essential to the true interest of both countries, and that, unless the existing connection should be improved, there was, he had strong reason to believe, great risk of a separation.* After a debate of some length, Mr. Sheridan withdrew his amendment, and the original motion

* The settlement of the year 1782, Mr. Pitt said, was so imperfect, that it substituted nothing for that system which it demolished, and it was not considered as final even by the ministers of the time. It left the two realms with independent legislatures, connected only by the identity of the executive power—a very insufficient tie, either in time of peace or war, inadequate to the consolidation of strength, or the mutual participation of political and commercial benefits. The case of the regency exhibited a striking instance of the weakness of the connection; and if the two Parliaments had differed on the subject of the war, the danger of a disjunction would have been seriously alarming. The entire dissociation of the two kingdoms was one of the great aims of our enemies; and, as their eventful success in Ireland would expose Britain to extreme peril, the establishment of an incorporate union, by which their views might be effectually baffled, was a necessary act of policy. Great Britain had always felt a common interest in the safety of Ireland; but that interest was never so obvious and urgent as when the enemy attacked the former realm through the medium of the latter. The French had shewn by their conduct, that they deemed Ireland the most vulnerable part of the empire; and this consideration alone ought to enforce the adoption of a measure which would tend to strengthen and secure that country. Among the advantages which would accrue to Ireland from an incorporation with Britain, he mentioned, 'the protection she would secure to herself in the hour of danger, the most effectual means of increasing her commerce, and improving her agriculture, the command of English capital, the infusion of English manners, and English industry, necessarily tending to ameliorate her condition;' adding, that 'she would see the avenue to honours, to distinctions, and exalted situations in the general seat of empire, opened to all those whose abilities and talents enabled them to indulge an honourable and laudable ambition.' After some commercial statements, tending to shew the benefits derivable to Ireland from an union, he asserted the competency of the legislature, not by argument or demonstration, but by allegations of the danger of controverting such right motion was put and carried.* On the 31st of January, however, the subject again came under consideration, when the order of the day being read, Mr. Pitt rose and said, that when he proposed to the House to fix that day for the further consideration of his Majesty's message, he indulged a hope that the result of a similar communication to the Parliament of Ireland would have opened a more favourable prospect than at present existed, of the speedy accomplishment of the measure then in contemplation. He had, however, been disappointed by the proceedings of the Irish House of Commons. He was convinced, that the Parliament of Ireland possessed the power, the entire competence, to accept or reject a proposition of this nature, a power which he by no means meant to dispute. But while he admitted the rights of the Parliament of Ireland, he felt, that as a member of the Parliament of Great Britain, he had a right to exercise, and a duty to perform; viz. to express the general nature and outline of the plan, which, in his estimation, would tend to insure the safety and the happiness of the two kingdoms. Should Parliament be of opinion that it was calculated to produce mutual advantages to the two kingdoms, he should propose it, in order to its being recorded on the journals of that House, leaving the rejection or adoption of this plan to the full and future consideration of the legislature of Ireland. Mr. Pitt remarked, that the union with Scotland was as much opposed, and by nearly the same arguments, prejudices, and misconceptions; creating the same alarms as had recently taken place in respect to Ireland: yet, could any man now doubt of the advantages which Scotland had derived from the union? One of the greatest impediments to the prosperity of Ireland, was the want of industry, and the want of capital, which were only to be supplied by blending more closely with Ireland the industry and capital of this country. In the present state of things also, and while Ireland remained a separate kingdom, no reasonable person would affirm that full concessions could be made to the Catholics, without endangering the state, and shaking the constitution of Ireland to its centre. At the conclusion of a very able speech, he proposed a series of resolutions,† and moved that the House resolve itself into a committee to discuss the same in their proper order. Mr. Sheridan, in reply, again avowed his utter dislike and disapprobation of the measure, and stated his intention of moving the two following resolutions:

right. As the supposed loss of national independence formed, in the minds of many, a strong objection to the scheme, he argued, that the dreaded loss would be a real benefit, that the Irish would rather gain than lose in point of political freedom and civil happiness; and that, though a nation possessing all the means of defence, dignity, and prosperity, might justly object to an association with a more numerous people, Ireland, being deficient in the means of protection, and inferior in the requisites of political and civil welfare, could not be injured or degraded by such an union with a neighbouring and kindred state, as would connect both realms, by an equality of law and an identity of interest.

* The very day on which the message on the union was delivered to the two British Houses of Parliament, the session of the Irish Parliament commenced at Dublin; and a speech on this occasion was made by the Lord Lieutenant, which concluded with the following analogous declaration:—"The unremitting industry with which our enemies persevere in their avowed design of endeavouring to effect a separation of this kingdom from Great Britain, must have engaged your particular attention; and his Majesty commands me to express his anxious hope, that this consideration, joined to the sentiments of mutual affection and common interest, may dispose the Parliaments in both kingdoms to provide the most effectual means of maintaining and improving a connection, essential to their common security, and of consolidating, as far as possible, into one firm and lasting fabric, the strength, the power, and the resources of the British empire. The address brought forward in the House of Peers was opposed chiefly by the Lords Powers-court and Bellamont; who severally moved amendments, expressive of their disapprobation of a legislative union with Great Britain. On the first division, the numbers were 46 to 19, and on the last 35 to 17, in favour of the court. But, in the House of Commons, after a debate of twenty hours, the contest was so close, that only a majority of one appeared against the amendment;—the numbers being, on the division, 106 and 105; and when the question was put for agreeing to the address, the ministry had in their favour, only 107 against 105 voices. During the latter period of the debate, which continued till noon on the second day, the avenues to the House were crowded with people anxious to hear the result; which, when known, was hailed as a victory on the part of the anti-unionists, and the metropolis resounded with acclamations. The leaders of the opposition, elevated with hope, prepared for another conflict, which they did not doubt would give them a decided superiority. The address was reported two days afterwards (January 24th); when Sir Lawrence Parsons rose, and strenuously opposed its being received. After a violent debate, the motion of Sir Lawrence Parsons, for the omission of the obnoxious clause in the address, was carried by a majority of 111 to 106 voices. The exultation of the Irish metropolis, at this defeat of the ministry, was unbounded. The unionists were insulted and calumniated by every possible mode of attack. On the other hand, the chief speaker of opposition acquired a sudden and extraordinary increase of popularity. Attentive and calm observers nevertheless remarked, that the vehement enthusiasm of the capital did not extend to the nation at large. It was indeed apparent, that the weight of the landed interest was in favour of the measure; and that Cork, the second city of the kingdom, and the commercial towns in general, though greatly agitated and divided, were, upon the whole, rather friendly than hostile to it.

† "I. That in order to promote and secure the essential interests of Great Britain and Ireland, and to consolidate the strength, power, and resources of the British empire, it will be advisable to concur in such measures as may best tend to unite the two kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland into one kingdom, in such a manner, and on such terms and conditions, as may be established by acts of the respective Parliaments of his Majesty's said kingdoms.

"II. That it appears to this committee, that it would be fit to propose as the first article, to serve as a basis of the said union, that the said kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland shall, upon a day to be agreed upon, be united into one kingdom, by the name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

"III. That for the same purpose it appears also to this committee, that it would be fit to propose that the succession to the monarchy and the imperial crown of the said united kingdoms shall continue limited and settled, in the same manner as the imperial crown of the said kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland now stands limited and settled, according to the existing laws, and to the terms of the union between England and Scotland.

"IV. That for the same purpose it appears also to this committee, that it would be fit to propose that the said united kingdom be represented in one and the same Parliament, to be styled "the Parliament of the United kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland;" and that such a number of Lords spiritual and temporal, and such a number of members of the House of Commons, as shall be hereafter agreed upon by acts of the respective Parliaments as aforesaid, shall sit and vote in the said Parliament on the part of Ireland, and shall be summoned, chosen, and returned in such a manner as shall be fixed by an act of the Parliament of Ireland previously to the said union; and that every member hereafter to sit and vote in the said Parliament of the united kingdom, shall, until the said Parliament shall otherwise provide, take and subscribe the same oaths, and make the same declaration, as are by law required to be taken, subscribed, and made by the members of the Parliaments of Great Britain and Ireland.

"V. That for the same purpose it appears also to this committee, that it would be fit to propose that the churches of England and Ireland, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, shall be preserved as now by law established.

"VI. That for the same purpose it appears also to this committee, that it would be fit to propose that his Majesty's subjects in Ireland shall at all times hereafter be entitled to the same privileges, and be on the same footing in respect of trade and navigation, in all ports and places belonging to Great Britain, and in all cases with respect to which treaties shall be made by his Majesty, his heirs or successors, with any foreign power, as his Majesty's subjects in Great Britain; that no duty shall be imposed on the import or export, between Great Britain and Ireland, of any articles now duty free; and that on other articles, there shall be established, for a time to be limited, such a moderate rate of equal duties, as shall, previously to the union, be agreed upon and approved by the respective Parliaments, subject, after the expiration of such limited time, to be diminished equally with respect to both kingdoms, but in no case to be increased; that all articles which may at any time hereafter be imported into Great Britain from foreign parts, shall be importable through either kingdom into the other, subject to the like duties and regulations as if the same were imported directly from foreign parts: that where any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of either kingdom, are subject to any internal duty in one kingdom, such countervailing duties, over and above any duties on import to be fixed as aforesaid, shall be imposed, as shall be necessary to prevent any inequality in that respect: and that all other matters of trade and commerce other than the foregoing, and than such others as may before the union be specially agreed upon for the due encouragement of the agriculture and manufactures of the respective kingdoms, shall remain to be regulated from time to time by the united Parliament.

"VII. That for the same purpose it would be fit to propose, that the charge arising from the payment of the interest, or sinking fund for the reduction of the principal, of the debt incurred in either kingdom before the union, shall continue to be separately defrayed by Great Britain and Ireland respectively. That for a number of years to be limited, the future ordinary expenses of the united kingdom in peace or war should be defrayed by Great Britain and Ireland jointly, according to such proportions as shall be established by the respective Parliaments previously to the union. And that, after the expiration of the time to be so limited, the proportions shall not be liable to be varied, except according to such rates and principles as shall be in like manner agreed upon previously to the union.

"VIII. That for the like purpose it would be fit to propose, that all laws in force at the time of the union, and that all the courts of civil or ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the respective kingdoms, shall remain as now by law established within the same, subject only to such alterations or regulations from time to time, as circumstances appear to the Parliament of the united kingdom to require."

The House divided on the question of the speaker's leaving the chair; ayes 140, noes 15. After some further debates on the subject, Mr. Pitt's resolutions were carried by large majorities. On the 14th of February, the report of the committee was brought up, when, on the motion of Mr. Pitt, it was ordered, that a message be sent to the Lords, requesting a conference respecting the means of perpetuating and improving the connection between the two kingdoms.

The subject had previously been introduced into the House of Peers, by a message from the King, delivered by Lord Grenville. The address in answer to this message was voted unanimously by the House, which then adjourned. From this period, the business remained dormant in the Upper House, till Monday, February the 18th, when the message from the Commons was delivered by Earl Temple. A conference accordingly taking place in the painted chamber, the Lords deputed on this occasion soon returned with a copy of the resolutions moved by the House of Commons. On the 19th of March, their Lordships having been summoned, Lord Grenville moved, that the House do agree with the resolutions of the Commons. This motion, though strenuously opposed, was agreed to without a division.

On the 11th of April, the House having been again summoned, Lord Grenville moved an address to the throne, which was also carried without a division; but a protest was signed against it by the Lords Holland, Thanet, and King. A committee was then named, consisting of Lord Grenville, Lord Minto, Lord Auckland, and the Bishop of Llandaff, to draw up an address conformable to the motion; which having been effected, the Commons, in a second conference, (April 12,) were invited to join in the same, and to agree that it should be presented to his Majesty as the address of both Houses of Parliament, which was accordingly done in the most solemn manner.*

Parliament was prorogued on the 12th of July (1799;) when his Majesty was pleased to declare, "That the decision and energy which distinguished the councils of his ally the Emperor of Russia, and the intimate union and concert so happily established between them, would enable him to employ, to the greatest advantage, the powerful means intrusted to him by Parliament, for establishing, on permanent grounds, the security and honour of this country, and the liberty and independence of Europe. His Majesty, on the same occasion, expressed his satisfaction in seeing that internal tranquillity was in some degree restored to his kingdom of Ireland, the ultimate security of which could alone be insured by its intimate and entire union with Great Britain."

It is now necessary to revert to the affairs of the East.—After Buonaparte had obtained possession of Grand Cairo, and of the intermediate country between that city and Alexandria, as well as of the banks of the Nile, he established a kind of mongrel government, nearly resembling the French oligarchy; the chief object of which was, to station persons in different districts, to levy taxes for the benefit of the French, and to wrest from the people every thing which could contribute to the ease and comfort of their enemies. He established a Divan at Cairo, and an institute, in which the Scavans, whom he had brought with him from France, were employed. Buonaparte's arts, however, failed to produce the desired effect, and his arms alone could ensure the obedience which he courted, or avert the danger which he dreaded. A popular insurrection at Cairo had nearly proved fatal to his cause. A General Dupuy, and some hundreds of the French, were killed before it could be suppressed; of course, a much larger number of the insurgents perished, and not a few afterwards fell by the hands of the executioner; for Buonaparte acted the sovereign wherever he went, and treated all who opposed him, as traitors and rebels. Various skirmishes, and some sharp actions, took place between the invaders and the Mamelukes, under the command of the Beys, in different parts of the country, particularly in Upper Egypt, in all of which the superior discipline and tactics of the French baffled the rude courage and desultory attacks of their opponents. But though Buonaparte had thus frustrated every attempt to thwart him in his designs, and had succeeded in establishing, by his sword, an absolute dominion in the country immediately occupied by his troops, he still found himself in a situation of peril. For it could not be supposed, that the Porte would leave him in quiet possession of a portion of her territory; or that England would suffer him to reap the fruits of his iniquity, without an effort to wrest them from his hands. Indeed, the Porte had issued orders to the Governor of Syria and the Pacha of Damascus, to raise a body of troops to act against the French; and these orders had been implicitly obeyed. Buonaparte made a vain attempt to persuade the former of these officers, Ghezzar Pacha, that he was a friend of the Grand Seignior, and had no intentions hostile to his interests. Ghezzar made no answer to the communication, but ordered all the French who were at Acra to be seized and thrown into prison. Buonaparte was aware that, if an army was sent from Europe to attack him on the one side, while a Turkish force from Asia assailed him on the other, he might not be able to extricate himself from the difficulties with which he would be surrounded, and he, therefore, resolved to attack the Turks in the first instance, in the hopes of subduing them before they could receive assistance from other quarters. He accordingly made preparations for an attack upon Acra, the seat of Ghezzar's government, and resolved, if he should succeed in that attempt, of which he had not the smallest doubt, to march forward to Constantinople. He sent his train of artillery, destined for the siege of this place, by sea, in February 1799; he then divided his army into four divisions, under the command of Kleber, Bon, Regnier, and Lannes. The army proceeded to El-Arisch, where an action was fought, in which the French were successful. They then advanced into the fertile plains of Gaza. Having met with little opposition, they moved forward to Jaffa, (the ancient Joppa) a sea-port, on the coast of Palestine. The town of Jaffa was carried by assault, after a vigorous defence, which cost the French one thousand of their men. Numbers of the garrison were put to the sword; but the greater part of them having taken refuge in the mosques, and implored mercy from the French, their lives were spared. But that mercy which the soldiers had shewn, and cowards had they been if they had acted otherwise, was a stranger to the breast of their inhuman commander. Three days after the place had fallen, Buonaparte reproved his men for their ill-timed lenity, and, being determined, at all events, to relieve himself from the care and support of three thousand eight hundred prisoners, he ordered them to be marched to a rising ground, near Jaffa; where a division of French infantry was drawn up in front of them. When the Turks had entered into their fatal alignment, and the mournful preparations were completed, the signal gun fired. Vollies of musquetry and grape shot were

* In Ireland, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till the 1st of August. It was, however, manifest, that the court were determined to persevere; and the Lord Lieutenant, on the termination of the session, announced, "that a joint address of the two Houses of Parliament of Great Britain, had been laid before his Majesty, accompanied by resolutions proposing and recommending a complete and entire union between Great Britain and Ireland." And he further declared, "that his Majesty, as the common father of his people, must look forward, with earnest anxiety, to the moment when, in conformity to the sentiments, wishes, and real interests of his subjects in both kingdoms, they may all be inseparably united, in the full enjoyment of the blessings of a free constitution."

instantly played against the wretched victims, of his barbarous revenge; and Buonaparte himself, who had been viewing the scene through a telescope, when he saw the smoke ascending, could not restrain his joy, but broke out into exclamations of applause. Indeed, he had some reason to dread the refusal of his troops to commit this base and cowardly act; for General Kleber had remonstrated, in the most earnest manner, and the staff officer, who commanded (for the General, to whom the division belonged, was absent) even refused to execute the orders without a written instruction; but the wily Corsican was too cautious to give such a testimony of his infamy, and, therefore, sent Berthier to enforce obedience to his orders. Buonaparte had previously inspected, in person, the whole body of the Turks, amounting to nearly five thousand men, with a view to save those who belonged to the towns, which he was proposing to attack. The age and noble countenance of a veteran Janissary attracted his observation, and he said to him, sharply,—"Old man, what business had you here?" The Janissary, undaunted, answered, —"I must answer that question by asking you the same, —your answer will be, that you come to serve your Sultan, so did I come to serve mine." The intrepid frankness of the reply, excited universal interest in his favour. Buonaparte was even observed to smile. "He is saved," whispered some of his aid-de-camps. "You know not Buonaparte," said one who had served with him in Italy; "that smile, I speak from experience, does not proceed from a sentiment of benevolence; remember what I say." He was right.—The Janissary remained in the ranks, and was murdered with the rest of his countrymen. Such of the Turks as were not immediately killed by the shot, were put to death with the bayonet. Some French officers who were present, and on whose authority these particulars are related, declared that this was a scene, the recollection of which embittered their lives, and that, accustomed as they had been to acts of cruelty, they could not reflect on it without horror.*

At Jaffa, as at all other places of importance in his route, Buonaparte constituted a divan, of the principal inhabitants in the French interest, and after appointing Adjutant-General Gressier to the command of the place, he marched at the head of his troops for Acra, which, at this moment contained within its walls two singular men, who, with the romantic heroism of the days of chivalry, united all the knowledge appertaining to the modern art of war—Sir W. Sidney Smith, a British naval officer, of distinguished enterprise, and Colonel Phillippeaux, an emigrant officer of engineers, the school-fellow and early companion of the French commander-in-chief. After rescuing his friend, Sir Sidney Smith, from bondage in the Temple, and restoring him to liberty at the hazard of his life, Phillippeaux had accompanied him in the small squadron to which he had been appointed, and after cruising with the commodore in the Levant, had embarked for Syria, to employ his talents as an engineer, and to afford assistance to the Pacha. On the 19th of March, Generals Dommartin and Caffarelli reconnoitred the fortress, and it was then determined to attack the front of the saliant angle to the eastward. On the 30th, the trenches were opened about 150 fathoms from the wall, and advantage was taken of the garden inclosures, the fosse of the old town, and an aqueduct that crossed the glacis in their formation; but, as the besiegers were deficient in heavy artillery, and could only furnish their batteries with eight and twelve pounders, and mortars of five inches, the impression made by them was neither sudden nor formidable. On the day the trenches were opened, the garrison made a spirited sortie, but were repulsed with some loss, and forced to retire with precipitation within the walls. As the tower, against which the principal attack was directed, appeared to be pierced towards the afternoon of the 1st of April, and the counterscarp was supposed to be destroyed by a mine which had been sprung, the troops demanded and obtained leave to advance to storm the fortress. It soon, however, became evident, that but little pains had been taken to ascertain the nature of the works; for on rushing forward it was discovered, that a ditch of fifteen feet was to be passed, while the counterscarp was almost untouched, and the breach, which was not large,

* "These," observes Mr. Morier, (secretary to the Earl of Elgin, then the British ambassador at Constantinople) "were the prisoners, whom Assalini, in his very able work on the plague, alluded to, when he says, that for three days the Turks shewed no symptoms of that disease, and it was their putrifying remains which produced the pestilential malady which he describes as afterwards making such ravages in the French army. The bones still lie in heaps, and are shewn to every traveller who arrives; nor can they be confounded with those who perished in the assault; since the field of butchery lies a mile from the town.

"Such a fact should not, however, be alledged without some proof or leading circumstance stronger than assertion, being produced to support it; but there would be a want of generosity in naming individuals, and branding them to the latest posterity with infamy for obeying a command, when their submission became an act of necessity; therefore, to establish further the authority of the relation, this only can be mentioned—That it was Bon's division which fired, and thus every one is afforded the opportunity of satisfying themselves respecting the truth, by enquiring of officers serving in the different brigades composing the division."

Notwithstanding the respectability of Mr. Morier, had his account of this affair stood solitary, suspicion might have thrown a doubt upon its veracity; but, unfortunately for the credit of Buonaparte, the most damning proofs of his infamy are on record, and Mr. Morier's testimony is amply supported.

Dr. Wittman, in his travels in Asiatic Turkey, says:—"After a breach had been effected, the French troops stormed and carried the place. It was probably owing to the obstinate defence made by the Turks, that the French commander-in-chief was induced to give orders for the horrid massacre which succeeded. Four thousand of the wretched inhabitants, who had surrendered, and who had, in vain, implored the mercy of the conquerors, were, together with a part of the late Turkish garrison of El-Arisch, (amounting, it has been said, to five or six hundred) dragged out in cold blood, four days after the French had obtained possession of Jaffa, to the sand hills, in the way to Gaza, and there most inhumanly put to death. I have seen the skeletons of these unfortunate victims, which lie scattered over the hills, a modern Golgotha, which remains a lasting disgrace to a nation calling itself civilized."

Dr. Wittman, after stating the fact of his having visited the scene of this massacre, observes:—"The surface of the ground had been sometime before thickly covered with the skeletons of the victims; but at the time of my visit they were much reduced in number; the Grand Vizier having ordered a large hole to be dug, into which as many as could be well collected were thrown. Sculls, bones, remnants of clothing, &c. &c. were still, notwithstanding, scattered over every part of the hillocks."

As though Buonaparte were anxious to "Out Herod Herod," in cruelty, and to convince his army that he would suffer no sentiment of humanity, nor any feeling of gratitude, to interfere with his interest, or even with his convenience, he followed up this atrocious act by another. Finding that the hospitals at Jaffa were crowded with sick, he sent for a physician, whose name, as Sir Robert Wilson justly observes, ought to be inscribed in letters of gold, but whose personal safety has rendered it necessary to conceal. On his arrival, he entered into a long conversation with him respecting the danger of contagion, which he concluded by observing, that something must be done to remedy the evil, and that the destruction of the sick then in the hospital was the only measure which could be adopted for that purpose. The physician, alarmed at the proposal, bold in the cause of virtue and humanity, remonstrated strongly against the act, and represented the cruelty and atrocity of such a murder; but, finding Buonaparte persisted in his wicked purpose, and had even recourse to threats, he indignantly broke from him, and left his tent, with this memorable observation: "Neither my principles, nor the character of my profession, will allow me to become a butcher of human beings; and, General, if such qualities as you insinuate are necessary to form a great man, I thank my God that I do not possess them." Buonaparte, however, was not to be diverted from his object by any moral considerations, and he found an apothecary who had not the virtue to resist the weight of his authority, (but who has since made some atonement by an unequivocal confession of the fact) and who consented to become the minister of his guilt, and to administer poison to the sick. A sufficient quantity of opium was, accordingly, mixed with pleasant food, of which the unsuspecting victims freely partook; and, in a few hours, 580 soldiers, who had suffered so much for the tyrants of their afflicted country, and to gratify the ambition of this guilty individual, thus miserably perished by his order. On the return of Buonaparte from Syria, the same virtuous physician, who had refused to become the instrument of murder, and to destroy those whom it was his duty to protect, publicly accused the General, before all the members of the institute at Cairo, of high treason against the honour of France, against her children, and against humanity; and he there entered into all the particulars of the poisoning of the sick, and of the massacre of the Turks; and farther charged Buonaparte with having previously caused a number of French and Copts, who were infected with the plague, to be strangled at Rosetta; thus proving that this horrible mode of getting rid of his sick, was the result of premeditation, and a plan which he wished to introduce into general practice. In vain did the unfeeling wretch attempt to justify his conduct; the astonished members sate petrified with terror, and almost doubted whether the scene passing before their eyes was not an illusion.

had been effected upwards of six feet above the level of the works. Notwithstanding these obstacles, a body of grenadiers, headed by Mailly, an officer of the staff, descended into the ditch, and attempted to scale the wall; but their leader was shot, and it being discovered that the only effect produced by the late explosion was a small opening in the glacis, nothing could be achieved. The garrison was at first seized with terror, and many of the Turkish soldiers ran towards the harbour, but no sooner did they discover that the opening in the wall was several feet above the rubbish, than they returned to the charge, and showered down stones, grenades, and combustibles, upon the assailants, who were obliged to retire, after losing two Adjutants-General, Escale and Laugier, and a great number of men. This event afforded so much encouragement to the troops of the Pacha, that on the 5th they made another sally, in which they killed Detroye, Chef de Brigade, and several others of the besiegers. In the interim, the English squadron discovered, in the neighbourhood of Mount Carmel, a corvette, and nine sail of gun boats, laden with artillery and ammunition, intended to assist in the reduction of Acra. Seven vessels belonging to this flotilla, containing all the battering train, were captured; and this fortunate incident contributed greatly to save the city, no intelligence having been received by the French army of the three frigates which had sailed from Alexandria for Jaffa. At this period of the siege, Ghezzar dispersed his firmauns among the Naplouzians, as well as into the towns in the Said, requesting the true believers to rise and overwhelm the infidels. The British squadron, which had been driven from the unsheltered anchorage of St. Jean d'Acra by the equinoctial gales, had no sooner resumed its station, than another sortie was determined upon, for the purpose of destroying a mine, made by the enemy below the tower. In this operation, undertaken on the 7th, the British marines and seamen were to force their way into the mine, while the Turkish troops attacked the enemy's trenches on the right and left. The sally took place on the morning of the 7th, just before day-light; and Lieutenant Wright, who commanded the seamen-pioneers, notwithstanding he received two shots in his right arm as he advanced, entered the mine with the pikemen, and proceeded to the bottom of it, where he verified its direction, and by pulling down the supporters, destroyed all that could be destroyed in its present state; Colonel Douglas supported the seamen in this service with distinguished gallantry, and brought off Lieutenant Wright, who had scarcely strength left to get out of the enemy's trenches, from which they were not dislodged. In this gallant enterprise, Major Oldfield, to whom the command of the marines from the Theseus had been confided, was mortally wounded, and made prisoner.

All the neighbouring districts were now in arms, and the Samaritan Arabs evinced so much daring as to make incursions even into the French camp. Under these circumstances, Buonaparte dispatched first the General of Brigade, Junot, and afterwards Kleber, against the enemy, whom he was determined to drive across the Jordan. Finding that the troops already sent from the main army, strengthened as they had been by 1000 infantry, were still insufficient to crush the native force brought into the field, Buonaparte determined to proceed against the enemy in person. Having repaired through Fouli, along the defiles of the mountains, he perceived on the 16th, Kleber's division, consisting of 2000 Frenchmen, fighting at the foot of Mount Tabor, and nearly encircled by upwards of 25,000 horse. The commander-in-chief immediately formed his infantry and cavalry into three squares, with a design to cut off their retreat towards Jennin, where their magazines were established, and to drive them before him in the direction of the river, on the banks of which they would be overwhelmed by Murat. For this purpose, the Adjutant-General Le Turq, with the cavalry and two pieces of cannon, was detached against the Mamelukes, which he descried at some distance, while General Rampon was ordered to take the enemy in flank, and General Vial to intercept them in their flight. As soon as Kleber had received intimation, by the discharge of a twelve-pounder, that he was about to be succoured, he attacked and carried the village of Fouli with the bayonet; he then charged the cavalry, which had already been thrown into confusion by the French horse under Rampon, and obliged them, after experiencing much loss, to retire behind Mount Tabor, where a great number were drowned in the river Jordan.

Having burnt the Naplouzian villages, and killed such of the inhabitants as had incurred his displeasure, Buonaparte hastened to return to the camp before Acra, and took with him his état major, the division of General Bon, and the corps of cavalry under General Murat. The siege was now pushed on with increased vigour, and the invaders at length beheld the completion of the mine destined to destroy the tower, which had so long withstood all their efforts; but, on setting fire to the mine on the 25th, the operation was found to be incomplete. Although one of the angles was carried away, the breach remained as difficult of access as before, and such showers of burning materials were poured down upon a body of grenadiers, who were ordered to reconnoitre the means of communication between the tower and the other parts of the fortress, that they were compelled to retire, and General Caffarelli, and the Chef de Battaillon Say, perished in these enterprises, while General Veaux, and several other officers of distinction, were dangerously wounded. The garrison, invigorated by the presence of the English, and defended by the skill of Phillippeaux, who unfortunately soon after died, of a fever contracted by want of rest, and extraordinary exertions in the public service, had by this time erected cavaliers, and constructed two places of arms, together with batteries, so contrived as to flank the tower, and produce all the advantages arising from a cross-fire. But on the 1st of May, after many hours heavy cannonade from thirty pieces of artillery, brought by the enemy from Jaffa, a fourth attempt was made to mount the breach, now much widened. The Tigre moored on one side, and the Theseus on the other, flanked the town-walls; and the gun-boats, launches, and other row-boats, continued to flank the enemy's trenches, to their great annoyance, till at length they were repulsed with loss, and obliged to desist from the attack. At this time, though the forty-fourth day of the siege, the garrison had the satisfaction to find themselves in a better state of defence than they were on the first day the enemy opened their trenches, and the gallant defenders of Acra felt increased confidence that they should be able to resist every assault of the besiegers. The enemy, notwithstanding their various repulses, continued to batter in breach with progressive success, and up to the 9th of May, had made nine several attempts to storm, but had as often been beaten back with immense slaughter. The garrison had long been in expectation of a reinforcement, under Hassan Bey, who had originally received orders to advance against Alexandria, but was afterwards directed to proceed to the relief of Acra. It was not however till the fifty-first day of the siege, that this fleet made its appearance; and the approach of so much additional strength was the signal to Buonaparte for a vigorous and persevering assault, in hopes to get possession of the town before the reinforcement could disembark. The constant fire of the besiegers was suddenly increased ten-fold, and notwithstanding the exertions of the garrison, supported by the fire of several cannon and carronades, under the able direction of Mr. Schoder, the master's mate of the Theseus, Mr. Jones, midshipman of the Tigre, and Mr. Bray, the carpenter of the same ship, the enemy continued to gain ground, and on the night of the 8th of May, they had succeeded in making a lodgment in the second story of the north-east tower. Day-light on the 9th shewed the French standard unfurled on the outer angle of the tower, and their troops had covered themselves in the lodgment, having constructed two traverses across the ditch composed of sand bags, and the bodies of their dead built in with them.

them. At this most critical point of the contest, Hassan Bey's troops, though they had advanced half way towards the shore, were still in their boats. Sir Sidney Smith, whose energy and talents gave effect to every operation, landed the boats on the mole, and placing himself at the head of the crew, marched them to the breach, each man being armed with a pike. A heap of ruins between the besieged and besiegers served as a breast-work for both; the muzzles of the muskets touched, and the spear heads of the standards locked. Ghezzar Pacha, hearing that the English were on the breach, quitted his station, where, according to the ancient Turkish custom, he was sitting to reward such as should bring him the heads of the enemy, and distributing cartridges with his own hands. This energetic old man, coming behind his British allies, pulled them down with violence, saying, "if any harm happen to our English friends, all will be lost." The whole of the reinforcements being now landed, the Pacha, with some difficulty, so far subdued his jealousy as to admit the Chifflick regiment, of 1,000 men, into the garden of his seraglio. From thence a vigorous sally was made, with an intention to obtain possession of the enemy's third parallel or nearest trench, but the Turks were unequal to such a movement, and they were driven back into the town with loss. The sortie, although it did not succeed, had the effect of obliging the enemy to expose themselves above their parapets, and the flanking fire of the garrison, aided by a few hand grenades, thrown by Mr. Savage, midshipman of the Theseus, dislodged them from the Tower, and killed or dispersed all that remained at that station. Determined to persevere, the enemy effected a new breach by an incessant fire directed to the southward, every shot knocking down whole sheets of a wall, much less solid than that of the tower, on which they had expended so much time and ammunition. The group of French Generals and aides-de-camp, which the shells from the sixty-eight pounders had frequently dispersed, was now re-assembled on an eminence, rendered famous by the exploits of an English chief, and Buonaparte was distinguishable on Richar Cœur de Lion's Mount, burning with rage, and indicating, by his gesticulations, that the attack was to be renewed. A little before sun-set, a massive column appeared advancing to the breach with solemn step. At the suggestion of the Pacha, the breach was not this time defended, but a certain number of the enemy was let in, and then closed upon, according to the Turkish mode of war. The column thus mounted the breach unmolested, and descended from the rampart into the Pacha's garden, where, in a very few minutes, the bravest and most advanced among them lay headless corpses, the sabre in one hand, and a dagger in the other, proving more than a match for the bayonets. The survivors, finding the assault desperate, hastened to sound a retreat, and General Lannes, who was seen encouraging his men to mount the breach, was carried off severely wounded by a musket-shot. In this conflict, General Rombaud was killed, and on the same day, General Bon received a mortal wound, of which he soon afterwards expired. Thus ended a contest, continued with little intermission for five and twenty hours, and in which, nature, sinking under the exertion, demanded repose.

As the troops of Buonaparte before Acra relaxed in their zeal, and the capture of the place became dubious, chagrin and indignation began to be visible in the face and actions of that General, who, for the first time in his life, beheld himself foiled, and that too by a town scarcely defensible according to the rules of art; while the surrounding hills were crowded with a multitude of spectators, awaiting the result of the contest, to declare for the victor. The plague also had, by this time, found its way into the French camp, and 700 men had already fallen martyrs to that terrible malady. In this deplorable situation it was determined by the French commander-in-chief to make a last effort, and General Kleber's division was recalled from the fords of Jordan, to take its turn in the daily efforts to mount the breach at Acra, in which every other division in succession had failed, with the loss of their bravest men, and about three-fourths of their officers. Before this reinforcement could commence its operations, another sally was made by the Turkish Chifflick regiment, on the night of the 10th of May. These troops, acting under the command of Soliman Aga, the Lieutenant-Colonel, succeeded in making themselves masters of the enemy's third parallel; but the impetuosity of a few of the Turks carried them on to the second trench, where they lost some of their standards, though they succeeded before their retreat in spiking four guns. Kleber's division, instead of mounting the breach, according to Buonaparte's intention, were thus obliged to spend their time and strength in recovering these works, in which they succeeded after a conflict of three hours, leaving every thing in statu quo, except the loss of men, which was considerable on both sides. After this failure, the French grenadiers absolutely refused to mount the breach any more over the putrid bodies of their unburied companions, sacrificed in former attacks by Buonaparte's impatience and precipitation, which led him to commit such palpable errors, that even seamen could take advantage of them. Exasperated by disappointment, Buonaparte directed his last effort to purposes of revenge. With this view he ordered that all the batteries, cannon, and mortars, should be directed against the palace of Ghezzar, and that the remainder of the siege-ammunition should be expended in demolishing the fortifications and other public buildings. To check this work of destruction, the besieged made two vigorous sorties from the garrison on the 16th of May, in both of which they were driven back with loss. During the night of the 17th, the French army began the removal of the sick, the wounded, and the park of artillery; and on the 18th and 19th, the advanced-guard, under General Junot, quitting the camp before Acra, marched towards Egypt, and took a position at Saffarie. On the 20th, the garrison, perceiving the force of the French to be much weakened, made a general sortie, which they repeated in the afternoon with increased vigour. Neither of these efforts was attended with complete success, and in the course of that day the French removed their battering cannon, having previously destroyed an aqueduct of several leagues in length, which supplied the town of Acra with fresh water, and reduced all the magazines and crops in its vicinity to ashes. This night, at nine o'clock, the Generale was beaten, and the siege, after sixty days continuance, was raised; the besieging commander representing Acra as a place not worth the sacrifice of a few more days!

Buonaparte was obliged to leave behind him all his heavy artillery, either buried or thrown into the sea, where it was easily raised; and his battering train, amounting to 23 pieces, fell into the hands of the English. The French, after blowing up the fortifications of Jaffa and Gaza, and inflicting a terrible vengeance on those who had defended their country against the invaders, passed over the desert, and were received by the inhabitants of Cairo, ignorant of recent events, as victors. Unabashed by his late check, and unintimidated by the sinistrous communications of a soldiery, who had lately murmured against and even menaced their chief, Buonaparte distributed recompenses to some, inflicted marks of ignominy on others, and so far regained the confidence of all, that in the course of a few days his army offered to encounter new toils and new dangers in Egypt, under a commander whom they were on the point of sacrificing in Syria.

Buonaparte's attention, after his arrival in Egypt, had been directed to the accomplishment of one essential part of his project—the establishment of a communication and concert with the great enemy of the British government in India, Tippoo Sultaun, for the grand purpose of extirpating the English from their Oriental Settlements. He apprized Tippoo of his arrival on the shores of the Red Sea, and requested him to send some confidential person, with whom he might confer on the subject of their mutual plans. Tippoo, too, on his part, had established a close intercourse with Zemaun Shah, a native prince of great power and influence, in order order to concert such a formidable attack upon the English, as, it was hoped, they would be unable to resist. Mr. Pitt, however, most fortunately for the interest of his country, had placed, at the head of the Indian government, a young nobleman, of a mind possessing, in a peculiar degree, every qualification for a great statesman. The wisdom, the vigilance, the energy, decision, zeal, resolution, and activity, of Lord Mornington, (now Marquis Wellesley) were eminently calculated to meet, and to subdue, those serious dangers which threatened the subversion of British power in the East. After his Lordship had removed all the previous difficulties which he had to encounter, he assembled, with promptitude, a force adequate to the great design which he had formed of curtailing, if not of destroying, the means of annoyance which were possessed by the Sultaun of the Mysore, to a very alarming extent. Being now prepared for attack, he communicated to Tippoo the knowledge which he had acquired of his hostile designs, of his alliance with the French, and of his preparations for war, and offered, if he would forego these projects, which were as hostile to existing treaties, as they were subversive of sound policy and good faith, to send an officer to treat with him, for the establishment and preservation of a friendly intercourse between him and the British government. The wily Sultaun sent an equivocal answer to this candid communication, and, while he sought to elude the vigilance of the English policy, he hastened his preparations for the destruction of English power. But Lord Mornington was not to be led astray by Indian artifice. Equally wise in council, and vigorous in action, he ordered the British army to take the field at the commencement of the year 1799. It was commanded in chief by Lieutenant General Harris, who, after a series of successful operations, set himself down before the capital of Tippoo's dominions, at the latter end of April, and, on the last day of that month, began to batter in breach. On the 3d of May, a practicable breach was effected, and, on the following morning Seringapatam, was taken by assault. Tippoo himself, and several of his chiefs, perished in the action. This splendid achievement afforded the means of consolidating the strength of the British dominion in the East, by annihilating the most dangerous of all the native powers, and by gaining possession of a country, and of fortresses, which, while they increased internal security, supplied a fresh barrier against external attack. The French Directory had thus the mortification of being not only foiled in one of their greatest attempts, but of witnessing the utter extinction of those means and resources by which they hoped to accomplish it. In a word, their friendship proved as fatal to Tippoo, as their enmity had proved to the minor princes of Europe.

After the return of Buonaparte, from Syria to Egypt, the Turkish force made a vain attempt to recover that country from the French. The undisciplined Mussulmans were, after an obstinate action near Aboukir, defeated with great loss, on the 25th of July, and compelled to retire. Buonaparte, however, ruminating on his repulse at Acra, where he had, for the first time, experienced defeat and disgrace, and fearful that his attempts to impose on his followers, whom, on the present occasion, he had succeeded in persuading, that his expedition to Acra had answered every purpose for which it had been undertaken, and had covered the army with glory, might not always be successful, resolved to repair to a country more congenial with his disposition and pursuits. This resolution to betray his duty, to abandon his post, and to desert those gallant men who had braved every danger, and had faced death and destruction in every form, at his command, was only exceeded in baseness by the mode in which it was accomplished. Leaving a sealed packet, addressed to General Kleber, nominating that officer to the command of the army in Egypt, during his absence; he embarked suddenly, on the 24th of August, with Generals Berthier, Lannes, Murat, and Andréossi, accompanied by Monge, Beutholet, and Arnaud, members of the Egyptian institute, and attended by several Mamelukes; the future guards of his person. He communicated his intention to none but those whom he intended to accompany him, he stripped the military chests of the last sol; and he left the army in a most deplorable state. He was a deserter too, in every sense of the word; for he left his command without orders, and even without permission; and had he been tried by the articles of war, then in force in every country of Europe, France herself not excepted, he must have been found guilty, and have suffered an ignominious death as a deserter! However, by that singular good fortune, to which he had so often been indebted, he escaped repeatedly from the vigilance of the English cruisers, and landed, first at Ajaccio, and then at Frejus. On his arrival at Paris, on the 16th of October, he was courted by all parties, and invited by the Directory to a grand festival, during which it was found impossible to veil that jealousy and distrust which now began to prevail between the General and several of the members of the government.

Hitherto the Congress at Radstadt had proved ineffective. The late expedition into the Roman territory had proved eminently disastrous to the King of Naples, now an exile from his kingdom; and, on the 7th of January, (1799) an armistice was signed by Prince Pignatelli, on behalf of the Neapolitan government, by which the French forces under Championnet, obtained possession of the city of Capua, and thence advanced to the capital, which they entered, on the 23d, after a gallant, but unavailing resistance.

Naples was then proclaimed a republic, under the designation of the Parthenopean commonwealth; and the provisional government was confided to twenty-one citizens, chosen by the French General.

Whilst the French plenipotentiaries were menacing the ministers of the Emperor of Germany with a renewal of hostilities, if a passage were afforded to the Russian troops into Italy; and, while the army under Championnet was employed in establishing the Parthenopean republic, the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, in front of Coblentz, was obliged, after a memorable defence, to capitulate, on the 24th of January, to the French General D'Allemagne.

About the conclusion of the preceding year, the British government had formed a treaty with a new ally, for the purpose of opposing the successes of the arms of France, for checking the extension of the principles of anarchy, and for securing the re-establishment of the balance of Europe. The Emperor Paul, of Russia, entered into a combination against the French republic, with all the zeal inspired by a chivalrous attachment to the cause of legitimate government, and an hereditary passion for military glory. An appearance of negociation was still kept up at Radstadt; but the Emperor of Germany, dissatisfied with the provisions of the treaty of Campo Formio, and being now certain of powerful co-operation in the event of a renewal of the contest, no longer concealed his sentiments. In a short time, the armies of the rival powers had taken the field. The Austrian forces, to the amount of 55,000 men, assembled between the Inn and the Lech, under the command of the Archduke Charles. Generals Starray and Hotze headed about 20,000 more in the Palatinate, and the country of the Grisons; General Bellegarde occupied the Tyrol, with about 25,000; and an army of at least 60,000 under General Kray, prepared to enter Italy, and re-conquer Lombardy. The command of the French "army of the Danube" was confided to General Jourdan, whose plan of the campaign was on the most grand and imposing scale. He proposed, that he himself should be placed at the head of 80,000 men, while three subordinate bodies, consisting, one of 40,000 for the Rhine, another of 40,000 for the Tyrol, and the last of 20,000 for Switzerland, should act under his direction. The army of Italy was at the same time to be augmented to 140,000 soldiers, and 80,000 were to be reserved for home service. But the French General, on his arrival at his head-quarters, found that he had over-rated his force. Relying on the speedy arrival of succours, he addressed a proclamation to his troops, in which he stated, that the Austrians had already passed the the line of demarcation. He then made the necessary dispositions, and, on the 1st of March, crossed the Rhine in three different places. General Bernadotte, having summoned Philipsburg, which was resolutely defended by the Rhinegrave of Salm, immediately formed the blockade of that fortress with the army of observation; while Manheim readily obeyed the summons of another body of French troops, and opened its gates to the invaders.*

The Archduke removed his head-quarters, on the 20th of March, to Umerdorf, near Biberach, and determined to give battle immediately to the French, who had now reached Pfullendorf, and were posted on a line with their right at Salmansweiller and Mandorf, their centre near Stokach, and their left at Mingen. The day was contested with great bravery on both sides, and Jourdan continued to maintain his position, until night put an end to the action; when, under cover of darkness, he retreated to a station near Engen. On the 25th, a second battle was fought on the plain of Lieblingen, in the midst of woods; and such was the eagerness on both sides, that the two commanders-in-chief, after reconnoitring in person, instead of assuming as usual, a centre position in the rear, fought at the head of their respective troops. Night, which again put an end to the combat, left the victory undecided; and the ensuing morning discovered the invaders renewing their attack on the village of Walevis, which had been gallantly defended the preceding evening. Being, however, once more foiled, and despairing of success on any other point, General Jourdan, after sustaining a loss of about 4000 men, fell back, with his centre on the heights of Villengen and Rothwell, to cover the valley of Kintzig; while the right wing, under General Ferino, took post at the entrance of the Val D'Enfer; and the left, commanded by St. Cyr, occupied the banks of the Kniebiss. The Archduke, following up his success, dislodged the enemy from these positions, with considerable loss, and obliged them, after a disorderly retreat, to re-cross the Rhine at Lauttemburg and Strasburgh; while Jourdan returned to Paris, and imputed the blame of his miscarriage to the government, who had ordered him, contrary to his own judgment, to attack the imperialists with an army, inferior to what he had proposed.

Massena, to whom the command of the army of Switzerland was confided, had taken the field for the purpose of driving the Austrians from the mountainous regions inhabited by the Grisons. But the defeat of the grand army in Suabia checked his career, and enabled the Archduke Charles to derange the plan of operations marked out for the French armies, by marching his victorious troops along the banks of the Rhine towards Switzerland.

Notwithstanding the rupture between France and the Emperor, the congress of Radstadt continued to sit. The Austrian plenipotentiaries at length withdrew, and those of the republic were preparing to follow their example, when they received a letter from Colonel Barbacsy, of the Szekler huzzars, dated the 28th of April, enjoining them to depart within the space of twenty-four hours. Determined to comply without loss of time with this peremptory order, they set out that very night, two hours after sun-set; but no sooner had they advanced a quarter of a league from the city, than they were despoiled of their papers, and two of their number assassinated. Bonnier fell, pierced with many wounds; Roberjot was murdered while clasped in the arms of his wife, who vainly hoped to afford him protection; but Jean Debry, though cut with sabres, in the presence of his two daughters, his secretary, and servants, fortunately escaped, by feigning that death which the assassins intended for him. After wandering during the whole night in a wood, he was fortunate enough to return unperceived to Rastadt.

This extraordinary affair astonished all Europe, and produced the most violent complaints on the part of the French government. The gallant Archduke promised to inflict the most exemplary punishment on such of his troops as might have committed so foul a murder, and actually delivered up to Massena twelve individuals found near Radstadt, clothed in the uniform of the Szekler huzzars, though it afterwards appeared that they did not belong to that regiment. Germany has never yet beheld this guilty and mysterious deed either explained or expiated; but there are strong reasons for suspecting, that the Directory themselves were implicated in its perpetration.

The chief command of the French armies in Italy had been transferred from Championnet to Sherer, and his first efforts were directed against Tuscany. Having obtained possession of the capital, the port of Leghorn was at the same time seized by General Miollis, and all the property appertaining to the subjects of Britain, Portugal, Austria, Russia, the Ottoman Porte, and the states of Barbary, subjected to sequestration; while the grand Duke and his family were furnished with a guard of honour, and allowed to proceed without molestation to the German capital. Scherer then marched to Mantua, where it was determined to attack the enemy before they could receive any reinforcements from Suabia, or had effected a junction with the Russians. The command of the Austrian army had been intrusted to General Kray, who now occupied Verona, and the neighbourhood of that city, with a body of 20,000 men; from eight to 10,000 were posted at Porto Langnano; the heights of Pastringo, Cyse, and Calmasino, were fortified with great care; and while the right wing extended to the lake of Garda, the left was posted on the Adige, over which were thrown two bridges of boats, which at once maintained the communication, and in case of exigency would facilitate a retreat. The French army was on this occasion formed into several divisions, five of which were to attack the enemy in front, while the sixth, under General Serrurier, received orders to pass the Adige, and after forming a junction with other troops, posted in the neighbourhood of Trent, to turn the enemy's flank in the mountains. On the 26th of March, the action commenced in the neighbourhood of Castel Nuovo, between the lake of Garda and the Adige. The battle continued with various success from sun-rising till night; during which General Moreau, who served as a volunteer, and assumed the direction of the right wing of the army, took 1400 prisoners; but Scherer being routed, Moreau was obliged to relinquish his advantages, and retreated across the Adige to Peschiera. In the course of the day, the post of Massino was carried by the French no less than seven different times, by means of fresh troops; but they were finally repulsed with severe loss, and General Kaim, who was himself wounded, observed in his report, "That there was no former example of so deadly a fire of musket shot having been maintained without interruption during the space of eighteen hours." Three days after this sanguinary conflict, Scherer again attacked all the Austrian posts. Having dislodged General Kaim from his position before Verona, he threw bridges over the Adige, and detached a division which drove back the advanced posts of the imperialists to within half a league of that city, and succeeded in gaining a height which covered their right flank. To repel this attack, General Kray detached the division of General Frolich, which, marching through the city, fell upon the French in three columns, and, after an obstinate resistance, drove them from the eminence. This retreat was so precipitate, and the pursuit so vigorous, that the bridges were broken down, and almost a whole column of the enemy were prevented from passing the Adige. Part of them were in consequence compelled to surrender, and the remainder made a fruitless attempt to escape through the mountains. In this battle, so disastrous to the arms of France, their loss was estimated at 7000 men.

* In reply to the declaration circulated by General Jourdan, the Archduke published a proclamation, dated the 3d of March, from his head-quarters at Friedburg, in which he impeached the faith of the Directory. These manifestoes were followed by declarations on the part of the Emperor, and on the part of the Directory, in which they charged each other with violating the faith of treaties, and with again plunging the continent of Europe into all the horrors of war.

The Russian commander dispatched by the Emperor Paul arrived at Verona, on the 18th of April, with his advanced guard, and took upon himself the command of the Austro-Russian army, now estimated at 100,000 men. At this critical period Scherer resigned to Moreau the command of his reduced and dispersed army. A retreat having therefore become absolutely necessary, Isola della Scala and Villa Franca were abandoned in succession; the Mincio was crossed, and the fortresses of Peschiera and Mantua being abandoned to their fate, Generals Kray and Klanau formed the blockade of both, with a body of 25,000 men. Suworow, the Russian General, hastened to avail himself of the advantages he enjoyed over a retreating foe, and two days after his arrival at head-quarters, the town and citadel of Brescia, with a garrison of 1000 men, capitulated to the troops under his command. Various successes crowned the exertions of the allied army; an engagement, fought on the 27th of April, determined the fate of the Cisalpine republic, and on the morning of the following day, the conquerors entered the city of Milan. About the same time, the Field-Marshal Count de Bellegarde obtained an uninterrupted series of successes, in the mountainous regions of the Engadine; while Hotze, by a general attack on the French troops in the Grison country, dislodged them from all their positions between Luciensteig and Coire, with a loss on the part of the enemy of sixteen pieces of cannon, and 2000 prisoners. In Switzerland, several partial insurrections directed against the French authorities took place at the same period; the whole canton of Uri was in arms; the people of the Valais, protected by a body of Austrians, under General Kaim, had risen in mass; and a great part of the Valteline was in possession of the imperialists. Peschiera also surrendered after a short siege to General Count St. Julien; Mantua was closely pressed; the capital of Piedmont was at the same time threatened by a column of the allies; and Moreau, yielding to superior numbers, was obliged to abandon his strong position between the Po and Tenaro, after defeating General Vukassowich on the banks of the Bormida. The disasters of the French in Italy were productive of extraordinary changes in the southern part of that peninsula, and subjected those who had taken part in the revolutions in Naples and Rome to the most terrible responsibility. Ferdinand IV. although he had abandoned his capital, was not wholly forsaken by his subjects. The inhabitants of the provinces, in particular, still retained an affection for their absent King, and a zeal of sufficient energy to render them ready to sacrifice their lives in his cause.—These sentiments had been carefully cherished by the Cardinal Ruffo, who repaired to Calabria, where he raised a number of new levies round the royal standard.

Having overcome the detachments sent against him, in several actions, Ruffo determined on still greater exploits. No sooner was intelligence received that the French had evacuated Naples, than, after collecting the wreck of General Mack's army, and being joined by a body of English and Russians, he marched against the capital, of part of which he made himself master on the feast of St. Anthony. The executive directory of Naples, the members of the legislature, and all those who had held any offices under, or had countenanced the Parthenopean republic, were now driven from the city, and obliged to take shelter within the fortresses, which fell in succession into the hands of the royal forces; and, on the 13th of July, Fort St. Elmo, the last and the strongest of these military stations, was obliged to capitulate to the allies assisted by a body of British seamen. The satisfaction derived from the retreat of the French army was not confined to the kingdom of Naples, but extended to every part of Italy. In Tuscany, 40,000 of the inhabitants, on learning the disasters of Moreau and Macdonald, immediately flew to arms, and attacked the republicans on every side. The garrison of Florence immediately abandoned the capital, on which the populace cut down the tree of liberty, and the ancient magistrates resumed their functions. A few days after, a column of Austrians obliged the invaders to abandon Lucca; and Leghorn was evacuated in consequence of a capitulation which restored the former government. Rome, however, remained unconquered; but the most vigorous measures were now taken to subdue that city; and while a body of Tuscan troops, aided by a detachment of Neapolitans, invested the ancient capital of the world, Captain Troubridge, who had appeared off the mouth of the Tiber, with an English squadron under his command, summoned General Grenier, the commander of the garrison, to surrender. Feeling an entire confidence in the good faith of the British, a negotiation was entered into with the Captain, which terminated in a convention on the 20th of September, by which it was agreed to surrender Rome, Civita Vecchia, and the posts adjacent to both, on condition that the troops should be sent to France; that the allies of the republic, who had either acted in a public capacity, or served along with the Romans, should be allowed to depart unmolested; and that no Roman citizen should be called to account for his conduct during the occupation of Rome by the French.

General Macdonald, having reached Florence, collected the scattered French forces throughout Tuscany, and finding himself at the head of 38,000 troops, he determined immediately to act on the offensive. After forcing the allies to raise the siege of Fort Urbino, he dispatched Oliver against Modena, of which he obtained possession on the 12th of June, and drove the Austrians beyond the Po; while General Kray, alarmed at the progress of the enemy, drew off his heavy artillery from before Mantua, and posted himself in such a situation as to prevent that city from being relieved. Macdonald continued to advance, and having arrived at Piacenza, and formed a junction with General Victor, he attacked General Ott on the same day, and obliged him to fall back on the castle of Giovanni. As soon as Suworow had obtained intelligence of the victorious career of the French General, he marched with the principal part of his force to Alexandria, leaving General Kaim to prosecute the siege of Turin in his absence. He advanced to the Trebia, at the head of seventeen battalions of Russians, twelve battalions of Austrian dragoons, and three regiments of cossacks, and by forced marches arrived with his advanced guard to the support of General Ott, who was in full retreat. At a village six miles distant from Piacenza, a general engagement took place, on the 17th,* which, having been continued through the following days, terminated in

* Suworow began the attack, on the left wing of the French, with fixed bayonets, while their right wing and flank were assailed with equal impetuosity. Macdonald, who had advanced against the centre, seeing himself assailed on all sides, fell back behind the Tidone, where he received the enemy with so brisk a fire of artillery and small arms, that nothing further could be effected in the course of the night. Early the next morning, the allies crossed the Tidone, on the banks of which they had encamped the preceding night, and advanced in four columns against the French, who were drawn up in line of battle along the course of the Trebia, one of the most rapid rivers in Italy. At length the van-guard, under the command of Prince Pangrazion, with four squadrons of the Karaczay horse, and four regiments of Cossacks, reached the left wing of the French army a little after noon. Having turned the flank, they again assailed the adversary with fixed bayonets; and so terrible was the charge, that 500 republicans remained dead on the field of battle; while the Adjutant-General, two Colonels, and 600 privates of the Polish regiment of Dembrouski, were made prisoners, and two pieces of cannon, and a standard, taken. By another attack made on the centre, the French were driven over the Trebia; but Macdonald, undismayed, soon after re-crossed the river with a body of 10,000 men. The French, now become the assailants, were received with undaunted resolution by a Russian column, and forced, by an uninterrupted fire of musketry and cannon, which continued till eleven o'clock at night, to retire, and remain on the opposite bank of the river. Still the conflict was not decided. The third day's battle did not commence until two hours after noon, as the French waited for a reinforcement under General Lapoype, while the allies were not disinclined to obtain a respite after the multiplied evolutions of the two former actions. At length, though the expected reinforcement had not in favour of the allies. The vanquished army took advantage of the approach of night to retire in two columns to Piacenza, where the four French Generals, Olivier, Ruska, Sulm, and Cambran, with several field-officers, and between four and 5000 soldiers, who had been wounded in the late murderous actions, were left behind, and fell into the hands of the enemy.

Moreau, taking advantage of Suworow's absence, left Genoa at the head of 29,000 men, and marching by the Bochette, Gavi, and Novi, descended into the plain, where, on the 20th of June, he attacked and beat Field-Marshal Bellegarde, who had been left to superintend the blockade of Alexandria. As soon as the Russian Field-Marshal received intelligence of these events, he abandoned the pursuit of Macdonald, and endeavoured by a rapid counter-march to overtake General Moreau, who, after fighting another battle, retreated within the precincts of the Ligurian republic. Suworow, however, was consoled in this disappointment by the intelligence of the surrender of Turin, on the 22d of June, and with the capture of Bologna, which fell into the hands of the allies eight days afterwards. Macdonald pursued his march towards Lucca, where he entered the Genoese territory, and formed a junction with Moreau. Thus ended an expedition, in which the French lost more than 12,000 men.

Destitute of a covering army, the Italian fortresses were now obliged to yield to the besiegers. The surrender of Fort Urbino, and St. Leon, were followed in rapid succession by the capitulation of the garrison of Alexandria, and the capture of the almost impregnable fortress of Mantua; the former on the 21st, and the latter on the 28th of July. Suworow, having now conquered the greater part of Italy, began to menace the southern departments of France; but he was kept in check by the army of Moreau, which still occupied its formidable position in the neighbourhood of Genoa, and prevented the advance of the allies by threatening to fall upon his rear. The young men of the requisition were, at the same time, put in motion on the frontier, and Championnet was employed in assembling an army of 40,000 men, in the vicinity of Grenoble. Supplies were also sent to the army of Italy, and the chief command of that army was transferred from General Moreau to General Joubert, who received orders to act on the offensive, and to attempt the immediate relief of Tortona. In pursuance of this order, the French General advanced against the enemy at the head of 36,000 combatants, and encamped, on the 15th of August upon the heights of Novi. The allies were superior in numbers; Suworow and Melas were at the head of 35,000 troops, of their respective nations; 15,000 Piedmontese, who had formerly obliged the garrison of Cevi to surrender, now acted as light troops; while General Kray entered the camp on that very day with 18,000 troops, set at liberty by the fall of Mantua.

Suworow, determined to anticipate the French, whom he knew to be most formidable when they were the assailants, attacked their left wing. General Joubert, in advancing at the head of his staff, was struck with a ball, which pierced his heart. The loss of their General diminished not the ardour of the soldiers. The allies were received every where with intrepidity. The two armies were engaged along the whole extent of their line. The slaughter was terrible, but no impression was made on either side. Thrice did Suworow charge the centre of the enemy, in person, at the head of his gallant veterans, and thrice was he repulsed by the French legions. Moreau again took upon him the command. In the mean time, General Melas, with the left wing of the allies, reached the heights of Novi, on the side of Pietalle, and marching along the banks of the Setivia, completely succeeded in turning the right flank of the French army. This grand manœuvre decided the victory. The danger of being surrounded, compelled the French General to abandon the field of battle to the allies, who took four Generals, and 4000 prisoners, with 37 pieces of cannon, and 57 tumbrils. The rear-guard of the enemy suffered much in the attempt to cover the retreat; and night, which alone saved them from destruction, enabled them to rally their scattered forces, and once more to occupy their former position near Genoa.*

No sooner did the French cease to be formidable, than the fatal effects of jealousy began to be visible, both in the councils and in the camps of the two nations; and the suspicion and distrust of the armies had, at length, attained such an alarming height, that it was deemed impolitic to confine their exertions to the same theatre. It was consequently resolved, that Melas should continue the war in Italy; while the Russians, under Suworow should enter Switzerland, and after defeating the army of Massena, should penetrate the territories of the French republic. The commencement of the campaign in Switzerland was peculiarly auspicious to the French; but their successes were of short duration, for as soon as the season for military operations would permit, the Archduke Charles dispatched Count Neuondorff and Major-General Piaezce, against Schaffhausen and Peterhausen, and both these places fell, about the 18th of April, into the hands of the Austrians. After a succession of engagements, the Austrians were enabled to establish their head-quarters at Zurich, on the 7th of June, and obliged General Massena to retreat to Mount Albis, his left being flanked by the Rhine, and his right by the lake of Zug. Massena, however, having received fresh supplies of men and provisions, advanced over Mount Albis, and recommenced operations against the Archduke, before that Prince had effected a junction with a large body of Russians, now in full march for Schaffhausen. A column of the republicans, detached across the Limmat, penetrated into the Austrian camp, on the 14th of August, and who carried terror and dismay into that city, which they had been so lately forced to abandon. To relieve Massena from the joint pressure of the Austrians and Russians, the French army of observation encamped in the neighbourhood of Mentz, received orders to take the field; and General Muller, to whose charge this duty was confided, accordingly established his head-quarters at Manheim, and pushed his advanced guard as far as Heidelberg; while Baraguay d'Hillers, advancing with a body of troops drawn from the neighbouring garrisons, imposed a contribution upon Francfort, passed the Maine, and joined his countrymen in the territories of Darmstadt. No sooner had the Archduke learnt that a body of French troops, after entering Suabia, was levying contributions, and seizing on the rich harvests of Germany, than he sent forward a strong detachment, and having conferred the command of the Austrian army in Switzerland on General Hotze, soon after re-crossed the Rhine in person. Massena, availing himself of the absence of the Prince, determined once more to obtain a decided superiority in Switzerland, before the arrival of Suworow should render a defensive system necessary. Accordingly, after a number of evolutions, he approached Zurich on the 24th of September, and ordered Lecourbe to enter the not arrived, the republicans determined on a final effort, and the left wing attempted once more to cross the river; but, after a gallant struggle, they were driven back with considerable loss, by Prince Pangrazion. Soon after, the assault was renewed with redoubled violence, on the column commanded by General Sweykowski. In two subsequent attacks the French succeeded in regaining the opposite bank of the Trebia, and the fate of the combat hung for a considerable time in suspence; but at length, after a horrible carnage, a column, which had been ordered to assail the flank of Field-Marshal-Lieutenant Ott, was forced to retreat before the iron ramparts of the Russian phalanx, and Prince Pangrazion, whose skill and gallantry had contributed so much to secure the victory that awaited the allies, having advanced with a body of infantry, while the Austrian

General Melas brought up the artillery at a critical moment, Macdonald was compelled to retreat to the right bank of the Trebia. The trophies obtained by the allies on this occasion, consisted of the field of battle, on which upwards of 1,200 of the enemy lay extended, 700 prisoners, three stand of colours, and several pieces of artillery.

* The battle of Novi was attended with immense advantages to the allies, as it permitted them to send a body of troops into Switzerland, and rendered them masters of Tortona, which had agreed to surrender, if not relieved before a stipulated day. Nor did the Russian General fail upon this occasion to receive the most gracious testimonies of approbation from his sovereign, who, by a special ukase, conferred upon him the title of Prince Italiski.

valley of the Grisons, and turn the left wing of the allies, commanded by Hotze. On the morning of the 25th, the battle commenced with equal gallantry on both sides. General Hotze, however, received a mortal wound early in the engagement, and was taken lifeless from the field. General Petrasch, upon whom the command of the left wing now devolved, finding himself overpowered by numbers, soon found it necessary to retreat; and Prince Koraskow, unable to withstand the reiterated assaults of the enemy's columns, was obliged to give way; on which the French troops carried Zurich by assault, and a considerable body of Russian troops posted in that city was obliged to surrender. The immediate result of this battle consisted in the immense slaughter of the Austro-Russian army: the capture of 5000 prisoners, 100 pieces of cannon, and 15 standards, in addition to the principal part of the baggage of the Russians; and the immediate retreat of the allies, first to the banks of the Thur, and afterwards across the Rhine.

Suworow, having crossed the plains of Piedmont, defeated the troops of Lecourbe, and possessed himself of the heights of St. Gothard, was now about to enter the canton of Uri, when he received an imperfect account of the defeat of the allies at Zurich; and this disastrous intelligence was speedily confirmed by the approach of the retreating Russians. Foaming with rage at a sight so novel to a general unaccustomed to see the Russian legions fly before their adversaries, he had recourse to threats, and intimated to Prince Koraskow, that "He should answer with his head if he made another retrograde step." That unfortunate General, burning with desire to vindicate his character to so gallant a chief, immediately re-assembled the wreck of his troops; and having been joined by a body of Austrians, the corps of Condé, and the Bavarian contingent, determined to attempt a diversion in favour of his commander, by re-assuming his former position before Zurich, during the absence of Massena. But the latter proved his superiority by securing all the intermediate passes, so as to render a near approach not merely difficult, but even fatal.* At length, amidst incessant toils and continual combats, the Russians arrived, on the 3d of October, in the valley of Mutten, and took possession of the bridge after a most obstinate resistance.

The post of Brunnen was also carried the next day: but here ended the progress of the Russian hero. Suworow, after penetrating into the canton of Schwitz, was so conscious of his critical situation, that he determined, for the first time in his life, to retreat. This was accordingly effected in a masterly manner. The loss of the allies, in this series of engagements, was computed at 25,000 men, and that of the French, at 15,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners.

The French had become once more masters of Switzerland, had retaken St. Gothard, and begun to menace the country of the Grisons. General Muller again penetrated into Germany, seized on Francfort, Manheim, and Heidelberg, and threatened to lay all that portion of the empire under contribution.

During the rejoicings of the court of St. Petersburgh at the news of the brilliant successes of Suworow in Italy, the Emperor Paul, indignant that the Germanic states were not actuated by a zeal, ardent as that with which he was inspired, issued an official notification, addressed to all the members of the Germanic empire, calling upon them to unite their forces with his, and expressing his determination, if properly supported, "Never to sheath the sword till he had seen the downfall of the monster which threatened to crush all legal authorities." Scarcely had this declaration reached those to whom it was addressed, when Suworow, alike discontented with his allies and his colleagues, having collected the wreck of his army at Coire, ordered the remains of Koraskow's troops, and the corps of Condé, to form a junction with him at that place; and, after some delay, he proceeded to Bohemia, where he spent the winter. Of 100,000 men, who had either left Russia with him eight months before, or joined his army within that period, scarcely 50,000 reached the banks of the Lech. The veteran, overwhelmed with grief and disappointment, retired to his native country, where, exposed to the frowns of fortune, and the neglect of his Prince, he soon perished, either by poison or despair.†

No sooner had the Austrian army, under Melas, advanced into the neighbourhood of Coni, and prepared to lay siege to that fortress, than General Championnet, collecting his whole force, marched to Savigliano to give him battle. On the morning of the 4th of November, the action commenced by a furious attack directed against the column of General Grenier by General Ott, which forced the republicans to retreat towards Genola. On every other part of the line the attack of the Aus-

* Suworow, undismayed by the difficulties of his situation, displayed prodigies of valour and intrepidity, although engaged on a new theatre, entangled in the defiles of a country with which he was totally unacquainted, and engaged in a novel species of warfare. His troops, fainting under the burthen of their accoutrements and provisions, and but just snatched from the delicious climate of Italy, paused, and contemplated with horror, the snow and ice elevated above the clouds. At times they began to murmur, and declared they would rather lay down their arms than be exposed to incessant combats, where valour was unavailing, and where life itself was a burthen. This aged chief, whose fortitude never forsook him, dismounting from his horse, and exposing himself to the fire of the enemy, and the fatigue of the common soldier, used by turns to praise the perseverance of the bold, and repress the despair of the timid. At one time he would take advantage of the impulse of superstition, and advancing before the rest, exhibit the revered statue of St. Nicholas to the lagging columns, who, afraid of being bereft of both their patron and their general at once, immediately resumed their march. At another, relying on their affection for his person, he would, as a last resourse, stretch his aged limbs on the cold ground, and desire the troops to dig his grave, and cover his body over with earth, adding, "That it was the only favour he could demand from those who had refused to follow their father." This species of eloquence was too obvious to be mistaken, and too forcible to be resisted; his soldiers, electrified by the despair of their general, not only seized once more their arms, but solemnly swore that they would never abandon their leader.

† Alexander Suworow Riminiski Italiski, born in the year 1730, was descended from an ancient family. His father, who had been a General, and afterwards became a senator, intended him for the magistracy; but young Suworow, aspiring only to arms, entered into the service of his country as a common soldier, in 1746, and in the seven years' war against Prussia, advanced step by step to the rank of Colonel. During the campaigns in Poland, from 1769 to 1772, he attained increased renown, and the order of Newski was conferred upon him by Catharine II. His successive victories over the Turks, at Silistria, and Kinburn, obtained for him the orders of St. George and St. Andrew; and his successes over the Tartars exalted him to the rank of commander-in-chief. In 1789, he was employed at the head of a detached body of Prince Potemkin's army, acting in concert with the Austrian General, the Prince of Cobourg, against the Turks, and on the 21st of July, gained with him the battle of Forhani; but, on the 22d of September, the General of the Austrian army having suffered himself to be surrounded by that of the Grand Vizier, 100,000 strong, Suworow, who had only 10,000 men, fell unexpectedly upon the Turks, and after a terrible conflict remained master of the field of battle. This victory, gained near the river of Riminisk, obtained him the surname of Riminiski, and the title of Count of the Roman empire. While acting under the command of Prince Potemkin, he was ordered to storm and carry the Ottoman fortress of Ismail, which had withstood a siege of seven months, and still defied all the efforts of General Gudowitsch. On the third day after his arrival before that city he assembled his troops, and concluded an address, calculated to inflame their military ardour to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, in these terms:—"Soldiers! provisions are dear—no quarter!" The attack was then made; twice the Russians were repulsed, and driven back with terrible slaughter, but the third effort was successful, the city fell, and 20,000 Turks were put to the sword. This victory he announced to the Empress in these laconic terms, "Madam, the proud Ismail is at your feet." In his first wars, after taking the town of Toutoukai, his dispatch was equally brief, "Glory to God; praise to Catharine!" said Suworow, "the town is taken, and I am in it!" In 1792, he carried Warsaw, and in the capital of Poland repeated the sanguinary scenes of Ismail. For this victory, he was rewarded with the title of Field-Marshal; and the Empress, in a letter addressed to the victorious Marshal, and written by her own hand, said:—"You know, General, that I do not promote any one before his turn, but you have made yourself Field-Marshal by the conquest of Poland." After the death of Catharine, Suworow fell into disgrace at court, for venturing to condemn the love of innovation displayed by her successor; but at length the capricious Paul re-instated him in his favour; and in the year 1799, the command of the Austro-Russian army was confided to the hero of Ismail. On his return to Russia, in January, 1800, he was coldly received by the Emperor, and died on the 18th of May, in the same year, at his estate of Polendorff, in Esthonia, at the age of seventy-one. The Emperor Alexander has erected to him a statue, to which, on its inauguration, Suworow's ancient companions in arms paid the military honours that he would have received himself, and Prince Constantine pronounced his eulogium.

trians was made with equal energy and success, and the approach of night again saved the French army from ruin. The siege of Coni was now prosecuted with vigour, and on the 2d of January, (1800) the French commander agreed to capitulate, when 2,500 republicans became prisoners of war. The success of the allied arms in Italy served to compensate the sovereigns of Europe for the losses they had this year sustained in other quarters; but on the whole, the campaign was less auspicious in its conclusion than at its commencement. And the defection of the Emperor of Russia damped the future expectations of the court of Vienna, and laid the foundation of those melancholy disasters which ensued.

The English government, sensible of the importance of Holland, as a foe, or a confederate, and aware that the exactions made upon the Dutch people by France had become a source of disaffection, determined on fitting out a formidable expedition, for the purpose of depriving the enemy of the resources drawn from the Batavian republic, and of restoring the Prince of Orange to the rank of Stadtholder, and Captain-General of the forces. As an army of 30,000 men was required upon this occasion, an application had been made to Russia, and the Emperor Paul had consented to furnish 17,593 troops, and a detachment of six ships, five frigates, and two transports. He exacted, however, as the terms of his co-operation, an immediate advance of upwards of 100,000*l.* exclusively of 63,000*l.* monthly. While Russia was making preparations at Cronstadt and at Revel, the hereditary Prince of Orange repaired to Lingen, on the Emms, where he assembled all the stadtholderian party capable of bearing arms, and opened an active intercourse with the partisans of his family in Holland. In the mean time, a considerable body of troops was assembled on the coast of Kent; and it was determined, that there should be two successive expeditions, the first under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, and the other under the Duke of York.

The English fleet, and the first division of the army, embarked on board 150 transports, sailed from Margate and the neighbouring ports on the 13th of August, under the convoy of Vice-Admiral Mitchel, to join Lord Duncan, who was cruising in the North Seas; and the whole fleet came to anchor off the Texel roads, on the 22d. The signal was now given, and every preparation was made for landing; but towards evening the wind became high, and the fleet was compelled again to weigh anchor, and put to sea in the night. This unfortunate event revealed to the enemy the intended point of debarkation, and it was not till the morning of the 26th that the fleet could be brought to anchor off the northern extremity of the province of Holland. Two great objects were to be embraced upon this occasion; the first was the possession of the Helder, which would not only confer upon the invaders a sea-port, and an arsenal, but contribute greatly to the second, which was the possession of the Batavian fleet, most of the seamen and some of the officers of which were greatly discontented with the government. At day-light on the morning of the 27th, the troops began to disembark to the south-west of the Helder point, and during the morning, the bomb vessels, sloops, and gun brigs, being stationed so as to open a well directed fire, scoured the beach, and prevented all opposition. No resistance was made to the landing of the troops, but as soon as the first division had begun to move forward, they were attacked, near Callanstoog, by a body of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, under the command of General Daendels. A warm, but irregular action ensued, which lasted from five o'clock in the morning until three in the afternoon, during which, repeated attempts were made to dislodge the right of the British, now posted on a ridge of sand-hills, stretching along the coast from north to south, and incapable of forming more than one battalion in line of battle; but the narrowness of the position was, on the whole, favourable to troops entirely destitute of horse and artillery, so that the enemy, instead of being able to make any impression, were at length obliged to retire to another position, two leagues in the rear. Encouraged by this success, General Abercrombie determined immediately to attack the Helder, although occupied by 2000 troops. The brigades commanded by Majors-General Moore and Burrard were accordingly destined for this undertaking, and had received orders to hold themselves in readiness; but about eight o'clock on the evening of the 28th, the Dutch ships, which had anchored in the Mars Diep, got under way, and the garrison was withdrawn. Vice-Admiral Mitchel, who held the command in the absence of Lord Duncan, found means to open a direct communication with the Dutch fleet, and on the 28th obtained possession of seven ships of war in the Nieuve Diep, and about thirteen Indiamen, and transports. Having shipped pilots at the Helder, the British Admiral afterwards got under sail with his squadron, consisting of nine men of war, and five frigates, for the purpose of reducing the remainder of the Dutch fleet, which he expressed his determination to follow to the walls of Amsterdam, unless they surrendered. Accordingly, at five o'clock in the morning of the 30th, the line of battle being formed, orders were given to prepare for action, and notwithstanding two ships and a frigate ran on shore, the English passed the Helder Point and Mars Diep, and continued their course along the Texel in the channel that leads to the Vleiter, the Dutch being then at anchor at the Red Buoy. Admiral Mitchel now sent Captain Rennie with a summons to Rear-Admiral Storey, the Batavian commander, which was in some measure anticipated by the arrival of two Dutch officers, at the earnest request of whom, the British squadron was anchored within sight of, and at a short distance from the enemy. In about an hour after, the fleet, (consisting of one ship of 74 guns, five of 68, two of 54, two of 44, one of 32, and one of 16) which had mutinied against its officers, and in favour of the Orange party, was reluctantly surrendered to Admiral Mitchel by the Dutch commander. The surrender of the Dutch fleet having occasioned great consternation throughout all the provinces of Holland, the president of the Batavian Directory repaired to the Legislative Assembly, and delivered an animated speech, for the purpose of arousing the people. General Brune, too, a pupil from the school of Buonaparte, being appointed commander-in-chief, published an energetic address. Whilst the Dutch and the French authorities were thus exerting themselves, the British army, which had hitherto occupied the sand-hills, advanced, on the 1st of September, and assumed a position with the right to Petten, on the German ocean, and the left on the Oude Sluys, on the Zuyder Zee. By this evolution, a fertile country was open to the invaders, while the canal of Zuyper, immediately in front, contributed greatly to strengthen their position, and enabled them to remain on the defensive until the arrival of additional forces. The Batavian government having collected a considerable force in front of the British lines, determined upon an attack, which was commenced at day-break on the 10th, with a force amounting to 12,000 men. The advance, particularly on the left and centre, was made with great intrepidity; but though two of the detachments had penetrated upon this occasion within a few yards of the positions occupied by the British, they experienced a degree of resistance that reflected great honour on the army, and about ten o'clock they were obliged to retire to their former position, with a loss of from 800 to 1000 men, besides one piece of cannon and a considerable quantity of military stores, while the loss of the English did not exceed 200. The aspect of affairs being now deemed peculiarly auspicious, the second division of troops, consisting of three brigades, was embarked, and the Duke of York proceeded to Holland to assume the command of the Anglo-Russian army.

Speedily after the Duke's arrival at the Helder, on the 13th of September, he had the satisfaction to witness the landing of the Russian auxiliary troops, consisting of between 17 and 18,000 effective men, under General D'Hermann; he also found the hereditary Prince of Orange collecting and forming the deserters from the Batavian troops, as well as the volunteers from the Dutch ships, into regular battalions. The British Field-Marshal, now determined to embrace the first opportunity to make an attack upon the whole of the enemy's positions, and orders were accordingly issued for that purpose. The army moved forward in four columns, through a country which in every direction presented the most formidable obstacles. The column under Lieutenant-General D'Hermann commenced an attack about three o'clock in the morning of the 19th of September, and by eight had succeeded so far as to be in possession of Bergen; but finding the place abandoned, they relaxed their efforts, and gave themselves up to pillage. The enemy instantly seized this opportunity to retrieve the day. Rallying his broken battalions under cover of the woods, and availing himself of the assistance of a seasonable reinforcement drawn from Alkmaar, he attacked the dispersed Russians at different points with so much impetuosity and effect, that notwithstanding their utmost exertions, they were compelled to retire in disorder from Bergen to Schorel. The failure of this detachment decided the fate of the action; for although Lieutenant-General Dundas succeeded in his attack on the village of Walmenheysen, while Sir James Pulteney stormed and carried Ouds Carspel, at the head of the Lange Dyke, and Sir Ralph Abercrombie captured Hoorne without opposition nearly at the same time, yet the army was under the necessity of resuming its former position.

After the expedition had been delayed some days, the army was again put in motion, and on the 2d of October, an attack took place on the whole of the enemy's line. The troops were again divided into four columns, under Generals Abercrombie, D'Essen, Dundas, and Pulteney; and the plan was so combined as to enable the principal corps to communicate with each other by means of intermediate detachments. At half past six o'clock in the morning the engagement commenced by Colonel Macdonald's reserve, which carried a redoubt in front of the village of Campe; while the main body of the first column, conducted by Sir Ralph Abercrombie, marched by the margin of the tide towards Egmont-op-Zee, where, in the after part of the day, the hostile armies where to decide the fate of the battle. The road being thus cleared on the right, the centre column ascended the sand-hills at Campe, where they made a vigorous attack upon the enemy, and carried the heights of Schorel. The enemy still continued to keep up a heavy cannonade between Schorel and Schoreldam, till the Russian column, supported by Major-General Burrard's brigade, advanced upon their position and took possession of Schoreldam. The commander-in-chief, perceiving that the corps on the sand-hills were unequally engaged, immediately ordered the brigade under Lord Chatham to advance from the plain to their support. This movement was executed with the happiest effect, and by out-flanking the enemy, obliged them to abandon the range of sand-hills, and to take shelter in the almost impervious woods that lined their eastern border. The enemy having rallied his force, took up a strong position at Bergen, from which it was absolutely necessary to dislodge him. With this view a general charge was ordered, which was pushed with so much vigour and effect as to place the British and Russian force in possession of the whole range of sand-hills. In the midst of this arduous struggle, General Abercrombie, marched with little opposition to within a mile of Egmont-op-Zee, where the enemy had posted on the hills a large body of cavalry and infantry, with a determination to resist their further progress. Major-General Moore's brigade, charged the enemy's strong position, but the push of the British bayonet was received with firmness, and returned by a counte-charge. The contest was maintained with undiminished fury till the close of day, and the field was covered with the slain. The 92d regiment distinguished itself, and suffered severely. Its Colonel, the Marquis of Huntley, was struck with a rifle-shot in the shoulder; and Major-General Moore, after receiving two wounds, was compelled to quit the field. But it was to Sir Ralph Abercrombie, that this brave column chiefly owed its success; and who though two horses were shot under him, seemed wholly insensible of danger. The shades of night now began to prevail, when the enemy, determined to make one more effort to retrieve the fortune of the day, advanced with his chasseurs in the face of the British column, and charged the horse artillery with so much impetuosity as to cut down several of the troops, and to carry off two guns in triumph. But this success was of short duration; for several squadrons of the 7th and 11th dragoons, with Lord Paget at their head, suddenly issuing from a recess between two sand-hills, fell upon the cavalry of the enemy, who, incapable of sustaining the shock, rushed into the sea to avoid the British sabres. The route now became complete, but a small proportion of the enemy, favoured by the approaching darkness, effected their escape, leaving their prize cannon behind. About sun-set, the reserve, under Colonel Macdonald, joined the first column, to which it had been attached in the morning; upon which, the enemy yielded up the well-contested ground, and retired towards Beverwyck. The force of the enemy opposed to the combined armies in the battle of Alkmaar, was estimated at 25,000, and their loss is stated at 3,000; while the loss of the British, in killed, wounded, and missing, amounted to 1,600, and the loss of the Russians, to 600 men.

The enemy, during the night, evacuated the strong positions on the Lange Dyke, and the Koe Dyke, as the extensive range of elevated sand-hills. In the course of the succeeding day, the allies took possession of Egmont-op-Hoof, Egmont-op-Zee, and Bergen. The town of Alkmaar, the head-quarters of General Brune, and the seat of government of the state of North Holland, opened its gates, while a number of troops went to the standard erected by the Prince of Orange. To improve these advantages, the Duke of York determined to drive the enemy from Beverwyck, and Wyck-op-Zee, and to advance towards Amsterdam. The advanced posts were accordingly pushed forward, and the village of Schermerhoorn, Acher-Sloop, and Limmen, occupied on the 6th, without resistance, by the British; but the column of Russian troops, under Major-General D'Essen, in attempting to gain a height near Baccum, was at first firmly opposed, and then vigorously attacked by a strong body of the enemy's troops. Sir Ralph Abercrombie, observing the critical situation of the Russians, marched his column to their support; the enemy at the same time succouring his advanced corps by fresh forces; the action, though not intended to be fought that day, soon became general along the whole line, and was contested on both sides with the most determined resolution. About two o'clock in the afternoon, the right and centre of the allied army began to lose ground, and to retire upon the villages of Egmont, where they made a determined stand, and with the effective co-operation of the brigade under Major-General Coote, held the enemy in check during the whole day. Evening now set in, accompanied with deluges of rain, yet still the engagement continued, with varied success, and unavailing obstinacy. Even the darkness of the night, combined with the severity of the weather, proved insufficient to terminate the combat. The fire of the small arms was incessant, and the vivid flashes, running along the undulating line of the hills, extended in various directions into the plain; while the gloom of the horizon was at intervals dispelled by the flame of the cannon, and the illuminated train of the shells. About ten o'clock at night, the firing entirely ceased, and the Anglo-Russian troops remained in undisturbed possession of the field; the engagement however proved undecisive, and the enemy, who soon after received a reinforcement of 6000 troops, maintained their position between Beverwyck and Wyck-op-Zee. The allied army now found itself placed in a situation so critical as to require the greatest military talents, united with the most mature experience, to direct its future operations.

tions. Directly opposite lay the enemy, in a position almost impregnable, and rendered confident by the accession of strength just received. A naked, barren, and exhausted country, thinly studded with a few ruined villages, scarcely affording shelter for the wounded, extended all around. The right wing of the allied army was indeed protected by the ocean; but a considerable body of troops, led by an active and resolute commander, threatened the left, and occupied the almost inaccessible position of Purmurend. To these local obstacles were superadded others, still more formidable. The weather had set in since the evening of the 6th of October with increased inclemency; and the roads were so entirely broken up, that it was with extreme difficulty that the urgent necessities of the troops could be supplied; to these complicated evils the whole army lay exposed on the unsheltered sand-hills of North Holland—their arms and ammunition rendered unfit for use, and their tents and clothing continually drenched with torrents of rain. Nor did the stadtholderian party shew any disposition to support the armies engaged in fighting their battles, but on the contrary remained inactive, and apparently indifferent to the success of the common cause. After weighing all these considerations, the Duke of York gave orders to withdraw the forces from their advanced position, which was accordingly effected, to the great regret of the troops, who were unacquainted with some of the principal difficulties that opposed their career. About seven o'clock in the evening of the 7th of October, the night being extremely dark, and the rain descending in cataracts, a very unexpected order was issued for the troops to assemble, and about ten o'clock at night the whole army was in full retreat towards Pellen and Alkmaar.

By this sudden and decided measure, the retreat was effected, in the face of a vigilant and active foe, without disorder, or immediate pursuit, and with little comparative loss. As the troops, however, could not be embarked in the face of a superior army without considerable loss, the Duke of York and Admiral Mitchel entered into a negociation with General Brune, in consequence of which an armistice was agreed upon. It was stipulated, "That the combined English and Russian army should evacuate the territories of the Batavian republic by the 30th of November; that the Dutch Admiral, De Winter, should be considered as exchanged; that the mounted batteries at the Helder should be restored in their present state; that 8000 prisoners of war, French and Batavians, taken before the present campaign, and now detained in England, should be restored without conditions to their respective countries; and that Major-General Knox should remain with the French to guarantee the execution of this convention."

These terms, although justified by the critical situation of the troops, were doubtless humiliating; but the proposition of restoring the Batavian fleet, surrendered by Admiral Storey, and which was at first advanced by General Brune, was received with just indignation; and his royal highness the Duke of York threatened, in case of perseverance in this point, to cut the sea-dykes and inundate the whole country. Thus ended the expedition against Holland, whence so many advantages had been anticipated. But though the military and political objects of the expedition failed, the naval department of the enterprise was crowned with complete success, and a hostile fleet, the last remnant of the maritime power of a nation which once rivalled Britain on the ocean, was drawn from a position where it was capable of exciting alarm, and added to the already gigantic force of the British navy.*

The French Directory, which had long been in the enjoyment of supreme power, was rapidly verging towards its dissolution, when Buonaparte arrived from Egypt, and was received in Paris with every possible demonstration of public favour. The Abbe Sieyes, constantly intriguing, was secretly gratified with the popularity enjoyed by Buonaparte; and after disclosing to him certain projects which he entertained, solicited his powerful aid, for the purpose of carrying them into execution. Various secret conferences were now held, at which Sieyes, (at that time in the Directory) Roger Ducos, Talleyrand, Fouche, Volney, Rœderer, Reinhard, and Buonaparte, with his brothers Lucien and Joseph, were present. Rumours were now industriously circulated, that a new plan of government was forming for the republic. Buonaparte appeared very little in public, but he was actively employed in attaching to his fortune men of talents and enterprise; and at the public entertainment given to him by the Directory, he endeavoured to lull their apprehensions by giving as a toast, "An union of all parties." On the evening of this festival, Buonaparte assembled the conspirators at the House of M. La Mercier, the president of the council of ancients, and on that occasion each individual had assigned to him the part that he was destined to act in the conspiracy against the Directory. At five o'clock in the morning of the 18th Brumaire (November 9,) by a manœuvre of the conspirators, in the council of ancients, it was proposed, without communicating with the directory, that the assembly should, in virtue of the 102d and 103d articles of the constitution, adjourn to St. Cloud; that General Buonaparte should be charged to put the decree in execution; and that, for that purpose, he should be appointed commander of all the forces. This decree being passed by a great majority, the sitting was then dissolved amidst loud cries of "Long live the constitution of the third year!" Buonaparte instantly issued two proclamations, addressed to the national guard of Paris, and to the soldiers of the republic, announcing his appointment to the command of the city guard, and of the army, and inviting them to support their general in his endeavours to restore to the public the blessing of "liberty, victory, and peace." He then marched ten thousand troops to the Thuilleries, and guarded every avenue to that place so effectually, that no one was permitted to pass. Three of the Directors, and all the citizens of Paris, were in complete ignorance of the proceedings that had taken place, and were made acquained with them for the first time by the proclamations with which the walls of the capital soon became placarded. The Director, Barras, who had refused to give in his resignation, was exiled to his country seat under a guard of cavalry, while Goheir and Moulins remained almost passive spectators of the events which deprived them of power, and imposed a new form of government upon their country. In the mean time, the council of five hundred had assembled, filled with astonishment and distrust. At length, the president, Lucien Buonaparte, entered the hall, and read the decree from the council of ancients, which removed the sittings of the legislative body to the palace of St. Cloud. He then dissolved the assembly, and quitted the hall amidst a violent clamour. The remainder of the day as well as night of the 18th was occupied in preparing and arranging the concerns of the following day. On the 19th, the castle of St. Cloud was surrounded by troops in the morning before day break, and the council of five hundred, as well as the council of ancients, assembled at that place at two

* In the West Indies, this year, the flourishing settlement of Surinam was wrested from the hands of the Dutch. A body of troops having been collected in the islands of Grenada, St. Lucie, and Martinico, by Lieutenant-General Trigge, were embarked soon after on board a small squadron, consisting of two line of battle ships and five frigates, under the command of Vice-Admiral Lord Hugh Seymour. On their arrival off the mouth of the river Surinam, Governor Frederici, after some hesitation, capitulated to the British force, and on the 20th of August, this flourishing and extensive settlement was obtained by Great Britain, without firing a gun. The British navy, during the whole of this year, did not lose a single vessel of war; while no less than twenty frigates, corvettes, and luggers, belonging to France, and ten to Spain, were either taken or run on shore. The Dutch navy may be said to have been annihilated. In addition to the ships of war seized by Admiral Mitchel in the Nieuve Diep, and the Texel, the Batavian republic lost a forty-gun ship—the Hortog Van Brunswick, in the straits of Sunda; and as the sailors were obviously disaffected to the new government, all further exertions by sea on the part of that power were wholly interdicted.

o'clock in the afternoon. In the council of five hundred the proceedings were opened by Gaudin, a member of the council, who proposed that a committee of seven members should be appointed to take into consideration the best means of providing for the public safety. This motion was vehemently opposed by several members of the jacobin party, who, darting forward into the tribune, exclaimed, "Down with the dictators"—"The constitution or death! These exclamations were followed by a motion, that every member should renew his oath to preserve the constitution of the third year, which was carried by acclamation. No sooner had the ceremony of renewing the oath been performed, than another violent debate arose, upon the motion, that the assembly should proceed to the election of a new Director, to fill up the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Barras. Buonaparte, on being informed of the tumultuous discussion in the council of five hundred, repaired, in great agitation, first to the council of ancients, and then to the hall of the council of five hundred, and accompanied by a few grenadiers without arms. Advancing towards the top of the hall, the council was instantly in motion —"A General here!" exclaimed they, "Down with the tyrant!"—"Outlaw the Dictator!"—"Kill him, kill him. Several of the members, rushed towards him, drew forth their poniards; and Arena, one of the deputies, and a native of Corsica, aimed a blow at him with a dagger, which Thome, a grenadier, parried with his arm, and was wounded. The president, Lucien Buonaparte, having with great difficulty obtained an audience, exclaimed, "The General has undoubtedly no other intention than to impart to the council very important information respecting the present situation of affairs." Buonaparte stood for a moment astonished and speechless; for though he had expected opposition, he was not prepared for such a scene as he here encountered. General Lefebvre at length rushed into the hall with a body of armed grenadiers, to rescue their chief from the dangers with which he was environed; and Buonaparte returned to the soldiery drawn up in the court of the palace. The members instantly decreed, that the council of ancients had no power to invest Buonaparte with the command, as that authority could be conferred by the Directory alone. The president animadverted with great energy on the disorders of the day, and on the ferocious insults offered by some of the members towards an illustrious General, who had rendered the most signal and permanent services to the republic. "Outlaw him!" exclaimed several of the members, "he has this day disgraced his military renown, and deserves death from the hand of every patriot."

The assembly had now become a mob, and the president was assailed on every side. His authority being at an end, and his life exposed to the most imminent peril; he darted from his chair, and divesting himself of the insignia of his office, placed his toga and his scarf upon the bench, and rushed to the tribune. His voice was instantly drowned in exclamations against the military usurper, and tears of agony and indignation started from his eyes. Immediately pistols and poniards were presented to his breast, to compel him to resume his office, and to pronounce the decree of outlawry against his brother, but he remained inflexible, and General Lefebvre being at that moment deputed by Buonaparte, entered the hall at the head of a detachment of the military, and surrounding the president, conducted him in safety to the court of the palace. The troops, animated by the presence of their General, listened with profound attention to the president, while he declared to them, that he, as well as his brother, had been threatened with assassination; that the council of five hundred no longer existed; that the minority had become rebels, and were holding the poniard of sedition and despotism over the heads of the unarmed majority; and he, as president, invoked the aid of the military force to expel those representatives of the poniard from the council chamber, where they were at the moment exercising acts of despotism and violence, and were on the point of overthrowing the republic. The president concluded this harangue by exclaiming, "Long live the republic." To which his military auditors replied, "Long live the republic!"—"Long live Buonaparte!" The General, now perceiving that the critical moment had arrived, ordered the troops to enter the hall of the council of five hundred. The grenadiers instantly advanced; when a deputy exclaimed: "Is it thus, soldiers, you tarnish the laurels you have gained in battle? Do the guardians of the national representation dare to menace its safety and independence?" Many of the other members, addressing the soldiers, conjured them, in the name of liberty, not to follow their leaders; when on a sudden the pas de charge was heard, and the voices of the speakers were drowned in the sound of military music. At the word of command the grenadiers brought their muskets to the charge, and a dreadful scene of alarm and dismay pervaded the whole assembly. The chamber was soon cleared of the members of the council, and cries of "Long live the republic!" "Long live Buonaparte!" sent forth by the military, shook the lofty domes of St. Cloud. The first imperfect intelligence of these events had filled the metropolis with apprehension, but no sooner were the circumstances attending this military usurpation made known, than the Parisians appeared overjoyed at the final subversion of the jacobin power, and cherished the hope of a new and better government.

In the evening, the council of five hundred, as well as the council of ancients, again assembled; but the former, from which the jacobins had withdrawn, now appeared of a different complexion from that which it had worn in the early part of the day. Lucien Buonaparte, their president, proposed a resolution, to the effect; That General Buonaparte, and the other Generals and officers, as well as the troops, had deserved well of their country. This resolution, which was carried without opposition, was succeeded by a proposal from Chazal, one of the deputies, that a committee of five members should be appointed, to consider the propriety of forming a new government. Boulay de la Meurthe presented a report from a secret committee, containing the project of a decree for appointing a new government, and prefaced his motion for the adoption of the report by an animated address, in which he enlarged on the profligacy and incapacity of the Directory, on the defects of the constitution itself, and on the necessity of a strong executive power, capable of giving solidity to the state, and preventing the return of anarchy. The council then decreed, "that the Executive Directory no longer existed; that certain deputies, to the number of sixty-one, on account of their excesses, particularly in the sitting of that morning, were no longer members of the national representation; that an executive consular committee should be provisionally appointed, consisting of Citizen Sieyes and Roger Ducos, ex-directors, and General Buonaparte, under the designation of consuls of the French republic; that they should be invested with the full powers of the Directory; that the two councils should each name twenty-five commissioners, charged to prepare the changes in the organic dispositions of the constitution, the object of which changes was to consolidate and guarantee inviolably the sovereignty of the people." This decree was instantly communicated to the council of ancients, by whom it was passed at midnight; on which the three consuls, being summoned to the hall of the council of five hundred, took the oath to preserve liberty and equality; and, on the following day, they entered upon the public functions, at the palace of the Luxembourg. The legislative commissioners at the same time commenced their sittings. In forming the new administration, Lucien Buonaparte was constituted minister of the interior; and M. Talleyrand reinstated in his office of minister for foreign affairs.

The fabric of a new government was at length completed by the legislative commission, and approved on the 13th of December by the consuls and members of the legislative committee. This constitution was accordingly submitted to the suffrages of the citizens of the French republic at large; and on the 29th, it was proclaimed at Paris with great solemnity.*

Buonaparte, finding himself, to his great astonishment, quietly placed in possession of supreme power, and of the palace of the Bourbons, deemed it expedient to assume a kingly tone; and, therefore on Christmas day, he addressed a letter direct to the sovereign of these realms, to announce to his Majesty the happy event which had taken place in France. "Called by the wishes of the French nation," said he, "to occupy the first magistracy of the republic, I think it proper on entering into office to make a direct communication of it to your Majesty. The war which has for eight years ravaged the four quarters of the world, must it be eternal? Are there no means of coming to an understanding? How can the two most enlightened nations of Europe, powerful and strong beyond what their safety and independence require, sacrifice to ideas of vain grandeur, commerce, prosperity, and peace? How is it that they do not feel that peace is of the first importance, as well as the highest glory? These sentiments cannot be foreign to the heart of your Majesty, who reigns over a free nation with the sole view of rendering it happy. Your Majesty will see in this overture my sincere wish to contribute efficaciously, for the second time, to a general pacification, by a step speedy, entirely of confidence, and disengaged from those forms which, perhaps necessary to disguise the independence of weak states, prove, in those that are strong, only the desire of deceiving each other. France and England, by the abuse of their strength, may still for a long time, for the misfortune of all nations, retard the period of their being exhausted; but I will venture to say it, the fate of all civilized nations is attached to the termination of a war which involves the whole world."

The British government took some time to consider what would be the proper answer to give to an application at once so unexpected and so unprecedented, both in form and substance; and, at length, on the 4th of January, a letter was sent, by Lord Grenville, to Talleyrand, containing an official note, in which it was observed, that the King had given frequent proofs of his sincere desire for the re-establishment of secure and permanent tranquillity in Europe. He never was, nor had been engaged in any contest for a vain and false glory. He had no other view than that of maintaining against all transgression, the rights and happiness of his subjects. For these he had contended against an unprovoked attack, and, for the same objects, he was still obliged to contend; nor could he hope that this necessity would be removed by entering, at the present moment, into negociation with those whom a fresh revolution had so recently placed in the exercise of power in France; since no real advantage could arise from such negociation to the great and desirable object of general peace, until it should distinctly appear, that those causes had ceased to operate which originally produce the war, and by which it had since been protracted; and, in more than one instance renewed. The same system, to the prevalence of which France justly ascribed all her present miseries, was that which had also involved the rest of Europe in a long and destructive warfare, of a nature long since unknown to the practice of civilized nations. For the extension of this system, and for the extermination of all established governments, the resources of France, had, from year to year, and in the midst of the most unparalleled distress, been lavished and exhausted. To that indiscriminate spirit of destruction, the Netherlands, the United Provinces, the Swiss Cantons, (His Majesty's ancient friends and allies) had successively been sacrificed. Germany had been ravaged; Italy, though then rescued from its invaders, had been made the scene of unbounded rapine and anarchy. His Majesty had himself been compelled to maintain an arduous and burthensome contest for the independence and existence of his kingdom. Nor had these calamities been confined to Europe alone; they had been extended to the most distant quarters of the world, and were to countries so remote, both in situation and interest, from the present contest, that the very existence of such a war was perhaps unknown to those who found themselves suddenly involved in all its horrors. While such a system continued to prevail, and while the blood and treasure of a numerous and powerful nation could be lavished in its support, experience had shown that no defence, but that of open and steady hostility, could be availing. The most solemn treaties had only paved the way for fresh aggression; and it was to a determined resistance alone that was now due whatever remained in Europe of stability for property, for personal liberty, for social order, or for the free exercise of religion. For the security, therefore, of these essential objects, his Majesty could not place his reliance on the mere renewal of general professions of pacific disposition. Such professions had repeatedly been held out by all those who had successively directed the resources of France to the destruction of Europe; and whom the present rulers had declared to have been all, from the beginning, and uniformly, incapable of maintaining the relations of amity and peace. Greatly, indeed, would his Majesty rejoice, whenever it should appear that the dangers to which his own dominions, and those of his allies, had been so long exposed, had really ceased; whenever he should be satisfied, that the necessity of resistance was at an end, that, after the experience of so many years of crimes and miseries, better principles had ultimately prevailed in France; and that all the gigantic projects of ambition, and all the restless schemes of destruction, which had endangered the very existence of civil society, had, at length, been finally relinquished;—but the conviction of such a change, however agreeable to his Majesty's wishes, could result only from experience, and from the evidence of facts. The best and most natural pledge of its reality and permanence would be the restoration of that line of princes which, for so many centuries, maintained the French nation in prosperity at home, and in consideration and respect abroad; such an event would at once have removed, and would, at any time, remove, all obstacles in the way of negociation for peace. It would confirm to France the unmolested enjoyment of its ancient territory; and it would give to all the other nations of Europe, in tranquility and peace, that security which they were now compelled to seek by other means. His Majesty made no claim to prescribe to France what should be the form of her government, or in whose hands she should vest the authority necessary for conducting the affairs of a great and powerful nation. His Majesty looked only to the security of his own dominions, and those of his allies, and to the general safety of Europe. Whenever he should judge that such security could, in any manner be obtained, as resulting either from the internal situation of that country from whose internal situation the danger had arisen, or from such other circumstances, of whatever nature, as might produce the same end, his Majesty would eagerly embrace the opportunity to concert with his allies the means of immediate and general pacification. Unhappily no such security yet existed; no sufficient evidence of the principles by which the new government would be directed; no reasonable ground by which to judge of its stability. In that situation it could, for the present, only remain for his Majesty to pursue, in conjunction with other powers, those exertions of just and defensive war, which his regard to the happiness of his subjects would never permit him either to continue beyond the necessity in which they originated, or to terminate on any other grounds than such as might best contribute to the secure enjoyment of their tranquillity, their constitution, and their independence.

* This constitution exhibited, indications of superiority over the Directorial system. Out of an aggregate of thirty-three millions and a half, of which the population of France at that time consisted, Rœderer estimated the male inhabitants of age, and qualified to vote, at five millions; who reduced themselves to five hundred thousand notables of departments; reduced again to five thousand notables of France; from whom are chosen five hundred legislators of the senate, tribunate, and legislative body; one grand consul, and two puisne consuls. The senate and tribunate are chosen not "by" the five thousand notables of France, but "out" of that class. A body of eighty members, first constituted representatives of the nation, either by competent election or by the acquiescence of the people, under the title of conservators, choose first, all the members called to exercise the legislative power; and secondly, (the consuls) the three chiefs of the executive power, the first of whom afterwards chooses the ministers and the other agents of the government.

In the reply to this answer of the British cabinet, dated January the 14th, 1800, Buonaparte renewed the often confuted assertion, that France was not the aggressor in the war; that, so far from having provoked it, she had, from the commencement of her revolution, solemnly proclaimed her love of peace, and her disinclination to conquests, her respect for the independence of all governments; and it was not to be doubted that, occupied entirely at that time with her own internal affairs, she would have avoided taking part in those of Europe, and would have remained faithful to her declarations. But, from an opposite disposition, as soon as the French revolution had broken out, almost all Europe had entered into a league for its destruction. The aggression was real long time before it was public; internal resistance was excited; its opponents were favourably received, their extravagant declarations were supported; the French nation was insulted in the persons of its agents; and England set particularly this example by the dismissal of the Minister accredited to her. Finally, France was, in fact, attacked in her independence, in her honour, and in her safety, long time before the war was declared.—That M. Talleyrand should have subscribed his name to an assertion so monstrously false, is really astonishing. The war was declared against England and Holland, by France, on the 1st of February, 1793, and, at the very end of the preceding year, this very man, Talleyrand himself, had informed his government, that England was only intent on preserving a rigid neutrality. He knew, therefore, that he uttered a falsehood, at the moment when he penned the above sentence in his official note. But the note proceeded in the same strain, and with the same confidence, to assert, that it was to the projects of subjugation, dissolution, and dismemberment, which were prepared against her, and the execution of which was several times attempted and pursued, that France had a right to impute the evils which she had suffered herself, as well as those which had afflicted Europe. Such projects, for a long time, without example, with respect to so powerful a nation, could not fail to bring on the most fatal consequences. Assailed on all sides, the Republic could not but extend universally the efforts of her defence; and it was only for the maintenance of her own independence that she had made use of those means which she possessed, in her own strength, and the courage of her citizens.

In the answer, which Lord Grenville forwarded on the 20th of January, the King expressed his concern in observing, that the unprovoked aggressions of France, the sole cause and origin of the war, were systematically defended by her present ruler under the same injurious pretences by which they were originally attempted to be disguised. His Majesty refused to enter into the refutation of allegations then universally exploded, and, in so far as they respected his Majesty's conduct, not only in themselves utterly groundless, but contradicted, both by the internal evidence of the transactions to which they related, and also by the express testimony (given at the time) of the government of France itself. The French Minister was referred to the first note of the British government for his Majesty's opinion of the present overtures.

Parliament had assembled at the early period of the 24th of September, (1799) and having passed a bill, for engrafting a large proportion of the militia into the regular army, adjourned to the 21st of January, 1800. After the adjournment, the first subject of importance that engaged the attention of Parliament, was the correspondence which had recently taken place between the British and the French governments. Ministers inquired what possible advantage could result from a negociation with France at this moment? They asked, whether the consular government presented a greater certainty of a favourable termination of a treaty, than any of the revolutionary governments which had preceded it? They re-capitulated the proceedings of Buonaparte at Milan, Modena, Genoa, Venice, Malta, and Egypt, and recurred to them as so many unanswerable arguments against any confidential reliance on the advances now made by that general.* The minority, on the other hand, animadverted on the precipitation of ministers, in closing the door at once to all hopes of pacification.† The conduct of his Majesty's ministers, however, in rejecting the overtures made by the first consul, was approved by decided majorities in both Houses; and it was accordingly determined to carry on the war on a large and extensive scale. To enable the allies to bring the greatest possible number of troops into the field, negociations were immediately entered into with the Emperor, the Duke of Wirtemberg, and the Elector of Bavaria; the army of Condé, and the Swiss regiment of Rovera, were also taken into the pay of England, and it was proposed and agreed to by Parliament, to enable the treasury to advance the sum of half a million of money, until the subsidiary treaties had been signed and adjusted.

On the 28th of February, Mr. Tierney moved, 'that it is the opinion of this House, that it is unjust and unnecessary to continue the war for the purpose of restoring monarchy in France.' Ministers indignantly repelled the insinuation conveyed in these terms, and denied that the restoration of monarchy was the object of the war; they opposed, however, Mr. Tierney's motion, which was negatived by a very large majority; as were two other motions of similar tendency in the course of the session. The late expedition to Holland, became another subject of inquiry and crimination against ministers; and on the 10th of February, Mr. Sheridan prefaced a motion for examining into the causes of the failure of the late expedition, by a very copious speech, in which he acquitted the commander-

* "You cannot," said Mr. Pitt, "look at the map of Europe, and lay your hand upon that country against which France has not either declared an open and aggressive war, or violated some positive treaty, or broken some recognized principle of the law of nations. The all-searching eye of the French revolution looks to every part of Europe, and to every quarter of the world, in which can be found any object of acquisition or plunder. Nothing is too great for the temerity of its ambition; nothing too small for the grasp of its rapacity. This is the spirit which animated its birth, and this is the spirit which will not desert it till the moment of its dissolution. This system arose out of the nature of the revolution, and has been invariably pursued, under Brissot, and under Robespierre, by Sieyes, as well as Barras. At present, a supreme power is placed at the head of this nominal republic, with a more open avowal of military despotism than at any former period. The different institutions, republican in form and appearance, are now annihilated. They have given way to the absolute power of one man, concentrating in himself all the authorities of the state, and differing from other monarchs only in this, that he wields a sword instead of a sceptre. Under these circumstances, I see no possibility of such a peace as will be attended with established tranquillity; and as I cannot be content with its nominal attainment, I will not grasp at the shadow, when the reality is beyond my reach." Lord Grenville maintained that Buonaparte had two objects in his late proposition: the one, to slacken the efforts of the British nation; the other, to sow jealousies among the allies of England. "This same individual, now so desirous of peace," added he, "was formerly eager to conclude the treaty of Campo Formio, for the express purpose of employing all the forces of France against England. It was he who, contemplating our ruin as the last exploit of his military career, sent his two confidential agents, Berthier and Monge, to the Directory, and charged the latter to declare, that the French Republic and the government of England were incompatible with each other."

† The Duke of Bedford reproached them with a design of retarding the return of peace, until the moment when, passing through a series of revolutions, the monarchy of France should be restored. Considering this project as chimerical, he complained of the unnecessary prolongation of the war on account of the allies, whose disinterestedness and constancy had not been experienced, and at a time too, when the situation of Ireland was eminently critical, and the taxes were becoming daily more burthensome. Mr. Fox, in the House of Commons, concluded an interesting speech, which embraced a wide field of argument, and comprehended a retrospect of the events of the last ten years, in these words: "I have discharged my duty, I have told you my opinion. I think you ought to have given a civil, clear, and explicit answer to the overture which was fairly and handsomely made to you. If you were desirous that the negociation should have included all your allies, as the means of bringing about a general peace, you should have told Buonaparte so; but I believe you were afraid of his agreeing to the proposal. I know that public opinion, if it could be collected, would be for peace as much now as in 1797; and I know that it is only by public opinion, not by a sense of duty, not by the inclination of their minds, that Ministers will be brought, if ever, to give us peace."

in-chief, the officers, and the army, who had been sent to the Helder, of all blame; and attributed their misfortunes solely to the impolicy and rashness of ministers. Mr. Dundas, in opposing the motion, insisted on the advantages which had accrued to Britain from the Dutch expedition, particularly the capture of the Dutch fleet, and the diversion of the French arms from the Upper Rhine to Holland: he objected to the motion, however, on more general grounds, as it consigned to Parliament the task of publicly criticising military operations, which was not their duty or department. Such investigations, he contended, could produce no good, and would only clog and harass the measures of government.

Mr. Sheridan's motion was negatived by 216, against 45; and a similar motion, introduced by Lord Holland, in the Upper House, was also negatived by a large majority.

The military and naval forces appointed for the service of the year 1800, were nearly the same as in 1799. Mr. Pitt, in detailing the means for raising this supply, estimated the income tax at 5,300,000*l.* exclusive of 1,700,000*l.* appropriated to the payment of interest for 32,500,000*l.* but he expressed the strongest expectation, that it would turn out to a better account. He had negociated a loan of 18,000,000*l.* but the assignment of 1,700,000*l.* of the income tax, to the payment of a part of the interest, rendered 313,000*l.* sufficient for the remainder. The consolidated fund he reckoned at about 4,000,000*l.* exchequer bills 3,000,000*l.* and an advance of 3,000,000*l.* bearing no interest for six years, from the bank, as a premium for the renewal of the charter for twenty-one years, which, together with the loan, made up the sum of 39,500,000*l.* These financial proposals, which underwent a variety of strictures from the vigilant observation of Mr. Tierney, were ultimately carried.

Mr. Pitt having moved (February 17) for an advance of 500,000*l.* to the Emperor; it was opposed with great energy by Mr. Tierney; who conjured the House to recollect that the war had now continued seven years, at the expence of 200,000,000*l.* on the pretext of its being just and necessary. Just it could not be, if the object of it were to force upon the French nation the restoration of the Bourbons; nor necessary, because we had refused to negociate when the opportunity was presented to us. If this sum were granted, much larger demands would follow; and thus we were to lavish our blood and treasure in a cause for which no one plain, satisfactory, intelligible reason could be assigned, and he defied the ministers to name it. Mr. Pitt rose, and declared that he found no difficulty in stating the object of the war in a single sentence, nay, even in a single word—security. It was also more than this: it was security against a danger the greatest that had ever threatened the world: a danger which never existed before in any period of society; which had been felt and resisted by all the nations of Europe, but by none so successfully and uniformly as our own. Our resistance had not been confined to external force, it had joined internal policy and wise legislative measures, to oppose jacobinism in the bosom (he was sorry to have found it there) of our own country. How was it discovered that jacobinism had disappeared in France? It was now centered in one man, nursed in its school, who had gained celebrity under its auspices, and was at once the child and the champion of its atrocities—Buonaparte. Granting that 200,000,000*l.* had been expended for the words "just and necessary," they had been expended for the best of causes—to protect the dearest rights, to defend the most valuable privileges,—the laws, the liberties, the happiness of our country; and, for such objects, as much more would we spend, and as much more could we find.

On the annual motion for the renewal of the Habeas Corpus suspension act, in the course of this month, warm debates ensued, in both Houses; but it finally passed by great and decided majorities.*

On the 15th of January, 1800, the Irish Parliament met at Dublin; and, on the 5th of February, a message from the Lord-Lieutenant was delivered to each House of Parliament, intimating the King's desire that the resolutions passed by the Parliament of Great Britain, should be submitted to the attentive consideration of the Irish legislature; and expressing his hope that the great object to which they related, might be matured and completed by the wisdom of the two Parliaments, and the loyal concurrence of the people. On this occasion, the secretary of state, Lord Castlereagh, to whose management the business was intrusted, arose, and entered into a comprehensive view of the measure proposed, recommending it by arguments analogous to those of Mr. Pitt and other advocates of the union in the British Parliament. On moving the first resolution, after a vehement debate, the numbers were, in favour of the court 158, against it 115. The tumults of the populace of Dublin were upon this occasion very alarming; and a military guard of cavalry was found necessary to preserve the Parliamentary advocates of the union from personal insult and violence. On the 10th of February, the business was once more introduced into the House of Peers, by the Earl of Clare, late Lord Fitzgibbon, Chancellor of Ireland, in a speech of extraordinary ability. On moving the first resolution, this nobleman declared himself "satisfied in his judgment and conscience, from an attentive observation of what had passed in Ireland for the last twenty years, that the existence of her independent Parliament had gradually led to her recent and bitter calamities." And, he avowed that he had, for the preceding seven years, pressed upon ministers the urgent necessity of union, as the last remaining resource to preserve this country to the British crown. No Peer in opposition ventured on this occasion formally to enter the lists against this distinguished orator. The Lords Dillon, Powerscourt, Farnham, and Bellamont, however, declared in successive speeches their disapprobation of the measure; which was defended by the law Lords, Carleton and Kilwarden, and various other Peers: after which, the question upon the first resolution was put, and passed the House by 75 against 26 voices. The succeeding resolutions were in the course of a few weeks carried through this House with the same or greater facility. In the course of these debates three different protests, drawn with vigour and ability, were entered upon the journals of the House, signed by the Duke of Leinster, the Marquis of Downshire, the Lords Pery and Moira, the Bishop of Down, and about twenty other Peers, expressive of their highest indignation at these proceedings. On the 17th of February, the House of Commons being in a general committee, Mr. Corry, Chancellor of the Exchequer, made an able speech in vindication of the measure, blended, however, agreeably to the too frequent custom of the Irish Parliament, with virulent party and personal reflections. Mr. Grattan retorting in high and bitter language, a vehement altercation arose, which was, in the sequel, productive of a challenge from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to that gentleman. A duel ensued, in which five shots were exchanged, and Mr. Corry was wounded, though not dangerously. After a debate no less vehement than any of the former, the question of adjournment was put and negatived; and the 1st of January following was fixed as the æra whence the union of the two kingdoms was to date its commencement. On the 27th of March, the whole business being completed, Lord Castlereagh moved an address to his Majesty from the Commons, declaratory of their approbation of the resolutions transmitted to them, "which they considered as wisely calculated to form the basis of a complete and entire union of the two legislatures: that by those propositions they had been guided in their proceedings;

* Towards the end of March, Mr. Dundas stated, in a committee of the whole house, the prosperous condition of the East India Company. He admitted the increase of debts and the decrease of assets in India and China to the amount of 2,700,000*l.*; but the increase of assets and the decrease of debt in Europe, he computed at about 3,800,000*l.* so that the company had gained, upon the balance, a million and upwards, in the course of the year.

and that the resolutions now offered were those articles, which, if approved by the Lords and Commons of Great Britain, they were ready to confirm and ratify, in order that the same might be established for ever by the mutual consent of both Parliaments." This address being agreed to by the two Houses, was immediately transmitted by the Lord-Lieutenant, to England.

On the 2d of April, the joint address of the Irish legislature was the subject of a message from his Majesty to both Houses of the British Parliament. The measure was opposed in the House of Peers by Lord Holland; but, on a division, only three Peers, the Earl of Derby, and the Lords Holland and King, voted against the motion, while it was supported by eighty-two.

In the Commons, Mr. Pitt, assuming the sense of the House to be determinately favourable to the measure, proceeded to discuss the particular manner of carrying it into effect. As to the propriety of allowing one hundred Irish members to sit in the imperial Parliament, though the particular number might not be of the first importance, he thought it sufficiently suited the proportional contribution of the two countries to the public exigencies of the empire. The mode of selection was the next point. He wished not to augment the influence of the crown. The selection adopted by the Parliament of Ireland was rather calculated to favour the popular interest. The members for counties and principal cities would be sixty-eight, the rest would be deputed by towns the most considerable in population and wealth. Thus, the choice would provide at once for the security of the landed interest, and for the convenience of local information; and as the proposed addition would not make any change in the internal form of British representation, it would entail none of those dangers which might attend innovation. It would not expose us to the dangers of political experiments, under the specious name of reform; experiments which, whatever his opinion respecting reform might have once been, he was now convinced would be hazardous in the present circumstances. As it might be wished that very few of the members thus sent from Ireland should hold places under the crown, he proposed that the number entitled to be placemen should be limited to twenty, and that the imperial Parliament should afterwards regulate this point, as circumstances might suggest. The number of Peers who should represent the whole body of the Irish nobility, was fixed, he thought very properly, at thirty. Four would suffice to inform the Parliament of the state of the church; and the rest would form a fair proportion, considered with reference to the case of Scotland, and the number of the Irish commoners. The election of the temporal Peers for life, he recommended as a mode more conformable to the spirit of nobility, than that which was settled at the Scotch union. The right reserved for Irish Peers, to sit in the House of Commons, as representatives of the counties or towns of Great Britain, would furnish them with opportunities of acquiring Parliamentary and political experience, and would render them fitter to serve their country, when called to a higher assembly. The permission of creating new Peers for Ireland he also justified; for though in Scotland the Peerage might long maintain itself without any accession, from the great extent of inheritance allowed by the patents, there was a risk of the Irish Peerage fast diminishing, unless it were recruited, on account of the very limited nature of the successions. In the article respecting the church, he noticed the clause introduced by the Parliament of Ireland, providing for the presence of the clergy of that country at convocations which might be held in this island, and the propriety of leaving to the imperial legislature the discussion of the claims of the Catholics to future emancipation. The next article, he observed, would grant a general freedom of trade, with only such exceptions as might secure vested capital, and prevent a great shock to any particular manufacture, or to popular fears and prejudices. It was stipulated, that almost all prohibitions should be repealed, and that only protecting duties to a small amount should be imposed on some few articles. If the British manufacturers should sustain partial loss in consequence of any of the new regulations, their liberality would induce them to consider it as compensated by general advantage.

Mr. (now Earl) Grey strenuously opposed the plan of the union. His principal objections were founded on the unpopularity of the union among the Irish people; on the means of corruption and intimidation which had been used to accomplish the measure; and the great dissimilarity between the case of Ireland and that of Scotland, with respect to incorporating with England; an argument which he chiefly directed against those supporters of the measure who had ascribed the progress of Scottish prosperity to the dissolution of her native Parliament.—His motion, however, for limiting the number of Irish placemen, who should sit in the united Parliament, to nineteen, instead of twenty, was negatived without a division. Early in May, the remaining articles having been severally investigated, and approved by very decisive majorities, Mr. Pitt moved that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, acquainting him that the House had proceeded through the great and important measure of a legislative union, which they had the satisfaction to see was nearly in strict conformity with the principle laid down in his Majesty's message. This was carried without a division; and the address and resolutions being forthwith transmitted to the House of Peers, the assent of that assembly was obtained without any material alteration. A joint address, as usual on great occasions, was presented to the throne. A bill, grounded upon the resolutions, was then introduced, and passed through both Houses with great facility—the first day of the new year, January 1st, 1801, being the æra from and after which the union of the two kingdoms was to take effect. On the 2d of July the royal assent was given to this important bill; and on the 29th of the same month the session was terminated by a speech from the throne, in which his Majesty expressed the peculiar satisfaction with which he congratulated the two Houses of Parliament on the success of the steps which they had taken for effecting an entire union between the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland. The Irish session also, which had been prolonged till the union bill passed in England, in order to its ratification, with the several alterations and additions made by the British Parliament, with other necessary regulations respecting the election of the Irish representatives to the imperial legislature, was terminated on the 2d of August, and with it the existence of the Parliament of Ireland.*

The life of our venerable sovereign was again attempted this year; but that providential protection which had hitherto been extended over him was graciously manifested in his deliverance. On the 15th of May, just at the moment when the King had entered the royal box at Drury-Lane Theatre, and while he was bowing to the audience with his usual condescen-

* The uncommon failure of the harvest of 1800, rendered this year memorable for the pressure of wide spread and real distress, as well as for the gloomy anticipations of severe scarcity. The interference of the legislature, when Parliament again assembled, in attempting to remedy, or at least to palliate, the public calamity, was judiciously confined to recommendatory, rather than to coercive measures. The committee appointed to deliberate upon the subject, suggested in their reports such methods of relief as appeared most effectual for diminishing the consumption of corn by economy and substitution, and held out encouragement to the extended growth of potatoes at home, and the importation of corn from foreign countries. The committee at the same time suggested the granting of bounties for the encouragement of fisheries; and proposed the temporary but entire disuse of corn in the distilleries. To give effect to the proceedings of the legislature on this important subject, his Majesty issued a proclamation, towards the close of the present year, recommending the greatest economy and frugality in the use of every species of grain, and "exhorting and charging all masters of families, to reduce the consumption of bread in their respective families by at least one-third of the quantity consumed in ordinary times, and in no case to suffer the same to exceed one quartern loaf for each person in each week."

sion, a person, who sat near the middle of the pit, rose up and fired a horse pistol, apparently at his Majesty. For some seconds, the house remained in a silent agony of suspense, but no sooner had they begun to recover from their surprise, than the man who fired the pistol was dragged into the orchestra, and carried into the music room, behind the scenes. On the Duke of York entering the apartment, the prisoner, who proved to be a discharged soldier of the name of Hadfield, exclaimed, "God bless your royal highness! I know you!" He added, that he had been with the Duke ever since the battle of Famars—that he was tired of his life, and wanted to get rid of it—and once or twice repeated, "the worst has not happened yet." On examining the royal box, a perforation was discovered in the canopy, about fourteen inches above his Majesty's head, and a flattened slug, which had rebounded from that place, was found in the orchestra. The veneration and affection which the nation bore to his Majesty were on this occasion awakened into enthusiastic joy at his escape, and addresses of congratulation were presented by both Houses of Parliament, by the universities, and in fact by the whole kingdom. On the 26th of June, Hadfield was arraigned for high treason, but it was clearly proved that he had for some years laboured under a degree of insanity, in consequence of several desperate sabre wounds in his head, which he had received when acting as a sergeant in the British army in Holland, in 1794. He was therefore pronounced, "Not guilty, being under the influence of insanity at the time the act was done;" but he was very properly ordered to be detained and kept in custody. For a time, he was confined, as a lunatic, in Bethlem Hospital; but, having once nearly effected his escape, he was, for greater security, transferred to Newgate.

After the unexpected discomfiture of the Russian army at the close of the last campaign, and the consequent triumph of the French arms in Switzerland, by which one main part of the plan of the campaign had been defeated, a total change took place in the command and disposition of the allied forces. The wayward disposition of the Russian Emperor, Paul, little inclined to listen to a calm investigation of facts, and easily led away by the hasty impulses of passion, had conceived an insuperable disgust at the unexpected disasters which had befallen his troops, in Switzerland and in Holland; and he, in consequence, recalled his whole army from the scene of action. The Archduke Charles, too, who gave fair promise of emulating the example of the most renowned warriors, had, by the crooked policy, and ruinous influence, of the Aulic Council, which had controuled all his operations, and thwarted all his views, been deprived of the command of the Austrian troops. The Austrians, in Germany, were now led by the veteran, General Kray; while Melas continued to command the imperial force employed in Italy. The first operation of any consequence, on the side of Italy, was the siege of Genoa, by the Austrians, who were assisted by an English squadron, under the command of Lord Keith. Massena defended the city. After a series of actions, in which many thousand lives were lost on both sides; Genoa surrendered to the Austrians on the 4th of June. Meantime, Buonaparte collected a powerful army of reserve, in the plains of Burgundy, of which he took the command, about the middle of May. Having effected the passage of the Alps with little opposition, he entered the plains of Lombardy; and advancing, with rapidity, compelled the Austrians to evacuate Milan and Pavia. Crossing the Po, he attacked a body of Austrians at Montebello, and forced them to retire. Melas, whose inactivity was unaccountable, had neglected to oppose any adequate resistance to the inroads of the enemy, and was so badly informed of his movements, that he thought Buonaparte was at Dijon at the time when he was in Lombardy. Being, at last, however, awakened from his lethargy, he marched to encounter the victorious army. On the 16th of June, a general action took place, near the village of Marengo, which, during nine hours, raged with great fury. About four in the afternoon, the Austrians had completely driven in every division of the French, and were on the point of obtaining a complete victory. At this critical period, the French General Desaix, who had been taken prisoner on his return from Egypt, and imprudently liberated in time to be present at this action, proposed to Buonaparte to point some pieces of artillery against a particular part of the Austrian column, which, in the pursuit, had been injudiciously weakened; and if he made the impression which he expected, he intended to improve the advantage by bringing up the reserve, under his own command. Buonaparte was, at this time, so confused at his discomfiture, and so enraged, that he had lost all presence of mind, and was incapable of giving any distinct orders. Desaix, then, was left to follow the dictates of his own judgment; he executed the proposed manœuvre; it was productive of the expected effect; he led on his division with great gallantry and resolution, and turned the tide of victory in favour of the French. He fell, however, in the attempt. The battle lasted till the close of the day, when the French remained masters of the field. To the capture of the Austrian General, Zach, as he was hastening to give the necessary orders for repairing the confusion occasioned by the attack of Desaix, may the disastrous issue of this battle be principally ascribed. Still the loss of the French was more considerable than that of the Austrians;—the former was stated, by accounts most to be relied on, to be from 12 to 14,000 men; while that of the latter did not exceed 9,000. The Austrian soldiers were so enraged at having victory thus wrested from their hands, that they were loud in their calls upon their commander, the next morning, to renew the contest. Instead of obeying this patriotic call, Melas concluded an armistice, and afterwards a convention, by which he consented to restore to the French, all the fortresses which Suworow had taken from them in the preceding campaign.

The French army, under Moreau had entered Suabia, at the latter end of April, where it was opposed by General Kray. After various movements of little importance, they, at length, compelled the Austrians to retire, and, entering Bavaria, took possession of Munich, levied contributions on the Elector, and threatened the Hereditary States of the Emperor. Thus pressed, the Austrians deemed it expedient to consent to an armistice, which was concluded with Moreau, on the 14th of July. Count St. Julien was sent to Paris, by the Austrian court, where he exceeded his powers by signing a separate treaty of peace with France on the basis of the treaty of Campo Formio. This treaty the Emperor formally disavowed, and refused to conclude any treaty, unless England was included in it. At the beginning of September, a proposal was made, through Mr. Otto, the French commissary, residing in London, to the British ministers, for concluding a naval armistice, on which condition alone the first consul would consent to prolong the armistice with Austria. A long correspondence took place on this subject, but it evidently appearing that the only object of Buonaparte was to obtain an opportunity of sending supplies to Malta and Alexandria, both of which were strictly blockaded by an English squadron; and, as a new armistice was, during the negotiation, concluded with Austria, on condition of the surrender of the three important fortresses of Philipsburgh, Ulm, and Ingoldstadt, into the hands of the French, who thus secured an opening into the Hereditary States of Austria, the proposal was ultimately rejected on the 9th of October. This armistice terminated on the 29th of November, when Moreau resumed offensive operations. The Archduke John, at first obtained a considerable advantage over the French; and he resolved to improve it by making a general attack on their lines, at Hohenlinden, on the 3d of December. But the elements proved more formidable to the Austrians than even the arms of the enemy. In consequence of a great snow, which fell on the morning of the attack, the central column of the army alone reached the destined point; while an opportunity was afforded afforded to the French to send a division; between that column and the left wing, so as to fall on the rear of the column, at the very moment when it began the attack in front. Still, under this manifest disadvantage, the Austrians gallantly supported the unequal contest for several hours, and made the French pay dearly for the victory which accident and superiority of numbers had secured to them. The battle of Hohenlinden terminated the struggles of the Emperor, for the recovery of those states which the enemy had wrested from him. He soon after sued for peace; and, on the 9th of February, 1801, signed the treaty of Luneville; by which France obtained a cession of all the German territories on the left bank of the Rhine, making that river, from the place where it leaves Switzerland to that where it enters Holland, the boundary of the new republic; thus realizing the original projects of the first revolutionists. The acquisition of this territory destroyed one of the chief barriers against the encroachments of France in the north of Europe. But, that no doubt might be left of the determination of France, to overawe the empire, by the continual fear of hostile incursions into Germany, the restitution of Dusseldorf, Ehrenbreitstein, Philipsburgh, Cassel, Kehl, and Brisac, on the right bank of the Rhine, were rendered of little value by a stipulation that they should remain in the same state in which they were at the moment of their evacuation, that is, in ruins. France, therefore, retained the power of interposition in the affairs of Germany, by the right which she had reserved to herself by this treaty, to settle the indemnities to be secured to the German Princes, who were proprietors of the territory ceded to her, on the left bank of the Rhine; and by her ability, in consequence of these cessions, to make sudden irruptions into the heart of the Hereditary States of Austria. Istria, Dalmatia, and the Venetian Isles in the Adriatic, were secured to Austria, together with Venice, the Bocca di Cattaro, the canals and the country included between the Hereditary States of Austria, the Adriatic sea, and the Adige, from the Tyrol to the mouth of that sea;—the towing-path of the Adige to form the line of limitation. France took to herself, and for her vassal, the Italian republic, or kingdom, as it was soon destined to be, the dominions of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the Modenese, whose sovereigns were to be indemnified for the territory, thus iniquitously wrested from them, by other territories to be wrested, in a manner equally iniquitous, from the sovereign Princes of Germany.

After Buonaparte's flight from Egypt, Kleber entered into a convention, at El Arish, with the commander of the Turkish forces, by which he agreed to evacuate that country, and to return, with his troops, to Europe. And this convention having been referred to Sir Sidney Smith, by the Turks, it received his sanction; it was signed on the 24th of January, 1801. As soon, however, as the British cabinet were apprized of the fact, without being informed that Sir Sidney Smith had any share in the transaction, they considered that it would be highly impolitic and improper, to suffer such a French force to arrive in Europe, to reinforce the armies acting against their ally, in Italy or Germany; and, accordingly, sent instructions to Lord Keith, the commander of the British fleet, in the Mediterranean, to prevent the execution of it, by capturing the troops, on their departure from Alexandria. These instructions were communicated to Kleber by the Admiral, when that General apprized the Turks, that there was an end to the convention; after which hostilities were renewed, and some advantages were gained by the French. The moment, however, the ministers received certain information, that the treaty of El Arish had received the sanction of a British officer, although he was wholly unauthorised to act in a diplomatic character, at that time, and, consequently, had no power to sign such an agreement, they rather chose to risk all the inconvenience, which might result from the presence of Kleber's army in Europe, than to subject the national character even to an unfounded imputation of a breach of faith, and sent counter-instructions to Lord Keith, authorizing him to fulfil the terms of the treaty, and to suffer the French to pass unmolested. While a negociation was opened with Kleber, pursuant to these instructions, that General was assassinated at Cairo, by a Turkish emissary, (on the 14th of January, 1801,) when the command of the French army devolved on Menou, who had publicly professed the Mahometan faith, and added to his own name that of Abdallah.*

In consequence of our unrivalled dominion on the ocean, it appears to have been in agitation, at the commencement of the campaign, to make a powerful diversion in favour of the allies, by means of an irruption into the southern provinces of France; but the sudden return and singularly good fortune of Buonaparte, prevented the execution of this design. Lord Keith, however, appeared with a strong squadron off Genoa, and assisted General Melas in conducting the siege of that city. Some ships detached by the Vice-Admiral, in conjunction with others sent thither by the King of Naples, contributed greatly to the reduction of the fortress of Savona; and when the imperial commander found it necessary to convert the attack of Genoa into a blockade, the British cruisers intercepted all supplies, and actually produced a surrender in consequence of the famine that ensued.†

In the course of the summer, the western departments of France were frequently menaced by the appearance of hostile armaments. Sir Edward Pellew, in the Impetueux, with a flying squadron, and three troop ships, made an attack on Quiberon, on the 4th of June. The Thames and Cynthia having cannonaded the south-west end, and silenced some batteries, Major Ramsay landed with a small body of soldiers and destroyed them; but Fort Penthievre proved too strong to be reduced. The same commander was also successful in an attempt upon the Morbihan, having seized several sloops and gun-vessels, and burnt a national corvette of eighteen guns, by means of a detachment from the Queen's regiment, assisted by the gun-launches under Lieutenant Pinfold. Sir John Borlase Warren also succeeded in an attack on a convoy at anchor near a fort within the Penmarks; and in the destruction of fifteen sail of merchantmen and four armed vessels intended for their protection, within the sands of Boverneuf bay. These exploits, combined with many others of a similar nature, were calculated to annoy the commerce of the enemy, and to put an actual stop to their coasting trade; but what was of still greater consequence, they intercepted the supplies of wine, brandy, flour, and provisions, intended for the fleet at Brest.

In April, the island of Gorec, on the coast of Africa, surrendered to Commodore Sir Charles Hamilton, commanding the Ruby and Melpomene ships of war, without the slightest attempt at resistance.

In August, an expedition was fitted out, under the command of Sir James Murray Pulteney, and Sir John Borlase Warren, whose first destination was against the Spanish port of Ferrol. After the troops were landed, however, the place was found too strong to be attacked with any prospect of success, and the at-

* Buonaparte, before he quitted Egypt, had a secret conference with General Menou, in which he is said to have informed him, that Kleber, to whom he could not avoid leaving the command of the army, was inclined to evacuate the country, in the event of an honourable capitulation being to be obtained; and he ordered him, if Kleber should capitulate, to rid himself of him, and to take the command himself. Kleber did capitulate, and Menou executed his orders. The janissary, who assassinated Kleber, did not know his employer, but it has been confidently stated to have been Menou, under the orders of Buonaparte, who enabled him to enter the house of the General.

† On the morning of the 17th of March, the Queen Charlotte, Lord Keith's flag ship, mounting 120 guns, and one of the finest ships in the British navy, four or five leagues off Leghorn, was discovered to be on fire. All the ships in the harbour, foreign as well as English, put off to her relief, and afforded her every possible assistance; but about eleven o'clock, she blew up with a tremendous explosion, and suffered in a moment almost total destruction! By this event upwards of 600 seamen and marines perished, and of the whole crew not more than 150 escaped with their lives, among whom was the Admiral, who happened to be on shore.

tempt was therefore relinquished. A more formidable force, both naval and military, was sent against Cadiz, under Lord Keith, and Sir Ralph Abercrombie, but as a pestilent disorder raged in the city, daily destroying numbers of the inhabitants, as it was, nevertheless, capable of making a long resistance, and, as the army had another and more important object in view, the destruction of the French in Egypt, this expedition was also abandoned.

Malta, so unjustly seized by Buonaparte, in his voyage to Egypt, had now experienced a blockade of two years both by sea and land, during which time General Vaubois, the French governor, had been summoned no less than eight different times. At length, all hopes of receiving supplies from France having vanished, an attempt was made to save two frigates, La Diane and La Justice, in the harbour; but the former, while making an effort to escape, was overtaken and captured, while the latter, under cover of the night, eluded the vigilance of the British squadron, and effected her escape to France. A few days after this, General Vaubois assembled a council of war in the national palace; and it appearing, that the magazines of provisions had been entirely exhausted for more than a month; that the liquors of all kinds were nearly expended; and that bread, the only food remaining for the garrison and the citizens, must fail in the course of a week, it was determined to capitulate, and on the 5th of September, the island was surrendered into the hands of the British.

The island of Curaçao, in the West Indies, one of the few remaining colonies of the Batavian republic, voluntarily placed itself under the protection of the arms of his Britannic Majesty, on the 13th of the same month.*

Notwithstanding these successes, the close of the eighteenth century was marked by circumstances of a gloomy and discouraging nature to England. All her plans for humbling the pride, curbing the ambition, and restraining the power, of her implacable enemy, had completely failed; France had reduced the continent of Europe to that situation which enabled her, almost without the fear of opposition, to parcel out its various states at her pleasure, for the purpose either of dispossessing those who viewed her with a jealous eye, or of reward. A very large portion of the territory included between the Texel and the Bay of Naples, was occupied by her tributaries and vassals, or by princes who trembled at her frown, and held their tottering power by the frail tenure of her ruler's will. Prussia, indeed, and Russia, had not yet bent beneath the weight of her arms, nor sunk before the machinations of her intriguing spirit. But the Emperor Paul, forsaking his alliance with England, had become her enemy, and the Prussian Monarch, who had for some time, held the scale of victory in his hands, and might have made it preponderate against France, had he so chosen, with a contempt of all regard for the security of his own throne, and with a degree of folly scarcely to be conceived, indulged his ancient jealousy of the house of Austria, contemplated her humiliation with pleasure, passively looked on while France was trampling, with ferocious disdain, on all the settled institutions of surrounding states, vainly imagining, that he possessed the ability to stop her wild career, whenever her efforts should be directed against himself, and, more effectually to favour her views, joined a hostile confederacy of the northern powers, which, at the instigation of Paul, had been recently formed against England.

The principles of this compact† had been adopted and acted upon by Denmark and Sweden; the right of search had been actively resisted; and all the communications which had taken place between Great Britain and the Northern powers only seemed to demonstrate the firm resolution of the latter to persist in a line of conduct which must reduce this country to the necessity of either degrading herself in the eyes of Europe, by submitting to a wanton violation of her acknowledged rights, or of resisting the assertion of those hostile principles by arms. The Emperor of Russia had carried his violence still farther, by imposing an embargo on all British ships in his ports, and by the sequestration of all British property. This confederacy aiming a deadly blow at the maritime power of Great Britain, at a period of severe pressure, when forsaken by her continental allies, and threatened with famine at home, was a counterpart of the memorable armed neutrality of 1780, which had the same object in view. An acquiescence in such claims, which went the length of maintaining the right of a neutral power, however insignificant, to carry on, in time of war, the trade of a belligerent power, and to supply her with whatever was necessary for the support of the contest in which she was engaged, would have been equally dangerous and dishonourable. For, if the principle were once admitted, that free bottoms made free goods, and that no merchantmen could be subjected to search which were under the protection of a ship of war, a Danish or a Swedish frigate, might cover the whole foreign and country trade of France, and exempt her from the expence of insurance, and the risk of capture. It was a claim which took from maritime superiority all its lawful advantages, and sheltered weakness beneath the flag of fraud. It contravened all the principles which, for a century, had regulated the conduct of naval powers; and which England, in particular, had always proclaimed, supported, and enforced. It struck, indeed, at the very source of our prosperity, and could not be submitted to without a sacrifice, which must be speedily followed by the loss of our national wealth, greatness,

* Amongst the miscellaneous events of the year, it may be mentioned, that, on the evening of the 24th of December, as Buonaparte was going in his carriage from the Thuilleries to the opera, he passed through the Rue Vicaise, a narrow street, in which stood a car of uncommon construction, containing a barrel filled with combustibles, and placed in such a situation as almost to obstruct the way. The coachman drove with rapidity; but, scarcely had he passed the car, when it blew up with a dreadful explosion; killed some, wounded others, and shattered the adjoining buildings to their foundation. Several of the assassins, or presumed assassins, concerned in this plot, framed, as it was said, by a combination of royalists and jacobins, were brought to public execution.

At Rome, the conclave sat till the month of March, 1800, when the choice of the sacred college, for a new Pope, fell upon Cardinal Chairemonte, bishop of Tivoli, who took the name of Pius VII. He was accounted a man of good sense, moderation and discretion. He was of the order of the Benedictines, and had been raised successively to the dignity of abbot, bishop, and cardinal. In a few weeks after his elevation, he set out for his own dominions, and on his arrival at Rome, on the 9th of July, the city was illuminated, and his holiness was received with every demonstration of joy.

† 1. "Every ship may freely navigate from one harbour to another; and on the coasts of the Belligerent nations.

2. "The effects which belong to the subjects of the Belligerent powers in neutral ships, with the exception of contraband goods, shall be free.

3. "In order to determine what shall be considered as a blockaded harbour, such denomination shall be admitted to apply only where the disposition and number of the ships of the power by which it is invested shall be such as to render it apparently hazardous to enter; and that every ship which shall go into a blockaded harbour, that is evidently so blockaded, violates the present convention as much as if the commander of the blockade had previously advised it of the state of the harbour, and it had nevertheless endeavoured, by force or artifice, to obtain admission.

4. "With regard to neutral ships, except those which for just reasons, and upon evident grounds, shall be detained, sentence shall be pronounced without delay; the proceedings against them shall be uniform, prompt, and lawful; over and above the indemnity to which they shall be entitled for the damage they have sustained, complete satisfaction shall be given for the insult committed against the flag of their Majesties.

5 "The declaration of the officers who shall command the ship of war, of the King or Emperor, which shall be convoying one or more merchants' ships, that the convoy has no contraband goods on board, shall be sufficient, and that no search of his ship, or the other ships of the convoy, shall be permitted. And the better to insure respect to those principles, and the stipulations founded upon them, which their disinterested wishes to preserve the imprescriptible rights of the neutral nations have suggested, the high contracting parties, to prove their sincerity and justice, will give the strictest orders to their captains, as well of their ships of war, as of their merchant ships, to load no part of their ships, or secretly to have on board any articles, which, by virtue of the present convention, may be considered as contraband; and, for the more completely carrying into execution this command, they will respectively take care to give directions to their Courts of Admiralty to publish it whenever they shall think it necessary; and to this end, the regulation which shall contain this prohibition, under several penalties, shall be printed at the end of the present act, that no one may plead ignorance."

and independence. It was, therefore, resolved by Mr. Pitt to resist this cowardly combination of northern dictators, to the utmost of our power, and at all hazards; and, every attempt at procuring redress, by negociation, having failed, the most active preparations were made to extort it by arms.

The British Parliament assembled for the last time on the 11th of November. Previously to this period, the increased price of provisions had been productive of a degree of public distress almost unequalled. The crop of 1800, like that of the preceding year, had been generally deficient in every country in Europe. The scarcity, which was great and deplorable, bore every symptom of long continuance; and rumours of monopoly and forestalling increased the feeling of the evil, by imparting to it the aspect of injustice, rather than of misfortune. It may, however, be fairly disputed, whether monopoly had any part in aggravating the existing scarcity; and it became clear that no alleviation of the evil was to be found in the legislative and judicial invectives which were uttered against these invisible agents. During this scarcity the sober and industrious classes of the labouring poor sustained their hardships with laudable patience; and though there were some riots in the metropolis and other parts of the country, no general ebullition burst forth that required to be suppressed by bloodshed. To alleviate the public distress, the dangerous measure of a maximum was, on the 5th of December, brought forward in Parliament by the Earl of Warwick, who proposed to fix the highest value of wheat at ten shillings per bushel, although the actual price was at that time more than twenty. But the false and mischievous notion of an artificial scarcity, upon which this proposal proceeded, was exploded by the calm wisdom of Parliament; the motion was rejected, with marked disapprobation; and the legislature confined its efforts to suggesting expedients for diminishing the consumption and encouraging the foreign supply. High bounties were granted on importation; the baking of mixed and inferior flour was enforced by act of Parliament, and the distillation of spirits from grain was prohibited. To the honour of the wealthier part of the community, the hand of charity was also more liberally opened, than at any period which the history of human sufferings has to record.*

The discussion of the late negociations, which occupied a part of this short session, produced no debates of importance; and the supplies having been granted, Parliament was prorogued on the last day of the year, by the King in person. His Majesty, before he retired, ordered the Chancellor to read a proclamation, declaring that the individuals who composed the expiring Parliament should be members on the part of Great Britain of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

On the 1st of January, 1801, a royal declaration was issued concerning the style and titles appertaining to the imperial crown of Great Britain and Ireland; and also to the ensigns, armorial flags, and banners thereof. In the new heraldic arrangement the fleur-de-lis was omitted, the title of King of France was expunged; and the royal dignity was in future to be expressed in the Latin tongue by these words: "Georgius Tertius, Dei Gratia, Britanniarum Rex, Fidei Defensor"—and in the vernacular language—"George the Third, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith." On the same day, the Great Seal of Britain was delivered up and defaced, and a new seal for the empire was given to the Lord Chancellor. A new standard also, combining the three crosses of St. George, St. Andrew, and St. Patrick, was hoisted, amidst the discharge of artillery, in each of the three capitals of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the new year, thus rendered peculiarly memorable, was ushered in with every demonstration of joy. The imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland assembled on the 22d of January, and proceeded to elect a speaker, when Mr. Henry Addington, who had so long and so ably filled the chair of the Lower House of Parliament, was again placed in that elevated situation. On the 2d of February, the King repaired to the House of Lords; and, from the throne, he congratulated the senate on the union which had been so happily effected. The other topics of the speech embraced only painful occurrences.† The debates on the address were highly interesting. In the Peers, Earl Fitzwilliam, who had hitherto contended strenuously for the continuance of the war, and the restoration of the Bourbons, treated the contest as hopeless. He, however, insisted on the propriety "of an inquiry into the causes of the failure, when such large and almost unbounded powers had been intrusted to ministers, and when they had had the whole of Europe to assist in the common cause; it was also necessary to be informed, why, instead of succeeding against an ancient enemy, they had at once plunged the nation into a contest with her allies?" He added, "that the new conflict in which we were about to engage was, as far as Sweden and Denmark were concerned, one of our own seeking, as we had it not in our power to suspend the discussion of the question relative to the neutral code, in the same manner as in 1780, when this country was in a less difficult situation than at present." Lord Grenville defended the conduct of ministers, and maintained that the claim of searching neutral vessels originated in the law of nations and the rights of nature, and that the assertion of this right constituted the foundation of her commerce and her wealth, and was the bulwark of the naval and military glory of Great Britain. On a division, the address was carried by a majority of seventy-three to seventeen voices.

In the Commons, Mr. Pitt, after repelling a variety of objections, insisted, "that our very existence as a nation depended on our possessing and exercising the right of searching neutral vessels," and he lamented that any member of that House "should only have begun to doubt, when our enemies were ready to begin to combat;" he maintained that our claims on the present occasion arose not only out of positive treaties, but out of the law of nations; and he asked, "if we were to permit the navy of our enemy to be supplied and recruited? to suffer blockaded ports to be furnished with stores and provisions? and allow neutral nations, by hoisting a flag on a sloop or a fishing-boat, to convey the treasures of South America to Spain, or the naval stores of the Baltic to Brest or to Toulon?" The House at length divided, when the majority in favour of ministers was 245 against 63.

Determined to overawe or to dispel the confederacy, an order in council was issued, dated the 14th of January, imposing an embargo on all Russian, Danish, and

* Among other causes of dearth, the great increase of the national population was repeatedly mentioned; and in the course of the session, a bill was brought into Parliament by Mr. Abbot, for ascertaining the population of Great Britain, which passed into a law; and upon an actual enumeration of the people, it appeared, to the general surprize, that they amounted to nearly eleven millions—a result exceeding the highest previous conjecture; and it is probable that the aggregate population of Great Britain and Ireland amounted at this period to sixteen millions.

† "The unfortunate course of events on the continent," said the King, "and the consequences which must be expected to result from them, cannot fail to be matter of anxiety and concern to all who have a just feeling for the security and independence of Europe. Your astonishment, as well as your regret, must be excited by the conduct of those powers, whose attention at such a period appears to be more engaged in endeavours to weaken the naval force of the British empire, which has hitherto opposed so powerful an obstacle to the inordinate ambition of France, than in concerting the means of mutual defence against the common and increasing danger. The representations which I directed to be made to the court of St. Petersburgh, in consequence of the outrages committed against the ships, property, and persons of my subjects, have been treated with the utmost disrespect; and the proceedings of which I complained have been aggravated by subsequent acts of injustice and violence. Under these circumstances, a convention has been concluded by that court with those of Stockholm and Copenhagen; the object of which, as avowed by one of the contracting parties, is to renew their former engagements for establishing by force a new code of maritime laws, inconsistent with the rights, and hostile to the interests of this country. In this situation I could not hesitate as to the conduct it became me to pursue. I have taken the earliest measures to repel the aggressions of this hostile confederacy, and to support those principles which are essential to the maintenance of our naval strength, grounded on the system of public law so long established and recognized in Europe."

Swedish vessels in the ports of Great Britain; but the court of Berlin, although a party to the league, was treated upon this occasion with peculiar deference and respect. Preparations were also made to send a fleet into the Sound, and to hazard all the evils likely to result from a war, which threatened to exclude the British flag from the navigation of the Baltic, and her commerce from the shores of the Elbe, the Ems, the Vistula, and the Weser. On the other hand, the utmost exertions had for some time past been made in all the ports of Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. Their combined navy, if fitted out by a simultaneous movement, would have amounted to nearly eighty sail of the line; and these, together with the numerous gun-boats and floating batteries which they either possessed already or could have easily constructed, might have rendered their narrow seas and difficult coasts impervious to attack.

The union of Great Britain and Ireland was, not without reason, regarded by Mr. Pitt as the transaction which reflected the greatest lustre upon his administration; and although he had uniformly opposed the claim of Catholic emancipation during the existence of the separate legislature of Ireland, he had, it was understood, to facilitate this favourite object, given, in concurrence with his colleagues, assurances to the Irish Catholics, of a complete participation in all political privileges, as soon as the union should have taken place. When this proposition was stated in the cabinet council, the King, astonished and alarmed at the nature and extent of the claim, in very peremptory terms refused his assent to the measure being brought forward by ministers in Parliament; on the ground that his assent could not be given in consistence with the oath which he had taken at his coronation.* The mind of the King was deeply impressed with this idea; and the cabinet ministers, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer at their head, finding it impossible to carry their point, were under the necessity of tendering their resignation.†

This offer the monarch accepted, and after much consultation, the offices of First Lord of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, were conferred upon Mr. Addington, the Speaker of the House of Commons. The post next in dignity, that of Secretary for foreign affairs, hitherto held by Lord Grenville, was given to Lord Hawkesbury. Earl St. Vincent was placed at the head of the Admiralty in the place of Earl Spencer; Lord Eldon, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, formerly Sir John Scott, succeeded Lord Loughborough in the Court of Chancery. Lords Hobart and Pelham were nominated Secretaries of State, in the room of Mr. Dundas and the Duke of Portland. Mr. Yorke succeeded Mr. Windham, as Secretary of War. His brother, the Earl of Hardwicke, was destined to the Vice-Regal office in Ireland. Lord Lewisham was placed at the head of the board of controul. And in this general change, the Duke of Portland and Lord Westmoreland alone retained their stations in the cabinet, the former as president of the council, and the latter as Lord Privy Seal. On the 10th of February, Mr. Addington resigned his office as Speaker of the House of Commons; and on the following day Sir John Milford was chosen in his stead. The agitation of the King's mind had however so materially affected the state both of his bodily and mental health, that the new arrangements, although nearly completed, were not formally announced, and a total interruption of the regal functions ensued, during which the former ministers continued to discharge the duties of their respective offices. On the same day that Mr. Addington resigned his office of Speaker, the Earl of Darnley moved for an inquiry into the state of the nation. On this occasion Lord Grenville acquainted the House, that his Majesty's servants, not being able to carry into effect a measure which they deemed essential to the tranquillity and prosperity of the empire, had tendered to his Majesty the resignation of their several employments, and that his Majesty had been graciously pleased to dispense with their services. On which representation the Earl of Darnley consented to postpone his motion. The routine of Parliamentary business went on as usual during the illness of the King. His Majesty having at length recovered, the appointments of the new ministers were announced in the accustomed and regular form; and on the 17th of March, Mr. Addington was sworn into his high office; and Mr. Pitt was divested of that power which he had exercised seventeen years.

In the course of the spring, Denmark, who had taken the most efficacious measures for excluding the vessels of Great Britain from the navigation of the Elbe, took possession of Hamburgh. The King of Prussia, irritated at the seizure of one of his vessels, the Triton, laden with contraband goods, had already seized on the bailiwick of Ritzebuttle, and the port of Cuxhaven, under pretence of securing the independence of the north of Germany; and soon determined to recur to a measure which had given a new turn to the politics of England, and is supposed to have had no small influence on the peace that ensued. His Majesty of Prussia, after publishing a declaration complaining of the oppressions practised by Great Britain, ordered a body of troops to enter Hanover, on the 30th of March, seized on the capital, levied contributions, and obliged the generals and officers to engage not to serve against the House of Brandenburgh. In the interim, a British fleet, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, and four frigates, together with a number of gun-boats and bomb-vessels, in all fifty-four sail, had been fitted out in the north sea, and on the 12th of March proceeded from Yarmouth Roads for the Baltic.

The command of this expedition was intrusted to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, assisted by Vice-Admiral Lord Nelson, and Rear-Admiral Totty, the last of whom was so unfortunate as to lose his flag-ship on a sand bank off the coast of Lincolnshire. As it was hoped that Denmark, whose trade and prosperity had experienced an unexampled increase during the war, might be prevailed upon to sue for forbearance, the first efforts of this armament were directed against her capital, while Mr. Vansittart, a new minister plenipotentiary, was instructed to endeavour to detach the court of Copenhagen from the northern alliance. The Prince Regent of Denmark, however, who had governed many years in the name of his father, declared, that he was determined to adhere to his engagements. On the 30th of March, the English squadron passed the sound without encountering any resistance. After anchoring about four or five miles from the island of Huin, Sir Hyde Parker, in company with Lord Nelson and Rear-Admiral Graves, surveyed the formidable line of ships, rideaux, galleys, fire-vessels, and gun-boats, flanked and supported by extensive batteries on the two islands called The Crowns: these were supported by two ships of seventy guns, and a large frigate in the inner road of Copenhagen, while two sixty-four gun vessels, without masts, were moored on the flat towards the entrance to the arsenal. Lord Nelson, who had made an offer of his services to conduct

* The Coronation Oath, as settled at the period of the revolution, and first used at the coronation of William and Mary, in the year 1689, consists of the following questions and answers:

"Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this kingdom of England, and the dominions thereunto belonging, according to the statutes of Parliament agreed upon, and the laws and customs of the same?"

'I solemnly promise so to do.'

"Will you, to the utmost of your power, cause law and justice in mercy to be executed in all your judgments?"

'I will.'

"Will you, to the utmost of your power, maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the gospel, and the protestant reformed religion as by law established? And will you promise unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as, by law, do, or shall appertain unto them or any of them?"

'All this I promise to do.'

Then the King or Queen, laying his or her hand upon the gospel, says, "The things which I have here before promised I will perform and keep. So help me God."

† Some persons considered, that the ostensible differed entirely from the real cause of this event; and that, despairing of an honourable termination of the war, Mr. Pitt voluntarily seceded, in order to give his friend, Mr. Addington, an opportunity of negociating a peace.

the attack, and had for that purpose shifted his flag from the St. George to the Elephant, a vessel of smaller size, immediately gave directions for buoying the channel of the outer deep and the middle ground, after which the detachment, consisting of twelve sail of the line, with frigates, bombs, and fire ships, selected for the assault, passed in safety, and anchored off Draco.

On the morning of the 2d of April, the Vice-Admiral made the signal to weigh and engage the Danish line of defence, which was found to consist of six sail of two deckers, eleven floating batteries, mounting from twenty-six, twenty-four, to eighteen, eighteen pounders, and one bomb-ketch, together with several schooner-rigged gun vessels; these were supported by the Crown Islands, mounting eighty-eight cannon, and four sail of the line moored in the harbour's mouth, together with some batteries thrown up on the island of Amak. The shallowness of the water and the intricacy of the navigation prevented the complete execution of the projected plan; for the Bellona and Russel grounded before they had reached the stations assigned to them, while the Agamemnon, being unable to weather the shoal of the middle, was obliged to anchor. These vessels were intended to out-flank and overawe the batteries of the Crown Islands, as well as the two outer ships in the harbour's mouth. The action began at five minutes past ten; at half an hour afterwards, the first half of the fleet was engaged, and before half past eleven the battle became general. The Elephant's station was in the centre, opposite to the Danish Commodore Fisher, who commanded in the Dannebrog, a sixty-two gun ship. The distance was nearly a cable's length, and this was the average distance at which the action was fought. The Glatton had her station immediately a-stern of the Elephant, and the Ganges, Monarch, and Defiance a-head, the distance between each not exceeding half a cable. At one, p. m. few if any of the enemy's ships had ceased to fire. The Isis had greatly suffered by the superior weight of the Provostein's fire; and had it not been for the judicious diversion made in her favour by the Desirée, who raked the Provostein, and for the assistance afforded by the Polyphemus, the Isis would have been destroyed. The Monarch was also suffering severely under the united fire of the Holstein and the Zealand, while the Bellona had received serious injury by the bursting of some of her guns. The division of the commander-in-chief acted according to the preconcerted plan, but could only menace the entrance to the harbour. The Elephant was warmly engaged by the Dannebrog, and by two heavy praams on her bow and quarter. Signals of distress were flying on board the Bellona and the Russel, and of inability in the Agamemnon. The contest had not yet declared itself in favour of either side; but in this posture of affairs the signal was thrown out on board the London, Admiral Parker's ship, for the action to cease. Lord Nelson, who was then walking the starboard side of the quarter-deck, said to Captain Foley, with considerable agitation—"Do you know what's shewn on board of the commander-in-chief?" "Why, to leave off action!" "Leave off action!" and then added with a shrug, "Now, damn me if I do." "You know, Foley," added he, "as I have only one eye, I have a right to be blind sometimes;" and then, with an archness peculiar to his character, putting the glass to his blind eye, he exclaimed, "I really do not see the signal." Captain Riou, perceiving the blank in the original plan for the attack of the crown batteries, owing to the Bellona and Russel having grounded, and to the Agamemnon having anchored, proceeded down the line with his squadron of frigates early in the engagement, and bravely attempted, but in vain, to fulfil the duties which three ships of the line had been directed to assist him in; and the general signal of recall, made by the commander-in-chief, had the good effect at last of saving Riou's squadron from destruction.*

The action continued with unabated vigour; but about two, p. m. the greatest part of the Danish line had ceased to fire: some of the lighter ships were adrift; and the carnage on board the vessels of the enemy, who reinforced their crews from the shore, was dreadful. The Danish commodore's ship was now on fire, and was found to be drifting in flames before the wind, spreading terror and dismay throughout the enemy's line. The usual lamentable scene then ensued; and the British boats rowed in every direction to save the crew, who were throwing themselves from her at every port-hole; few however were left unwounded in her, and fewer still could be saved. About half past three she blew up with a terrible explosion. After the Dannebrog was adrift, and had ceased to fire, the action was found to be over along the whole line a-stern of the British fleet, but the ships a-head, and the crown batteries, as well as the prizes made by the British, still continued to fire. Lord Nelson losing his temper at this, observed, "That he must either send on shore and stop this irregular proceeding, or send in our fire-ships and burn the prizes. He accordingly retired into the stern gallery, and wrote with great dispatch the following letter:

"To the Brothers of Englishmen, the brave Danes.

"Lord Nelson has directions to spare Denmark, when no longer resisting; but if the fire is continued on the part of Denmark, Lord Nelson must be obliged to set on fire all the floating batteries he has taken, without having the power of saving the brave Danes who have defended them.

(Signed) "Nelson and Bronte,
"Vice-Admiral under the command of Admiral
"Sir Hyde Parker."

This was conveyed on shore through the contending fleets, by Captain Sir Frederic Thesiger, who acted as his Lordship's aide-de-camp; and who found the Prince near the sally-port, animating his people, and sharing their dangers. It deserves to be remarked, that this letter, which exhibited a happy union of policy and courage, was written at a moment when Lord Nelson perceived, that in consequence of the unfavourable state of the wind, the Admiral was not likely to get up to aid the enterprise; that the principal batteries of the enemy, and the ships at the mouth of the harbour, were yet untouched; that two of his own division had grounded; and that others were likely to share the same fate.

The firing from the crown batteries, and from the leading ships of the British, did not cease till past three o'clock, when the Danish Adjutant-General Lindholm, returning with a flag of truce, directed the fire of the batteries to be suspended. The signal for doing the same was then made to the British ships, and the action closed after five hours' duration, four of which were warmly contested, and during which the whole of the Danish line, to the southward of the Crown Islands, amounting to seventeen sail, were sunk, burnt, or taken. This mission of the adjutant-general's was to ask the particular object of sending the flag of truce," to which Lord Nelson replied, that his object in sending the flag of truce was humanity: he therefore consented that hostilities should cease, and that the wounded Danes might be taken on shore; and he would take his prisoners out of the vessels, and burn or carry off his prizes, as he should think fit. On this, his royal highness sent his adjutant-general Lindholm again on board the Elephant, and a negociation was entered upon, which terminated in an armistice for fourteen weeks, during which "the treaty of armed neutrality," as far as related to Denmark, was to be suspended.† As soon

* When Riou, who had been previously wounded in the head, by a splinter, found that he was obliged to retreat, he exclaimed, "What will Nelson think of us?" At this moment his clerk was killed by his side; and by another shot several of the marines shared the same fate. The captain then exclaimed—"Come, my boys, let us all die together!" and the words were scarcely uttered, when a raking shot severed him in two, and deprived the British service of one of its greatest ornaments.

† In recording the memorable engagement off the city of Copenhagen, the gallantry displayed by the Danes ought not to be passed over in silence. Notwithstanding the long peace they had enjoyed, the batteries both afloat and ashore were manned, and the guns served with soon as the disabled vessels were refitted, the British squadron sailed to Carlescrona, and on the 18th of April arrived off that port. Sir Hyde Parker lost no time in informing the governor, that the Danish court had been induced to conclude an armistice, by which the disputes between the courts of Copenhagen and St. James's had been accommodated, and "to require an explicit answer from the court of Sweden, relative to its intention to abandon the hostile measures, adopted in conjunction with Russia against the rights and interests of Great Britain." To this Vice-Admiral Cronstedt replied in the name of the King, "that it was the unalterable resolution of his Swedish Majesty not to fail for a moment in fulfilling with fidelity and sincerity the engagements he had entered into with his allies; but that he would not refuse to listen to equitable proposals for the accommodation of disputes, provided they were made by plenipotentiaries, sent on the part of the King of Great Britain to the united powers." On receiving this answer, the admiral left the bay without firing a gun; and all future hostilities with the northern states were happily prevented by the death of the Emperor Paul, who fell by the hands of his courtiers, on the 22d of March.*

As soon as Alexander I. son of the deposed Emperor, succeeded to the throne of his father, he published an ukase, revoking several of the acts of the late government, and restoring the British seamen to liberty. Baron Lisakeewitsch, the Russian minister at the court of Denmark, having notified those events to Admiral Parker, the Admiral immediately returned to Kioge bay, to await the orders of his court in consequence of this new and interesting change, and in the mean time the benefits of the armistice were extended to the court of Stockholm. About the same period, Lord St. Helen's arrived at the court of St. Petersburgh, in quality of minister plenipotentiary for England; and by a convention signed in the Rusian capital on the 17th of June, the Emperor on the one hand allowed the right of search, under certain restrictions, by ships of war, but not by privateers; while on the other hand, the merchandise of the produce, growth, and manufacture of the countries engaged in war, might be purchased and carried away by the neutral powers; but by a subsequent explanatory declaration, the commerce between the mother country of a belligerent and her colonies was expressly excluded from the benefit of this arrangement. It was also stipulated by one of the articles that Sweden and Denmark should receive back their ships and settlements on acceding to this treaty, and with these terms they both very readily complied. Thus Great Britain, partly by the sudden demise of the Emperor Paul, and partly by the thunder of her navy, saw a confederacy dissolved which aimed at the decrease of her maritime greatness, and was calculated to involve her in a new and disastrous war.†

with a degree of promptitude and valour that would have conferred credit on veteran troops. The English Vice-Admiral himself confessed that the combat was far more terrible than the action at Aboukir; and when it is recollected that two captains of the British navy, Captain Riou and Captain Mosse, lost their lives, and Captain Sir T. B. Thompson a leg; and that the total of killed and wounded of the British amounted to nearly one thousand; while the loss of the enemy was stated in Lord Nelson's dispatches at four times that number, it must be allowed that the resistance was noble.

* Sir John Carr, in his "Travels in Russia," in 1804, gives the following history of the Emperor Paul's assassination, upon the authority of one of the assassins, who maintained that the resolution was taken by the actors in this catastrophe from an opinion, "that to save the empire it was necessary that the emperor be removed:" "It was the custom of the emperor to sleep in an outer apartment next to the empress, upon a sofa, in his regimentals and boots, while the grand Duke and Duchess, and the rest of the imperial family, were lodged at various distances, in apartments below the story which he occupied. —In the dead of the night of the 10th of March, O. S. Count P—Z —(late a disgraced courtier) and the rest of the conspirators, amounting to eight or nine persons, having previously changed the guard, passed the drawbridge, easily ascended the stair-case which led to Paul's chamber, and met with no resistance till they reached the anti-room, when a faithful hussar, who always slept at the Emperor's bed-room door, awakened by the noise, challenged them and presented his fusee: much as they must have all admired the brave fidelity of the guard, neither time nor circustances would admit of an act of generosity, which might have endangered the whole plan; Z—drew his sabre and cut the poor fellow down. Paul, awakened by the noise, sprang from his sofa; at this moment the whole party rushed into his room: the unhappy sovereign, anticipating their design, at first endeavoured to intrench himself in the chairs and tables; then recovering, he assumed a high tone, told them they were his prisoners, and called upon them to surrender. Finding that they fixed their eyes steadily and fiercely upon him, and continued advancing towards him, he implored them to spare his life; declared his consent instantly to relinquish the sceptre, and to accept of any terms they would dictate. In his raving, he offered to make them princes, and give them estates, and titles, and orders without end. They now began to press upon him, when he made a convulsive effort to reach the window: in the attempt he failed, and indeed so high was it from the ground, that had he succeeded, the expedient would only have put a more instantaneous period to his misery. In the effort, he very severely cut his hand with the glass; and as they drew him back, he grasped a chair, with which he felled one of the assailants, and a desperate resistance took place. So great was the noise, that notwithstanding the massive walls and thick folding-doors which divided the apartments, the Empress was disturbed, and began to cry for help, when a voice whispered in her ear, and imperatively told her to remain quiet, otherwise, if she uttered another word, she should be put to instant death. Whilst the Emperor was thus making a last struggle, the Prince Y—struck him on one of the temples with his fist, and laid him upon the floor: Paul recovering from the blow, again implored his life; at this moment, the heart of P—Z—relented, and upon being observed to tremble and hesitate, a young Hanoverian resolutely exclaimed, "We have passed the rubicon: if we spare his life, before the setting of to-morrow's sun, we shall be his victims!" Upon which he took off his sash, twined it twice round the neck of the Emperor, and giving one end to Z—and holding the other himself, they pulled for a considerable time with all their force, until their miserable sovereign was no more; they then retired from the palace without the least molestation, and returned to their respective homes. At seven o'clock the intelligence of the demise of Paul, by apoplexy, as it was stated, spread through the capital, and his son, Alexander, who had already mourned his father's fate, mounted the throne of the unfortunate monarch. The punishment that awaited the assassins was slight in the extreme: Count P—Z—was ordered not to approach the imperial residence, and the governor of the city, another of the principal conspirators, was transferred to Riga. Thus perished the son of Peter III. who, after a short reign, fell a sacrifice to the masculine ambition of a female, and the treason of a few contemptible conspirators." Dazzled with the exploits of Buonaparte, Paul contemplated the First Consul of France with the same degree of enthusiasm as had been formerly shewn by his unfortunate father in respect to Frederic the Great. A private correspondence had actually taken place between them, compliments were interchanged, and projects of a new and portentous kind broached. Seven thousand Russian prisoners in France were immediately liberated without exchange, or ransom, and after being clothed in new uniforms, and armed from the depots of the republic, placed at the disposal of the enraptured Czar. To fill up the measure of this wonderful change in the sentiments of the court of St. Petersburgh, Count de Kalitschew, a Russian nobleman, was dispatched to Paris, in the character of ambassador-extraordinary; and that prince, who had afforded an asylum to the unfortunate remains of the Bourbon family, and who kept a court for and recognised Louis XVIII. as the legitimate sovereign of France, now acknowledged the French Republic, and testified his admiration for her first magistrate.

† As soon as the peace of Luneville had been signed, the consular government of France determined to punish Portugal for its attachment to England. Queen Mary, the widow of her uncle Peter III. incapacitated by a mental malady, from the exercise of the royal functions, still retained the semblance of sovereignty; but the kingdom was governed by her son, as regent. The Prince of Brazil, conscious that his country had been repeatedly saved, and his family continued on the throne, in consequence of the support and protection of Great Britain, from whom he now expected the assistance of an auxiliary army, was devoted to that power, and, notwithstanding the menaces of the court of Madrid, had hitherto rejected the idea of any treaty that tended to exclude British ships from the ports of Portugal. The King of Spain, fearful of an invasion on the part of the republic, published a manifesto, on the 27th of February, in which he complained that Europe had been scandalised at Portugal's presenting a secure asylum to the squadrons of the enemy, from which they were enabled to issue forth and seize on the vessels of Spain, and on those of a republic united to him by friendship. This manifesto announced the recall of the Spanish ambassador from the court of Portugal, and concluded with a declaration of war against that country. The counter-manifesto, published by the court of Lisbon, on the 21st of April, was replete with energy, and worthy of the most prosperous days of the Portuguese monarchy. After congratulating the nation on retaining its independence, notwithstanding the subjugation of so many other countries, the prince regent maintained that Portugal had always evinced a scrupulous fidelity to its promises in respect to foreign states; that war had been declared against them because they had observed the faith of treaties; and that the measures now taken by the enemies of Portugal were intended to degrade and debase her by reducing her to the necessity of supplicating for the preservation of her commerce. However, Godoy, the Prince of the Peace, having been declared generalissimo of the Spanish army, immediately entered Portugal, and in the course of less than two months over-ran that country. The prince regent, finding all his efforts to resist the Spaniards in vain, was obliged to consent to a treaty of peace, which was signed at Badajos, on the 6th of June. By this treaty, Spain obtained possession of the province of Olivenza, and it was stipulated that no armed ships, appertaining to the enemies of that country, should be admitted into the harbours of Portugal.

These proceedings, however, did not appear in exact conformity with

The force which had been destined against Egypt, in the preceding year, after the reduction of Malta, had repaired to Gibraltar, to recover from the inconveniences of a long cruise in a boisterous season. In December, 1800, they landed at Malta, whence they sailed, in two divisions, for Marmorice, in the hope and expectation of deriving material assistance from the Turks. They were deceived, however, in this respect; and, indeed, they laboured under such disadvantages, as had seldom been experienced by troops in a similar situation. They knew little or nothing of the country they were going to attack; they were possessed but of one map, and that most grossly incorrect; they had no other guide than Sir Sidney Smith, who was unacquainted with the interior of the country; they could derive no information but from Mr. Baldwin, who had been the British consul, at Alexandria;—and they were so ill-informed of the actual state of the enemy's force, that, at the highest computation, they estimated it only at 10,000 French, and 5,000 auxiliaries;—and this estimate even exceeded the number stated in the official information sent from England, on which the expedition was founded. In point of fact, the French force, at this time, amounted to no less than 32,180 men;—while Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who commanded the expedition, had under him not more than 12,000 effective men. Notwithstanding the disparity of force, and so many other discouraging circumstances, the British commander resolved to make the attempt, at least, to dislodge the French from Egypt. Aboukir Bay was the point chosen for landing the army, and, at two o'clock in the morning of the 8th of March, 1801, the first division, consisting of the reserve, under Major General Moore, the brigade of guards, under Major General Ludlow, and part of the first brigade, composed of the royals, the first battalion of the 54th, 200 of the second battalion, the whole amounting to about 5,500 men, under the command of Major General Coote, assembled in the boats, while the remainder of the first and second brigades were put into ships stationed close to the shore, to be ready to give speedy support to the troops that were to land first. The boats were appointed to rendezvous near the Mondovi, which was anchored at about gun shot distance from the shore. At three o'clock, the signal rocket was fired; and the boats moved onward to the destined spot. But it was near nine o'clock before they could all collect, and proceed, in regular order to the shore. The right flank of the boats was protected by the Cevelle cutter, and the Dangereuse, and Janissary gun vessels: the left by the Entreprenant cutter, Malta schooner, and the Negresse gun-vessel; on each flank also were two armed launches of the fleet. The gallant hero of Acra, with a detachment of seamen, directed to co-operate with the army, had charge of the launches which contained the field artillery. The Tartan and Fury bomb-vessels were so placed as to cover the landing with their fire; and the Peterell, Camelion, and Minorca, were moored with their broadsides to the shore. The shore formed the arch of a circle, the extremities of which, distant about three miles from each other, projected about one mile into the sea. And, as the ships were stationed just within this arch, the boats had a mile to go before they reached the shore. The land rose from the beach, forming a variety of sand-hills, and, in the centre, one much larger than the rest, rising to the height of sixty yards, and nearly perpendicular. It was a position peculiarly favourable for resisting a landing army; and, as the French had had ample notice of the approach of the English, they had spared no pains to increase its natural advantages, by troops and seamen, placed in situations which gave them the best command of the beach, and exposed themselves to the least possible danger. Indeed, so confident was the French commander, Menou, that no serious attempt would be made to land here, that he sent only two thousand men to receive the English. This was a fatal blunder of his; for, had he opposed their landing with fifteen or twenty thousand men, as he easily might have done, the enterprize would have been too hazardous to be undertaken, and too desperate to succeed. About nine in the morning, the signal was made for the boats to advance towards the shore. They sprang forward with amazing rapidity, at the same moment; and, as soon as the French had recovered from the astonishment which the intrepidity of the assailants had excited, they opened upon them a most dreadful fire, from twelve pieces of cannon stationed on the heights, and from the castle of Aboukir, at one end of their line.

Such was the quantity of shot and shells thrown from this commanding position, that the destruction of the whole division seemed inevitable; and, as the boats approached the shore, they were further exposed to a heavy fire of grape shot and musquetry. The effect of these on the water has been compared, by an eye-witness, to the fall of a shower of hail. Yet, strange to say, only one boat received any material damage. The reserve leaped out of the boats on the shore, and formed as they advanced; the 23d and 40th rushed up the principal sand-hill, without firing a shot, and drove the enemy from their post with the bayonet. They pursued them till they carried two nole-hills in the rear, which commanded the plain to the left. They were followed by the 42d regiment, who also ascended the height, notwithstanding the fire from two pieces of cannon, and a battalion of infantry;—when they reached the summit, they sustained a charge from two hundred French dragoons, whom they soon compelled to retire with precipitation. These dragoons, however, rallied behind the sand hills, and, attacking the guards, as they were landing on the beach, threw them into momentary confusion; but the timely approach of the 50th regiment, which was already formed on their right, checked the enemy, and gave time for the guards to present a front, when the enemy were again repulsed with considerable loss. At the very moment when the 54th and royals landed, a column of six hundred infantry was advancing, with fixed bayonets, against the left flank of the guards; but as soon as they perceived those regiments, they fired a volley and retreated. In about an hour and a half, the French were driven from every position, with the loss of three hundred men, eight pieces of cannon, and many horses. The boats immediately returned for the remainder of the troops, and, by the great exertions of the navy, the whole army was landed by the evening. In this affair the English with the interests and views of France; and General St. Cyr, who had been invested with the character of ambassador to the court at Madrid, immediately placed himself at the head of a body of 24,000 troops, entered Portugal, and invested the fortress of Almeida, within thirty leagues of the capital. No sooner was this event known at Lisbon, than the court became alarmed for its safety, and as the subsidy of 300,000*l.* voted to that state by the British Parliament, was unaccompanied by a body of troops, as had been originally intended, a peace soon after took place between Portugal and France. By this treaty, signed at Madrid, on the 29th of September, Portugal engaged no longer to admit either British ships of war or merchantmen into her harbours; the limits of the dominions of the republic in Guiana were extended; and commercial immunities highly favourable to France were obtained. On the other hand, the British ministry, being apprehensive lest the island of Madeira should be delivered up to the enemy, sent a squadron thither, with a small body of land forces under Colonel Clinton, who, debarking on the day of his arrival, obtained possession of the forts which command the bay of Funchal.

In the interim, such of the states of Europe as had not yet made their peace with France, being terrified into submission by the victories of Marengo and Hohenlinden, and bereaved, in consequence of the treaty of Luneville, of all efficient co-operation, were eager to submit to the conqueror. The King of the two Sicilies, alarmed at the approach of an army under General Murat, withdrew his troops in succession from the territories of Tuscany and Rome; and at the moment when the French were about once more to enter his kingdom, he contrived, by the powerful intercession of Russia and Spain, to prevent the re-establishment of the Parthenopean republic. This treaty, however, by means of which he purchased his safety, was humiliating; for he agreed to shut the ports of Naples and Sicily to the ships of war of Great Britain and the Ottoman Porte, and to renounce, with Porto Longone, his possessions in the isle of Elba, the presidial states in Tuscany, and the principality of Piombino. He stipulated, by a specific article, to pay the sum of 500,000 livres, by way of indemnification for the lives lost and the damages sustained by the French party, during the late disorders in the kingdom of Naples; and he was obliged also solemnly to agree to permit all those who had been either imprisoned or banished on account of their political opinions, to be liberated, and return to their native country.

had six hundred and fifty-five men, killed, wounded, and missing; of whom one hundred and two only were slain. The British army continuing to advance, attacked the French, who had taken up a formidable position on the road to Alexandria. This action, which lasted several hours, was fought on the 13th of March.

The English suffered severely by the enemy's decided superiority in cavalry and artillery, and, after sustaining a destructive fire, under multiplied disadvantages, during the greater part of the day, the General did not think it prudent to persist in his intention to force the heights on which the enemy were posted; and, therefore, ordered the army to return to the position which they occupied in the morning. It was in this position that the British army sustained and repelled the memorable attack of the 21st of March. The preceding evening Sir Sidney Smith received a letter from an Arab chief, apprizing him of the arrival of General Menou, at Alexandria, with a powerful force, and of his intention to attack the English the next morning. The commander-in-chief, wholly unacquainted with the disposition and character of these Arabs, gave no credit to the friendly communication, notwithstanding the avowed confidence which the gallant and intelligent officer, to whom it was addressed, and who was best able to appreciate such intelligence, reposed in it. The attack began, on the right of the British lines, at half past three in the morning, and continued till ten, when Menou, finding every effort to carry the British position unavailing, ordered his men to retire. The loss of the French, on this day, was estimated at four thousand men, about one fourth of whom were killed. The English had two hundred and thirty-five officers and men killed, twelve hundred and fifty wounded, and two-and-thirty missing. Among the wounded were General Moore, Brigadier-Generals Hope, Oakes, and Lawson, and Sir Sidney Smith. Sir Ralph Abercrombie also received a mortal wound, by a musquet ball, in the thigh, early in the day, which he concealed from the army till the period for exertion was past, when his strength failed him, he was carried off the field, and conveyed on board the Admiral's ship, where he died on the 28th of March. His death was universally, and most deservedly lamented;—for his mind was stored with every great and good quality, and his heart was the seat of every virtue.* The French General, Roix, was among the killed.—The standard of the legion to which Buonaparte, with his usual arrogance, had given the appellation of Invincible, was taken by Anthony Lutz, a private in the Minorca regiment, which took an active and distinguished part in the business of the day.† The action, on the part of the British, was, exclusively, confined to the right wing, which did not consist of more than six thousand men, and which defeated nearly double the number of the enemy, whose whole force, with the exception of eight hundred, was directed against them.

On the death of Sir Ralph Abercrombie, the command devolved on General Hutchinson.—It was, for some time, a matter of doubt with the new commander, whether he should lay siege to Alexandria; or proceed further into the country, and, after forming a junction with the Turkish army, which was hastening to join him, by the way of Syria, endeavour to reduce Grand Cairo, and to cut off all communication between the French on the coast, and every part of the interior. After duly weighing every circumstance, and, particularly, the inadequacy of his force to form the siege of Alexandria, he wisely resolved to adopt the latter plan of operations. The junction between the English and Turkish armies was effected at the beginning of June; and, on the 15th of that month, General Hutchinson wrote to General Belliard, who commanded at Cairo, calling upon him to prevent a needless effusion of blood, and offering him the most honourable terms to induce him to surrender the place. This the French commander peremptorily refused, and, in order to inspirit his men at the approach of the English, ordered a feu de joie to be fired, by the garrison, for the capture of Ireland. Belliard, however, had no seriou intention of defending the place; he knew the incompetency of his army to guard such extensive fortifications; he was aware, that the inhabitants were, to a man, hostile to the French; and he was sensible that his own troops desired nothing so ardently as to return to Europe. He, therefore, prudently, sent a flag of truce to the English camp, and, after a long conference, a capitulation was signed, on the 27th of June, by which the French engaged to evacuate Cairo, on being allowed to return, with their arms, to Europe. This capitulation was carried into effect on the tenth of the following month, when the English and Turks took possession of the city, and both their flags were hoisted on the citadel. The total amount of persons included in the capitulation amounted to upwards of fourteen thousand; exclusive of women and children; and the military alone, including five hundred men who deserted to the Mamelukes, after the capitulation, amounted to 14,172. General Hutchinson, having received some reinforcements from England, in the month of July, which swelled his army to 16,000 men, resolved to commence the siege of Alexandria. The approaches to the town were made under circumstances highly honourable to the valour and good conduct of the besieging army, who drove the enemy from post to post, till the French commander, Menou, finding no prospect of relief from Europe, and no hopes of ultimate success from further resistance, agreed, on the 1st day of September, to surrender the place, on condition of being sent to Europe. The whole force, in Alexandria, at the period of this capitulation, was 10,528 men; the last of which sailed from the harbour on the 18th of September.

Thus, with a force apparently so inadequate to the accomplishment of the task which they were sent to perform, did the British army wrest this important country from their enemies, and restore it to their allies. Intelligence of the final conquest of Egypt by the English reached Paris, before the British cabinet could be apprized of it, through an inconsiderate permission, granted by General Hutchinson to the French commander, to dispatch a swift sailing vessel to apprize his government of the event, the moment the capitulation was signed. It is too much, perhaps, to expect the General and the politician to be united in the same person; but, without meaning to impute culpable negligence to the British General, it is impossi-

* Sir Ralph Abercrombie, K. B. &c. was the son of George Abercrombie, of Tillebodie, in Clackmannanshire, Esq. and was born about the year 1738, or according to his epitaph at Malta, in 1733. After receiving a liberal education, he entered by choice into the army, in 1756, and was advanced through the regular gradations to the rank of Major-General, which he attained in September, 1787. On the breaking out of the revolutionary war, in 1792-3, he was employed on the continent, and had the local rank of Lieutenant-General conferred upon him. In the action on the heights of Cateau, he commanded the advanced guard, and was wounded in the battle of Nimeguen. In 1795, he was created Knight of the Bath, and appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in the West Indies. On his arrival he obtained possession of the island of Grenada, and soon after of the settlements of Demarara and Essequibo. His next conquests were the islands of St. Lucia and St. Vincent; and in February, 1797, the Spanish island of Trinidad capitulated to him. On his return to Europe he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the Isle of Wight, from which he was, in 1798, elevated to the office of Governor of Fort Augustus and Fort St. George. Previously to this, as has been already seen, he was appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland; and, afterwards, in Scotland. When the enterprise against Holland was undertaken in 1799, Sir Ralph Abercrombie held a principal command under the Duke of York. A more favourable enterprise soon afforded him an opportunity of immortalizing his name. This was the expedition undertaken for the purpose of dispossessing the French of Egypt. But it was, as has been seen above, his destiny to fall in the moment of victory; and on his removal from the field of battle to the Foudroyant, he heroically exclaimed, "I can feel no pain, when I think on the bravery of those fine fellows whom I have just left."

† Sergeant Sinclair, of the 42d regiment, and Lutz claimed equally this trophy, and it appears that each merited the honour: Sergeant Sinclair first took it, but being ordered forward by an officer, he gave it to a private, who was killed. When the Minorca regiment advanced, the French had recovered their colours; but Lutz wrested them from the man who had possession of them, and then bayoneted him.

PLATE OF GENERAL ARTICULATE.

ble not to lament, that he did not take special care in the critical state in which Europe was then placed, that his own government should be first apprized of an event, of which the interest of their country required that they should receive the earliest possible information. In consequence of the knowledge thus obtained, the first consul of France derived an important advantage, in a treaty of peace which he hastily concluded with the Turks, and which contained many provisions highly favourable to the French, who had grossly violated every agreement which they had entered into with the Porte, and who had even invaded her territory in time of peace,—and greatly prejudicial to the English, who, from the important assistance which they had rendered to the Turks, and from their honourable and disinterested conduct towards them, on all occasions, were entitled to every return which justice, generosity, and gratitude, could suggest or confer. The evacuation of Egypt (the Turkish ambassador not knowing that it had actually taken place) was the consideration held out by the French, for the benefits which they claimed, and the privileges which they acquired, by this new treaty.

Whilst the possession of Egypt was uncertain, Buonaparte determined to point all his efforts against the only enemy either unsubdued or unhumbled by the arts and arms of France. Large bodies of troops were accordingly collected in the maritime departments of France; ships, guns, and flat-bottomed boats, were built and equipped; the ports of Belgium and of Holland were crowded with armed vessels; camps were formed at Bruges, Gravelines, Boulogne, Brest, Granville, Cherbourg, and St. Maloe's; and the deeds about to be performed by those armies which had forced the passage of the Bormida, the Danube, the Inn, and the Salza, and gained the battles of Marengo and Hohenlinden, were vaunted in the consular proclamations and manifestos of France. Buonaparte affected to consider the English as a nation rendered effeminate by wealth, and unwarlike by commerce; and it was confidently predicted that the steel of the French would prove more than a match for the gold of the Britons. On the other hand, the whole island was in motion; and one uniform spirit of patriotic defiance was breathed by the inhabitants. The volunteer battalions and companies were increased, a numerous and respectable body of yeomanry cavalry was formed, the fencible regiments were disciplined into a knowledge of the military art, and the militia, many regiments of which had served in Ireland, received a considerable augmentation by means of the supplementary levy. From the votes of supply for this year, it appears, that, including all orders and descriptions of men ready to act by sea and land, the amount approached to nearly half a million,* Buonaparte, surrounded by a brilliant assemblage of troops, affected to blend all the state of the ancient Kings of France with that of the Emperors of the west; being surrounded by numerous guards, attended by the prefects of the palace, and appearing on great occasions alone in the presence of the people. The Elector Palatine of Bavaria about this time negotiated a treaty, by which he renounced the duchies of Juliers, Deux Ponts, and their dependencies, together with the bailiwick of the Palatinate of the Rhine, situated upon the left bank of that river. The surrender of Alexandria, and the consequent evacuation of Egypt, as we have seen, produced a peace between France and the Ottoman Porte.

By a convention with the Pope, ratified on the 10th of September, Buonaparte was not only acknowledged to possess all the privileges of the ancient monarchy so far as concerned public worship, but new and essential immunities were obtained for the Gallican church. His Holiness agreed to procure the resignation of the prelates who had adhered to the old establishment, and the chief magistrate was to nominate to the vacant sees. A new formula of prayer was introduced; and the holy father covenanted in behalf of himself and his successors, that those who had acquired the alienated property of the church should not be disturbed. By a concordat, the apostolical and Roman faith was declared to be the religion of the state, and the Catholics were to pay one-tenth of their taxes to defray the expences of public worship.

The British fleets, squadrons, and detachments, whether employed for home defence, or occupied in distant quarters of the globe, distinguished themselves this year by their accustomed zeal and devotion in the cause of their country. In March, Admiral Duckworth made an easy capture of the Swedish Island of St. Bartholomew, as well as of the Danish settlements of St. Thomas and Santa Cruz, which were of course restored to those powers, in virtue of the treaty of St. Petersburgh. The islands of St. Martin and St. Eustatia were also reduced; while in the east, the Batavian settlement of Ternate, the chief of the Molucca islands, surrendered on the 21st of June, after a vigorous resistance, to a small squadron under the command of Captain Hayes. In the Mediterranean two severe actions took place; the former of which proved unfortunate. Admiral Sir James Saumarez commanded a squadron of ten ships of the line, which blockaded the port of Cadiz. Receiving intelligence that three French line of battle ships and a frigate were lying at anchor in the road of Algezira, under cover of the batteries on shore, he conceived the bold design of attacking them in that situation. On the 6th of July, he proceeded with six sail of the line, under a favourable breeze, in the sanguine hope of capturing the French ships; but on a sudden the wind failed, and the English squadron could not, with every effort, engage the enemy in a regular or close action. The Hannibal, Captain Ferris, in bearing up, unfortunately took the ground in a position where she lay exposed to a tremendous fire from one of the land batteries. Admiral Saumarez, perceiving the dangerous situation in which the Hannibal was placed, made an attempt to silence the battery, by running his own ship between her and the shore; but this manœuvre did not succeed, for being himself placed at a distance of only three cables' length from another battery, the Admiral was compelled to retire, and to his inexpressible chagrin, to leave the Hannibal a prey to the enemy: Captain Ferris, although at length forced to strike, maintained the contest with distinguished constancy, and suffered a loss of 143 men in killed and wounded, before he surrendered his vessel into the hands of the enemy. However, by the indefatigable exertions of the British officers and seamen, who received every assistance from the garrison of Gibraltar, the whole squadron, with the exception of the Pompée, was speedily refitted and ready for sea, when a new and more propitious opportunity occurred of distinguishing their valour. The three sail of French line of battle ships engaged in the late action had been reinforced by five more, under the command of Don Juan Joaquin de Moreno, as well as by a French seventy-four, carrying a broad pendant. These vessels, with the Hannibal, which was with some difficulty warped into deep water, and a number of frigates and gun-boats, got under weigh with an intention of returning to Cadiz safe, in consequence of their numbers, and assured, as they imagined, of an easy victory, in case of a contest with a detachment which had been so recently foiled. Notwithstanding the great inferiority of his force, Sir James Saumarez hoisted the signal for battle, and followed the enemy, who had just cleared Laboreta Point, at eight o'clock in the evening of the 13th of July. Captain Keates having received orders to attack the sternmost ship, and keep between the fleet and the shore, the Superb accordingly made sail, and began the engagement at eleven o'clock at night, by firing on several of the enemy's ships, which formed a cluster, and in consequence of the darkness engaged with each other through mistake. The Cæsar, in the course of a few minutes, began also to open on a Spanish three-decker that had hauled her wind; but the Spanish ship was soon after observed to be in flames, and shortly after ran on board another vessel of the same force, to which the conflagration extended with uncommon rapidity, so that, after the lapse of a short, but awful period, they both blew up. These vessels proved to be the San Herminigeldo, and the Real Carlos, each of 112 guns, and 1,250 men, the former carrying the Admiral's flag, and both of them officered from the noble families in Spain. The English commander, perceiving that these ships could present no formidable resistance during the rest of the action, passed on to the assistance of the Superb, Captain Keates, then engaged with the St. Antonio, of 74 guns, carrying the broad pendant of Commodore Le Roy, which had before been silenced, and now struck her colours. After the firing had ceased, it became so dark that none of the enemy's squadron were visible; the Cæsar, however, continued her course, during a heavy gale, in chase of the remainder of the fleet, and at the approach of the morning could only discover one French ship, which proved to be the Formidable, of 84 guns, endeavouring to reach the channel leading through the shoals of Conil. But as the wind suddenly failed at this moment, one ship alone was enabled to bring her to action; and Captain Hood, after a spirited engagement, had nearly silenced the enemy, when his mainmast, which had been wounded before, was unfortunately shot away, and a calm ensuing, the Formidable effected her escape into Cadiz. The Venerable soon after struck on a bank, and was for some time threatened with ship-wreck, but fortunately she was at length extricated from her perilous situation, with the loss of her masts only, and returned, with the fleet to Gibraltar. Thus ended an action in which the superiority of the enemy was immense; and Sir James Saumarez was gratified with the thanks of the two Houses of Parliament, and rewarded with a pension of twelve hundred pounds a year.*

The most interesting exploit of this campaign yet remains to be noticed. Lord Nelson, having collected a flotilla, determined to attack the enemy in their own ports, and thus put an end to the menace of invasion. He accordingly hoisted his flag on the 2d of August, as Vice-Admiral of the blue, on board the Medusa, and proceeded with two sail of the line, two frigates, and several smaller vessels, to Boulogne, where the French had assembled a great number of gun-boats, armed brigs, and lugger-rigged flats. Perceiving that twenty-four of these were anchored in a line in front of the harbour, a signal was hoisted, on which the bombs weighed with a favourable wind, and threw their shells with such effect, that in the course of a few hours three of the flats and brigs were sunk, and six driven on shore. Lord Nelson was of opinion that the remainder of the flotilla might be captured by a bold and well-concerted evolution, to be performed by the boats of his squadron. He accordingly directed the expedition to be undertaken on the night of the 15th of August, by five divisions, (one of which carried howitzers) under the command of five Captains (Somerville, Cotgrave, Parker, Jones, and Conn) of the royal navy. Having left the Medusa within half an hour of midnight, they immediately steered for the harbour's mouth, and the firing commenced before one, but owing to the darkness of the night, with the tide and half tide, the divisions separated; and from all not arriving at the same moment with Captain Parker, was to be attributed the want of success.†

Whilst every shore re-echoed with the thunder of hostility, the inhabitants of both France and England had become heartily tired of the war. For some time past an active intercourse had taken place between the two governments. Flags of truce and of defiance were actually displayed at the same time, and in the same strait; so that while Boulogne and Dunkirk were bombarded and blockaded by hostile squadrons, the ports of Dover and Calais were frequently visited by the packet-boats and the messengers of the courts of St. James's and the Thuilleries. The negociation had been carried on in London, between Lord Hawkesbury, on the one hand, and Louis William Otto, who had been some time resident in this country, as a Commissary for the exchange of prisoners, on the other; the former, by a departure from the established rules of diplomatic etiquette, having consented to reduce himself to a level with a private citizen of France. It had continued during the whole of the summer; and, in its progress, many impediments arose, and some curious discussions took place, relative to the Liberty of the Press in this country, which Buonaparte was fearful might be employed to delineate the hideous features of his own character, in the colours of truth. With every disposition to concede, as far as possible, the British Ministers made a firm stand at this point, and Lord Hawkesbury resisted, strongly and resolutely, every attempt to encroach on that freedom of discussion, to which much of the excellence of the British Constitution may fairly be ascribed. At length, the Cabinet of Paris having received Menou's dispatches from Egypt, hastened the conclusion of the business; and, on the first of October, the preliminaries were signed by Lord Hawkesbury and M. Otto. This intelligence was immediately communicated in a note to the Lord Mayor, and diffused general satisfaction throughout the whole kingdom. At the end of eleven days, the ratification of the preliminary treaty on the part of the first consul, was brought from Paris by Colonel Lauriston, who, as well as the French plenipotentiary, was drawn threw the streets of the metropolis in his carriage by the populace. By this treaty Great Britain restored to France and her allies every possession or colony taken from them during the war, with the exception of the Spanish Island of Trinidad, and the Dutch settlements at Ceylon. The Cape of Good Hope was to become a free port, and Malta was to be restored to the order, but under the express guarantee and protection of a third power, to be fixed upon in the definitive treaty. In order to bring that treaty to a speedy conclusion, Lord Cornwallis was dis-

* In the course of this year, Captain Rowley Bulteel, in the Belliqueux, with a convoy of East-Indiamen, which were mistaken by the enemy for men of war, captured the French frigates, La Concorde and La Medée, the former of forty-four and the latter of thirty-six guns, in the neighbourhood of Brazil, forming part of a squadron which had committed great depredations on the coast of Africa. The fleet under Vice-Admiral Rainier in the East Indies seized a number of valuable prizes, particularly two Dutch ships in the neighbourhood of Java. Captain T. Manby, in the Bourdelois, belonging to Rear-Admiral Duckworth's detachment in the West Indies, nearly about the same time dispersed a small armament fitted out by Victor Hughes for the purpose of intercepting the outward-bound convoy. In the Mediterranean an action singularly severe was fought on the 10th of February, between the Phœbe, Captain R. Barlow, and the French frigate L'Africaine, of forty-guns and 715 men, of whom many were soldiers bound for Egypt: the commander of the frigate, though incapable of contending with the British vessel, would not yield until his ship became a mere wreck, with five feet water in her hold; all her guns were also dismounted, and his decks crowded with the dying and the dead; the number of the latter amounted to 200, and the wounded to 143, while the loss on board the Phœbe amounted only to one killed and twelve wounded. Lord Cochrane, in the Speedy sloop, of fourteen four-pounders, and fifty-four men and boys, performed a brilliant exploit, by boarding and capturing the Spanish Zebeck frigate, of thirty-two guns, and 319 seamen and marines, off Barcelona. His Lordship also distinguished himself about the same time, in the same vessel, with Captain Pulling, of the Kangaroo, sloop of war, and after a spirited and successful attack on a convoy, anchored on the coast of Spain; on which occasion, a detachment from the British vessels landed and blew up the tower of Almarana.

† "The most astonishing bravery," says Lord Nelson, in a letter to Earl St. Vincent, dated August the 16th, "was evinced by many of our officers and men, and Captains Somerville, Cotgrave, and Parker, exerted themselves to the utmost." (Captain Jones, owing to the rapidity of the tide, was thrown to the westward of the line.) "Conn, in the command of the howitzer boats, did every thing that was possible; indeed, all behaved well, and it was their misfortune to be sent on a service in which the precautions of the enemy had rendered it impossible to succeed. We have lost," adds the Vice-Admiral, "many brave officers and men, one hundred and seventy-two killed and wounded. My gallant dear friend, Captain Parker, who was my aide-de-camp, had his thigh very much shattered; I have my fears for his life. The loss has been very heavy, and the object was great. The flotilla, brigs, and flats, were moored by the bottom to the shore and each other by chains; therefore, although several of them were carried, yet the very heavy fire of musketry from the shore which overlooked the flotilla, forced our people to desist, without being able, as I am told, to set them on fire." Captain Parker died of his wounds.

patched to France. Amiens was the scene of negociation, appointed by the First Consul; and his brother, Joseph Buonaparte, received the full power to treat with the British Plenipotentiary. In the course of the discussion which ensued, France, with her usual artifice, started fresh difficulties, and preferred fresh demands; which occasioned so much delay, that it was supposed by many, that war would be renewed. On the 25th of March, (1802) however, matters were finally arranged, and the seal was put to the treaty of Amiens; which differed but little from the preliminaries of London. Malta was to be garrisoned by Neapolitan troops, till such time as the Knights could form a sufficient force themselves, for the defence of the island, the independence of which was to be secured by France, Great Britain, Austria, Spain, Russia, and Prussia.*

* DEFINITIVE TREATY OF PEACE.

Between his Britannic Majesty on the one part; and the French Republic, his Majesty the King of Spain and the Indies, and the Batavian republic, on the other part.

HIS Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the First Consul of the French Republic, in the name of the French people, being animated with an equal desire to put an end to the calamities of war, have laid the foundation of peace, in the preliminary articles signed at London the 1st of October, 1801, (9th Vendemiaire, year 10.)

And as, by the 15th article of the said preliminaries, it has been stipulated, that plenipotentiaries should be named on each side, who should proceed to Amiens, for the purpose of conducting a definitive treaty, in concert with the allies of the contracting powers:

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland has named for his plenipotentiary the Marquis Cornwallis, Knight of the most illustrious Order of the Garter, Privy Counsellor to his Majesty, General of his armies, &c.; the First Consul of the French Republic, in the name of the French people, the Citizen Joseph Buonaparte, Counsellor of State; his Majesty the King of Spain and the Indies, and the government of the Batavian Republic, have named for their plenipotentiaries, videlicet, his Catholic Majesty, Don Joseph Nicholas d'Azara, his Counsellor of State, Knight of the Great Cross, of the Order of Charles III. ambassador extraordinary to the French Republic, &c.; and the government of the Batavian Republic, Roger John Schimmelpenninck, their Ambassador Extraordinary to the French Republic; who, after having communicated to each other their full powers, which are transcribed at the end of the present treaty, have agreed upon the following articles:

Art. I. There shall be peace, friendship, and good understanding, between his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, his heirs and successors, on the one part; and the French Republic, his Majesty the King of Spain, his heirs and successors, and the Batavian Republic, on the other part. The contracting parties shall give the greatest attention to maintain between themselves and their states a perfect harmony, and without allowing, on either side, any kind of hostilities, by sea or land, to be committed, for any cause, or under any pretence whatsoever.

They shall carefully avoid every thing which might hereafter affect the union happily re-established, and they shall not afford any assistance or protection, directly or indirectly, to those who should cause prejudice to any of them.

II. All the prisoners taken on either side, as well by land as by sea, and the hostages carried away, or given during the war, and to this day, shall be restored, without ransom, in six weeks at latest, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, and on paying the debts they have contracted during their captivity. Each contracting party shall respectively discharge the advances which have been made by any of the contracting parties, for the subsistence and maintenance of the prisoners in the countries where they have been detained. For this purpose a commission shall be appointed by agreement, which shall be specially charged to ascertain and regulate the compensation which may be due to either of the contracting powers. The time and place where the commissioners, who shall be charged with the execution of this article, shall assemble, shall also be fixed upon by agreement; and the said commissioners shall take into account the expences occasioned, not only by the prisoners of the respective nations, but also by the foreign troops, who, before they were made prisoners, were in the pay, or at the disposal of any of the contracting parties.

III. His Britannic Majesty restores to the French Republic, and her allies, namely, his Catholic Majesty and the Batavian Republic, all the possessions and colonies which belonged to them respectively, and which had been occupied or conquered by the British forces in the course of the war, with the exception of the island of Trinidad, and the Dutch possessions in the island of Ceylon.

IV. His Catholic Majesty cedes and guarantees, in full right and sovereignty, to his Britannic Majesty, the island of Trinidad.

V. The Batavian Republic cedes and guarantees, in full right and sovereignty, to his Britannic Majesty, all the possessions and establishments in the islands of Ceylon, which belonged, before the war, to the Republic of the United Provinces, or to their East-India Company.

VI. The Cape of Good Hope remains in full sovereignty to the Batavian Republic, as it was before the war.

The ships of every description belonging to the other contracting parties shall have the right to put in there, and to purchase such supplies as they may stand in need of, as heretofore, without paying any other duties than those to which the ships of the Batavian Republic are subjected.

VII. The territories and possessions of her most faithful Majesty are maintained in their integrity, such as they were previously to the commencement of the war.

Nevertheless, the limits of French and Portuguese Guiana shall be determined by the river Arawari, which falls into the ocean below North Cape, near the isle Neuve, and the island of Penitence, about a degree and one-third of north latitude. These limits shall follow the course of the river Arawari, from that of its mouth which is at the greatest distance from the North Cape to its source, and thence in a direct line from its source to the river Branco, towards the west. The northern bank of the river Arawari, from its mouth to its source, and the lands which are situated to the north of the line of the limits above fixed, shall consequently belong in full sovereignty to the French Republic. The southern bank of the said river from its source, and all the lands to the southward of the said line of demarkation, shall belong to her most faithful Majesty. The navigation of the river Arawari shall be common to both nations.

The arrangements which have taken place between the courts of Madrid and of Lisbon, for the settlement of their frontiers in Europe, shall however be executed, conformably to the treaty of Badajos.

VIII. The territories, possessions, and rights, of the Ottoman Porte, are hereby maintained in their integrity, such as they were previously to the war.

IX. The Republic of the Seven Islands is hereby acknowledged.

X. The islands of Malta, Gozo, and Comino, shall be restored to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, and shall be held by it upon the same conditions on which the Order held them previously to the war, and under the following stipulations:

1. The Knights of the Order, whose langues shall continue to subsist after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, are invited to return to Malta, as soon as that exchange shall have taken place. They shall there form a general chapter, and shall proceed to the election of a grand master, to be chosen from among the natives of those nations which preserve langues, if no such election have been already made since the exchange of the ratifications of the preliminary articles of peace. It is understood that an election which shall have been made subsequently to that period, shall alone be considered as valid, to the exclusion of every other which shall have taken place at any time previously to the said period.

2. The governments of Great Britain and the French Republic, being desirous of placing the Order of St. John, and the island of Malta, in a state of entire independence on each of those powers, do agree, that there shall be henceforth no English nor French langues; and that no individual belonging to either of the said powers shall be admissible into the order.

3. A Maltese langue shall be established, to be supported out of the land revenues and commercial duties of the island. There shall be dignities, with appointments, and an auberge, appropriated to this langue; no proofs of nobility shall be necessary for the admission of Knights of the said langue; they shall be competent to hold every office, and to enjoy every privilege, in the like manner as the Knights of the other langues. The municipal, revenue, civil, judicial, and other offices under the government of the island, shall be filled at least in the proportion of one half by native inhabitants of Malta Gozo, and Comino.

4. The forces of his Britannic Majesty shall evacuate the island and its dependencies within three months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if it can be done: at that period the island shall be delivered up to the Order in the state in which it now is, provided that the grand master, or commissioners fully empowered according to the statutes of the Order, be upon the island to receive possession; and that the force to be furnished by his Sicilian Majesty, as hereafter stipulated, shall be arrived there.

5. The garrison of the island shall, at all times, consist at least one half of native Maltese; and the other shall have the liberty of recruiting for the remainder of the garrison from the natives of those countries only that shall continue to possess langues. The native Maltese troops shall be officered by Maltese: the supreme command, of the garrison, as well as the appointment of the officers, shall be invested in the grand-master of the Order, and he shall not be at liberty to divest himself of it, even for a time, except in favour of a Knight of the Order, and in consequence of the opinion of the council of the Order.

6. The independence of the islands of Malta, Gozo, and Comino, as well as the present arrangement, shall be under the protection and guarantee of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia.

7. The perpetual neutrality of the Order and of the island of Malta, and its dependencies, is hereby declared.

8. The ports of Malta shall be open to the commerce and navigation of all nations, who shall pay equal and moderate duties. These duties shall be applied to the support of the Maltese langue, in the manner specified in paragraph 3, to that of the civil and military establishments of the island, and to that of a Lazaretto, open to all flags.

9. The Barbary States are excepted from the provisions of the two preceding paragraphs, until, by means of arrangement to be made by the contracting parties, the system of hostility which subsists between the said Barbary States, the Order of St. John, and the powers possessing langues or taking part in the formation of them, shall be terminated.

10. The Order shall be governed, both in spiritual and temporal matters, by the same statutes that were in force at the time when the Knights quitted the island, so far as the same shall not be derogated from by the present treaty.

11. The

Thus ended the revolutionary war, in the defeat of all the hopes and expectations which had been formed, of indemnity for the past, and of security for the future; and, in the accomplishment of all those gigantic plans of subversion and conquest, which had been conceived by the first founders of the French Republic; and pursued, with unremitting activity, by all her successive rulers. By the peace of Amiens, a great part of the Continent of Europe was laid prostrate at the feet of France; and French influence remained predominant from the German Ocean to the Bay of Naples. In short, Jacobinism triumphed; her child and champion "established his ascendancy;—her firmest advocates were honoured and rewarded;—and the stamp of success was given to her boldest projects. Not one of the objects which the Princes originally confederated against France professed to have in view, was attained. On the contrary, her power was extended, her territories were enlarged, her influence was increased, and her principles had surmounted every obstacle opposed to their progress. Her government, it is true, had assumed a new form, less terrific in appearance than the murderous system of Robespierre and his sanguinary associates, but more despotic in reality. A military despotism, formed out of the elements of Jacobinism, destroyed every vestige of civil liberty, and imposed the most galling and odious fetters on the minds, as well as the persons, of the people. England, indeed, had escaped the yoke to which the powers of the Continent had, in a greater or lesser degree, submitted. She had

11. The stipulations contained in paragraphs 3, 5, 7, 8. and 10, shall be converted into laws and perpetual statutes of the Order, in the customary manner. And the grand-master, (or, if he should not be in the island at the time of its restitution to the order, his representative) as well as his successors, shall be bound to make oath to observe them punctually.

12. His Sicilian Majesty shall be invited to furnish two thousand men, natives of his dominions, to serve as a garrison for the several fortresses upon the island. This force shall remain there for one year, from the period of the restitution of the island to the Knights; after the expiration of which term, if the order of St. John shall not, in the opinion of the guaranteeing power, have raised a sufficient force to garrison the island and its dependencies, in the manner proposed in paragraph 5, the Neapolitan troops shall remain, until they shall be relieved by another force judged to be sufficient by the said powers.

13. The several powers specified in paragraph 6, videlicet, Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia, shall be invited to accede to the present arrangement.

XI. The French forces shall evacuate the kingdom of Naples, and the Roman territory; the English forces shall in like manner evacuate Porto Ferrajo, and generally all the ports and islands which they may occupy in the Mediterranean, or in the Adriatic.

XII. The evacuations, cessions, and restitutions, stipulated for by the present treaty, except where otherwise expressly provided for, shall take place in Europe within one month, in the continent and seas of America and of Africa in three months, and in the continent and seas of Asia within six months, after the ratification of the present definitive treaty.

XIII. In all the cases of restitution agreed upon by the present treaty, the fortifications shall be delivered up in the state in which they may have been at the time of the signature of the preliminary treaty; and all the works which shall have been constructed since the occupation shall remain untouched.

It is farther agreed, that, in all the cases of cession stipulated, there shall be allowed to the inhabitants, of whatever condition or nation they may be, a term of three years, to be computed from the notification of this present treaty, for the purpose of disposing of their property acquired and possessed either before or during the war; in which term of three years they may have the free exercise of their religion and enjoyment of their property.

The same privilege is granted in the countries restored to all those, whether inhabitants or others, who shall have made therein any establishments whatsoever during the time when those countries were in the possession of Great Britain.

With respect to the inhabitants of the countries restored or ceded, it is agreed, that none of them shall be prosecuted, disturbed, or molested, in their persons or properties, under any pretext, on account of their conduct or political opinions, or of their attachment to any of the contracting powers, nor on any other account, except that of debts contracted to individuals, or on account of acts posterior to the present treaty.

XIV. All sequestrations imposed by any of the parties on the funded property, revenues, or debts, of whatever description, belonging to any of the contracting powers, or to their subjects or citizens, shall be taken off immediately after the signature of this definitive treaty. The decision of all claims brought forward by individuals, the subjects or citizens of any of the contracting powers respectively, against individuals, subjects, or citizens, of any of the others, for rights, debts, property, or effects whatsoever, which, according to received usages and the law of nations, ought to revive at the period of peace, shall be heard and decided before competent tribunals; and in all cases, prompt and ample justice shall be administered in the countries where the claims were made.

XV. The fisheries on the coast of Newfoundland, and of the adjacent islands, and of the Gulf St. Lawrence, are replaced on the same footing on which they were previously to the war; the French fishermen and the inhabitants of St. Pierre and Miquelon, shall have the privilege of cutting such wood as they may stand in need of in the bays of Fortune and Despair, for the space of one year from the date of the notification of the present treaty.

XVI. In order to prevent all causes of complaint and dispute which may arise on account of prizes which may have been made at sea after the signature of the preliminary articles, it is reciprocally agreed that the vessels and effects which may have been taken in the British Channel, and in the North Sea, after the space of twelve days, to be computed from the exchange of the ratifications of the said preliminary articles, shall be restored on each side; that the term shall be one month from the British Channel and the North Seas, as far as the Canary islands inclusively, whether in the ocean or in the Mediterranean; two months from the said Canary Islands as far as the equator; and, lastly, five months in all other parts of the world, without any exception, or any more particular description of time or place.

XVII. The ambassadors, ministers, and other agents of the contracting powers, shall enjoy respectively, in the states of the said powers, the same rank, privileges, prerogatives, and immunities, which public agents of the same class enjoyed previously to the war.

XVIII. The branch of the house of Nassau, which was established in the republic, formerly called the republic of the United Provinces, and now the Batavian republic, having suffered losses there, as well in private property as in consequence of the change of constitution adopted in that country, an adequate compensation shall be procured for the said branch of the house of Nassau for the said losses.

XIX. The present definitive treaty of peace is declared common to the sublime Ottoman Porte, the ally of his Britannic Majesty; and the Sublime Porte shall be invited to transmit its act of accession thereto with the shortest delay possible.

XX. It is agreed, that the contracting parties shall, on requisitions made by them respectively, or by their ministers or officers duly authorized to make the same, deliver up to justice persons accused of crimes of murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy, committed within the jurisdiction of the requiring party, provided that this shall be done only when the evidence of the criminality be so authenticated, as that the laws of the country where the persons so accused shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been there committed. The expences of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition. It is understood that this article does not regard in any manner crimes of murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy, committed antecedently to the conclusion of this definitive treaty.

XXI. The contracting parties promise to observe sincerely and bona fide all the articles contained in the present treaty, and they will not suffer the same to be infringed, directly or indirectly, by their respective subjects or citizens; and the said contracting parties generally and reciprocally guarantee to each other all the stipulations of the present treaty.

XXII. The present treaty shall be ratified by the contracting parties in thirty days, or sooner, if possible, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in due form at Paris.

In witness whereof, we, the underwritten plenipotentiaries, have signed with our hands, and in virtue of our respective full powers, the present definitive treaty, and have caused our respective seals to be affixed thereto.

Separate Article.

It is agreed, that the omission of some titles, which may have taken place in the present treaty, shall not not be prejudicial to the powers or to the persons concerned.

It is further agreed, that the English and French languages, made use of in all the copies of the present treaty, shall not form an example, which may be alledged or quoted as a precedent, or in any manner prejudice the contracting powers whose languages have not been used; and that for the future, what has been observed, and ought to be observed, with regard to, and on the part of, powers which are in practice and possession of giving and receiving copies of like treaties in any other languages, shall be conformed with; the present treaty having nevertheless the same force and virtue as if the aforesaid practice had been therein observed.

In witness whereof, we, the underwritten plenipotentiaries of his Britannic Majesty, of the French Republic, of his Catholic Majesty, and of the Batavian Republic, have signed the present separate article, and have caused our respective seals to be affixed thereto.

secured her constitution and her government from the effects of that revolutionary poison which had destroyed so many ancient institutions, and which had subverted so many thrones. She had even enlarged her dominions, by the acquisition of an important settlement in Asia, which afforded her the long sought for advantage of a safe and commodious harbour for her effects in the Eastern Ocean; and by an island in the West-Indies, of consequence more from its relative situation to the Spanish Main, than from its produce or probable revenue. She had also kept inviolate her faith with her allies, and had preserved her national character pure amidst surrounding corruption. Here ends the catalogue of her advantages.* In every other point she had completely failed. None of the objects which she had pursued in common with the other powers of Europe, had she been able to attain. Her failure, indeed, was not owing to any defect either of wisdom in her councils, or of vigour in her efforts. She had bounteously opened her treasures to those who fought for the preservation of social order, against revolutionary anarchy;—she had made every exertion which her undaunted spirit could suggest, and her ample resources command. And, had her allies but displayed equal wisdom, resolution, and vigour, their united efforts must have been crowned with success.—All ranks and descriptions of men, however, hailed the return of peace with rapture; bonfires, illuminations, and public entertainments exhibiting but a faint expression of the general joy.

* In closing this portion of our history, it may be remarked, that, in the progress, and by the termination of the war, France had obtained every object which could be coveted by a great people, save that for which she originally affected to contend—her own liberty. The history of France, from the dawn of the revolution to the ratification of the treaty of peace at Amiens, presents several grand epochs, all of which interest the community, and afford materials for the pen of the historian, but each varies in shape and feature from that which precedes, as well as that which follows it. The first period exhibits a numerous body of men, long retained in thraldom by the despotism of their government, arousing from the slumber of ages, indignantly bursting their manacles, and declaring themselves free. The monarchs of the continent, decked in the recent spoils of violated Poland, immediately associate, under pretence of assisting a prince more gentle, more amiable, and consequently more beloved, than themselves; a war ensues, the schock of arms takes place, and the forest of Argonne, and the heights of Valmy, decide a campaign pregnant with the fate of France and of Europe. A sudden transition takes place, and all the horrors of a civil war seemed fated to accompany all the disasters of a foreign contest. A sovereign, revered as a martyr by one part of the nation, and detested as a traitor by another, perishes by a violent death; monarchy itself is annihilated with Louis XVI. and a republic proclaimed upon his tomb. The founders of the commonwealth are doomed, to perish in their turn, and that too, though the special order of Providence, by the very instrument employed for the decapitation of the Bourbon king. Robespierre, adored by the populace during his life, and Marat, deified after his assassination, are next wafted along the sanguinary torrent to the possession of supreme power, and rule for a while by means of spies and executioners—of terror and of blood. A less unfavourable epoch next presents itself, and the directorial government promises to repair the errors and the crimes of the tyrants. Immense armies take the field, decisive battles are fought, great victories achieved, and Germany is prepared for dismemberment, and Italy for subjugatien. At length a military adventurer arises and conquers, first for the republic, and then for himself. In consequence of a peace, as brilliant as the war which he achieves, he seems to consider Europe too small a theatre for his ambition; and arriving with a powerful fleet and army in Africa, aspires to imitate the Macedonian hero, and finish his career of conquests by the subjugation of Asia. After gaining many victories over the degenerate Turks and the warlike Mamelukes, he at length experiences a repulse before an ill-fortified city garrisoned by the half disciplined troops of a rebel pacha, but led by an European chief—a Christian Knight—a new Cœur de Lion—and is reduced to the mortifying necessity of treating with the Ottoman Porte, whose confidence he had betrayed, and whose dominions he had invaded. Fearful of remaining uncertain of his destiny, he leaves Egypt and his army by stealth; arriving suddenly in Europe, takes advantage of the corrupt and feeble government of those who happen to be invested with the administration of public affairs; surrounds himself with an ambitious soldiery, and uniting the wily policy of Monk with the decisive conduct and victorious careeer of Cromwell, becomes sovereign under the name of consul. Not yet secure on his recently acquired elevation, he flies into Italy by a route deemed impassable, again overwhelms veteran armies and ancient states, once more erects new commonwealths, renders his foes and his confederates tributary, extends the limits of France, and of his own power, and is hailed, first as the pacificator of the continent, and then as the transquillizer of Europe. Such is a brief epitome of a revolution which commenced with the mild despotism of a French King, and issued in the accession of a military chieftain; who, after a long series of successful crime and sanguinary glory, was destined to fall unpitied and despised!

It may further be remarked, that, in the month of December, 1801, while the negociations at Amiens were yet pending, a grand consulta assembled in the city of Lyons, consisting of four hundred and fifty persons, convoked by the authority of the Cisalpine republic, and chosen from her citizens. The object of the meeting was to determine upon a permanent constitution for the new republic; and early in the year 1802, the first consul arrived at Lyons, to assist in person at the deliberations. A committee of thirty members was appointed to prepare the business; and on the 25th of January, the new plan of government was presented, and received the immediate and unanimous sanction of the whole body. An essential part of this plan was to vest the supreme magistracy in the hands of the first consul, who, on the following day, repairing to the hall of the consulta, in regal state, formally declared his acceptance of the honour thus conferred upon him. The appellation of the Cisalpine was changed by acclamation to that of the Italian Republic, of which Buonaparte was declared president for ten years. But the term republic was a mere figure of speech, for the form of government, suggested by the committee, and adopted by the assembly, was in reality an absolute monarchy, the whole of the executive, and a principal part of the legislative power being vested in the first consul. While the personal authority of the head of the French government was thus extended, and while in the Italian republic a new satellite was ordained to move within the influence of French attraction, France itself received a considerable accession of territory by the acquisition of Piedmont and Parma, which territories were, by a decree of annexation, added to the territory of France, and constituted an integral part of the republic. The famous convention, known by the name of the Concordat, concluded between the first consul and the Pope,(a) received, in the month of April, 1802, its final ratification from the French legislative body, by a majority of two hundred and twenty-eight to twenty-one voices. And this imposing event, in conjunction with the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and France, was celebrated with extraordinary magnificence by a solemn Te Deum, at the Cathedral church of Notre Dame, and grand illuminations in the city and vicinity of Paris. Cardinal Caprara, legate from his holiness, was escorted to the Thuilleries by an honorary guard of cavalry, and the crosier was borne before him to the palace. In his speech to the first consel he complimened him in the following words: "The arm that gained battles, and signed peace with all nations, restores splendour to the temples of the true God, re-builds his altars, and re-establishes his worship." The first consul, in reply, extolled the apostolical virtues of his eminence, and expressed his own satisfaction at this "new triumph of christianity." At Rome also high mass was performed, on Ascension Day, at the church of St. Jean de Lateran, by the pope in person, accompanied by every demonstration of joy, for the restoration of the Gallican church. Nor was it without reason that the sovereign pontiff, who scarcely two years before had been in a state of melancholy exile, exulted in the happy change in his fortunes. With the pope, the college of cardinals, the members of which had wandered over Europe in extreme distress, seeking in vain for some safe asylum, were reinstated in their thrones and palaces.

(a) The Concordat, which ordained that the Roman Catholic religion should be the established religion of France; guaranteed universal liberty of conscience to the French people of every persuasion. The hierarchy of the catholic church of France was to consist of ten archbishops, and fifty bishops, the former to enjoy a fixed annual revenue of fifteen thousand francs, (625*l.* sterling) and the latter a revenue of ten thousand francs. The parish priests were divided into two classes for the larger and the smaller parishes. The salary of the first class was not to exceed 15,000 francs 615*l.* nor that of the second 1000 francs, or 410*l.* The archbishops and bishops were to be nominated by the first consul, and afterwards confirmed by the pope. And the church relinquished all claims to its confiscated revenues and domains. The different protestant churches were established on the same political model; none but Frenchmen were permitted to exercise the functions of an ecclesiastic, either in the catholic or protestant churches; and no person could be elected a minister or pastor of any protestant church, who had not studied a fixed period in one of the French seminaries appointed for that purpose.

BOOK XXXI.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE III. FROM THE PEACE OF AMIENS, IN 1801, TO THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF THE BOURBON DYNASTY, AND THE GENERAL SETTLEMENT OF EUROPE, IN 1816.

32. GEORGE III.

A. D. 1801.] THE 29th of October, the second session of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland was opened by the King in person, who in a speech from the throne announced the favourable conclusion of the negociation begun during the last session of Parliament. His Majesty at the same time declared his satisfaction, that the difference which at that time existed with the northern powers, had been adjusted by a convention with the Emperor of Russia, to which the Kings of Denmark and of Sweden had expressed their readiness to accede, and by which "the essential rights for which we contended were secured." He then proceeded to state, that "preliminaries of peace had also been ratified between himself and the French Republic; and he trusted that this important arrangement, while it manifested the justice and moderation of his views, would also be found conducive to the substantial interests of this country, and honourable to the British character." In the Upper House, the address was moved by Lord Bolton; and the Duke of Bedford, in a speech which contained much censure of the late, and praise of the present administration, declared his cordial concurrence in the address, which was agreed to, without a dissentient voice.

In the Lower House, Mr. Fox expressed the same sentiments of approbation respecting the peace, in which he was warmly seconded by Mr. Pitt, who described the peace as glorious and honourable. On the other hand, Mr. Windham, the late Secretary at War, avowed his entire disapprobation of the preliminary treaty recently signed with France, and declared himself to be a solitary mourner in the midst of public rejoicings. In signing that treaty he thought that his honourable friends, the present ministers, had signed the death-warrant of the country. Mr. Sheridan, adverting to the terms in which Mr. Pitt had spoken of the peace, said that he could not agree that the conditions were glorious and honourable. It was, in his opinion, a peace of which every one was glad, but no one proud. The motion was finally carried with the same unanimity as in the Lords.

The subject of the preliminary treaty was taken formally into consideration by the Lords, on the 3d of November, and a decided opposition to the terms of the peace, was expressed by the Earls Spencer, Caernarvon, and Fitzwilliam, the Marquis of Buckingham, Lord Grenville, and the Bishop of St. Asaph. The treaty was defended by the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Bedford, the Earls of Moira, Westmoreland, and St. Vincent, Lords Hobart and Pelham, and the Bishop of London; and the address was carried by 114 against 10.

On the same day, a similar address was moved in the House of Commons; which, after considerable discussion, was agreed to, without a division.

On the 13th of November, the articles of the treaty with Russia having been laid before the House of Peers, the Earl of Darnley moved an address of thanks and approbation to the throne. This address was vehemently opposed by Lord Grenville, who condemned the treaty in almost all its provisions; and, from the tenor of his Lordship's remarks, it was obvious that no accommodation with the northern powers could have taken place, under the administration which had recently been dissolved. The question was carried in both Houses without a division.

When Parliament assembled, after the recess, the Chancellor of the Exchequer called the attention of the House to certain papers before them, relative to the civil list, by which it appeared, that the pecuniary affairs of the sovereign were again deeply in arrears; and a committee was appointed to examine the accounts now presented to the House. In the course of the discussion, Mr. Manners Sutton, Solicitor to the Prince of Wales, advanced a claim of right on the part of the Prince against the crown, or rather against the public, for the amount of the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall, received during his minority, and applied to the use of the civil list, which must otherwise have been supplied from other sources. The aggregate of the sums so received, on an accurate estimate, appeared to be little less than 400,000*l*. Mr. Fox declared strongly in favour of the equity of this claim, but admitted that the sums voted for the payment of the Prince's debts ought to be deducted from the balance accruing to the Prince. On the 29th of March, the report of the committee was taken into consideration, when it appeared that a debt amounting to no less than 990,000*l*. had been contracted since the passing of Mr. Burke's reform bill, exclusive of the arrears discharged in the years 1784 and 1786, and that since that time the provisions of the bill had been wholly neglected. After a long and animated discussion, this sum was voted by the House: but the Chancellor of the Exchequer allowed that measures ought to be taken to prevent in future any such accumulation of debt.—Two days after, Mr. Manners Sutton brought forward the question of the claim of the Prince of Wales to the arrears of the revenues arising from the Duchy of Cornwall, and concluded with moving for the appointment of a committee to inquire what sums were due to his Royal Highness from that quarter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer considered it as inconsistent with his duty to concur in this motion. As to the legal question, he did not pretend to decide upon it; but he thought the discussion ought not to be entertained in that House; not at least till it appeared in proof, that on application for redress, supposing the wrong to exist, relief could not be obtained elsewhere. He concluded by moving the order of the day, which was carried by 160 against 103.*

On the 29th of March, the Chancellor of the Exchequer

* On the 28th of January this year, expired, after a long and painful illness, John Fitzgibbon, Earl of Clare, and Lord High Chancellor of Ireland. This nobleman possessed, from situation and character, a powerful ascendancy over the affairs of that country at a most critical period of its history. In the elevated and arduous situation of Lord Chancellor, to which he was advanced in the year 1789, he discharged chequer gave notice of his intention to repeal the tax imposed by the late minister upon income. Mr. Addington acknowledged the burthen of the tax to be very grievous; though the necessities of the state had rendered its adoption necessary; but as this impost was originally proposed as a war-tax, it should cease with the occasion that had given it birth. On the 5th of April, the minister brought forward his plan of finance for the year. The income-tax had been mortgaged by Mr. Pitt, for the sum of 56,445,000*l.* three per cents, for which the present minister, in consequence of the repeal of this tax, was obliged to make provision. The loan for Great Britain he stated at 23,000,000*l.*; the capital in the different funds, created by the conversion of 8,500,000*l.* of exchequer bills into stock, previously to the Christmas recess, was 11,238,062*l.* and the aggregate sum for which interest was to be provided, appeared to be no less than 97,934,137*l.* the interest of which was stated at 3,162,000*l.* To defray this enormous demand, very heavy additional duties were imposed on beer, malt, and hops. A considerable increase was also made to the assessed taxes; and the last article to which ministers had recourse at this crisis, was a tax on imports and exports, being a modification of the convoy duty. The produce of the new duties combined he estimated at 4,000,000*l.* an excess which compensated for the deficiency of divers of the taxes imposed in the course of the war. In the progress of the business of the revenue, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed and carried into effect several important alterations in the sinking fund bills of Mr. Pitt.*

The Chancellor of the Irish Exchequer soon after brought forward the business of finance relative to the revenue of that kingdom. It appeared, from the statement presented to the House, that the debt of Ireland had arisen, within the last ten years, from 2,300,000*l.* to 36,000,000*l.* paying an interest for the most part of six per cent. The deficiency of ways and means, when compared with the supplies, was at 1,660,000*l.* which sum he proposed to raise by loan, in addition to a former loan of 2,000,000*l.* which the contractors for the English loan had agreed to furnish upon the same terms. Mr. Corry at the same time proposed several new taxes, necessary to defray the interest of these new loans, which were agreed to.

Mr. Addington moved (April 9) for a bill, to continue, till the 1st of March, 1813, the restrictions on payments in specie at the bank, a motion that was carried with little opposition. Three days afterwards, a vote of censure on the former administration was formally moved by Sir Francis Burdett; but, as a vote of censure upon that body, by the present House, would have been a sentence of self condemnation, there was little propriety in the motion, and still less prospect of its success. Lord Belgrave moved, as an amendment, "that the thanks of this House be returned to his Majesty's late ministers, for their eminent services, in the exertions they made to preserve to us unimpaired the blessings we enjoyed during the whole of the late contest." The speaker having suggested the irregularity of this proceeding, the motion of amendment was, at the request of Mr. Pitt himself, withdrawn; and the original proposition was negatived, by a majority of 246 to 39. A motion, yet more strange and absurd, was made on the 7th of May following, by Mr. Nichol, for an address to his Majesty, thanking him for the removal of the Right Hon. William Pitt from his councils. Lord Belgrave, as before, moved an amendment, expressive of the high approbation of that House respecting the character and conduct of the late minister and his colleagues. Mr. Fox declared himself unable to vote either for the original motion, or for the amendment. He could not vote thanks for the dismission of the late minister, till that dismission was ascertained; and this was a matter of doubt, as it was alledged by Mr. Pitt and his friends, that he was not dismissed, but voluntarily resigned, from inability to realize his plan of Catholic emancipation. The motion of Lord Belgrave was carried by a majority of more than four to one; and also a second motion, by Sir Henry Mildmay, "that the thanks of the House be given to the Right Honourable William Pitt," by 211 against 52.

These attacks on the character of Mr. Pitt seemed to increase his popularity. His birth-day was celebrated in the city of London with great enthusiasm. Earl Spencer, late First Lord of the Admiralty, presided in the chair, and in his glowing admiration of Mr. Pitt, gave as a toast to the company met to celebrate his birth: "The pilot who weathered the storm."

On the 13th of May, the grand debate relative to the definitive treaty of peace came on in both Houses of Parliament, when its stipulations and provisions were attacked and defended with more than ordinary ability. Lord Grenville, in particular, concluded a most severe and elaborate investigation of the terms of the treaty, by moving that an humble address should be presented to his Majesty, acknowledging his Majesty's prerogative to make peace and war, but declaring that it was impossible for the House to see without alarm the circumstances that had attended the conclusion of the present treaty, by which sacrifices had been made on the part of this country without any corresponding concessions on the part of France: that in the moment of peace France had exhibited indubitable proofs of the most ambitious projects; that these considerations imposed on his Majesty's government the necessity of adopting charged the duties of his office with a manly decision, and commanding ability, that extorted the applause of his political adversaries. The Earl was succeeded in the Chancellorship of Ireland by Sir John Mitford, speaker of the English House of Commons. Upon him the title of Lord Redesdale was conferred; and the speaker's chair was filled by Charles Abbot, Esq. a lawyer of eminence and activity in business, and who had the merit of possessing an intimate acquaintance with the forms, usages, and customs of the House. Another national loss was shortly afterwards sustained by the death of Francis, Duke of Bedford, who, after an illness of a few days' duration, died at Woburn Abbey, on the 2d of March, not having completed the thirty-seventh year of his age. An admirable eulogy upon his character was delivered in the House of Commons, by his friend Mr. Fox.

Nearly at the same period, died the Chief Justice of England, Lloyd, Lord Kenyon. This noble judge, was warm in his temper, honest in his intentions, learned in his profession, and impartial in his administration of public justice. His judicial attainments were great, and upon them he wisely sought to build his fame. He was the advocate of virtue, and the inflexible punisher of vice, however great or powerful the offender. He was succeeded by the Attorney-General, Edward Law, a distinguished lawyer, who was created on his promotion to the chief-justiceship, a peer of the realm, under the title of Lord Ellenborough.

* The last or new fund, provided for liquidating the debt contracted since the year 1786, was much larger than the original fund established for the liquidation of the old debt, contracted before that period. These two funds the minister proposed to consolidate, and to perpetuate, till the whole of the debt, both old and new, should be completely liquidated. The original fund had now arisen to 2,534,187*l.* and the new to 3,275,143*l.* making together 5,809,330*l.* The debt contracted previously to the year 1786, amounted to something more than 259,000,000*l.* and the new debt amounted to nearly 300,000,000*l.* something less than 40,000,000*l.* having been redeemed by the old, and upwards of 20,000,000*l.* by the operation of the new fund. The whole of the existing funded debt, including the loan of the present year, was consequently about 540,000,000*l.* the interest amounted annually to the vast sum of upwards of 17,000,000*l.* This amazing debt would, nevertheless, by the wonder-working operation of the sinking fund appropriated to its liquidation, supposing that fund improved at the average interest of four per cent. per annum only, be completely discharged in the comparatively short period of thirty-four years. The Sinking or Consolidated Fund was first established in its present form by Mr. Pitt, in the year 1786, but the public are indebted to Dr. Price, for the foundation upon which this pillar to public credit was erected. The fund in question is formed by the appropriation of one million a year, which is regularly set apart for the liquidation of the national debt; and to which are added such government, temporary, and life annuities, as may fall in during each year. These sums constitute a principal, which, being placed at compound interest, and suffered to accumulate, had, as early as the year 1802, extinguished nearly sixty millions of the public debt. "A nation, when it applies the income of such a fund to current expences rather than the redemption of its debts, chooses to lose the benefit of compound interest, in order to avoid paying simple interest—and the loss in this case is equal to the difference between the increase of money at compound and simple interest. The following calculation will shew what that difference is:—One penny put out at our Saviour's birth, to five per cent. compound interest, would, in the year 1791, have increased to a greater sum than would be contained in three hundred millions of earths, all of solid gold! but if put out to simple interest, it would, in the same time, have amounted to no more than seven shillings and sixpence! All governments that alienate funds destined for reimbursements, choose to improve money in the last rather than in the first of these ways." "Price on Public Credit."

adopting measures of precaution; and that, whilst that House relied on his Majesty's wisdom to be watchful of the power of France, they thought it necessary to assure him of their ready and firm support in resisting every encroachment on the rights of the British empire. The treaty was censured also by the Duke of Richmond, Earl Darnley, and Lord Caernarvon; and defended by Lords Auckland, Pelham, and Hobart, the Lord Chancellor, and the Earls of Westmoreland and Roslyn. The motion of Lord Grenville was at length negatived by 122 against 16. On the same day, the terms of the definitive treaty underwent a discussion equally animated in the House of Commons. Mr. Windham, in a speech of peculiar energy, which occupied upwards of three hours in the delivery, attacked the stipulations of the treaty in all their parts; concluding by moving an address similar to that proposed in the House of Peers by Lord Grenville. The terms of the peace were strenuously defended by Lord Hawkesbury, Mr. Addington, and others. The debate was prolonged to a very late hour—the Lords Temple and Folkestone, Mr. Thomas Grenville, and others of that party, passionately inveighing against the terms of the peace, which were on the other hand defended by the Whigs, though on grounds considerably different from those taken by ministers. Mr. Sheridan closed the debate with a speech of great animation. He remarked that the discussion of the necessary, though disgraceful treaty of peace, furnished the best defence of the conduct of those who had uniformly opposed the war. For his part he supported the peace because he supposed it the best that ministers could obtain. Their predecessors had left them to choose between an expensive, bloody, fruitless war, and a hollow, perilous peace. For the attainment of what object or purpose, Mr. Sheridan inquired, did we go to war?—To prevent French aggrandizement. Have we done that?—No. We were at least to rescue Holland. Is that accomplished?—No. But the recovery of Flanders and Brabant, we pronounced a sine qua non of peace. Are they recovered? No. Then came security and indemnity. Are they obtained?—No. The late minister told us, that the example of a jacobin government in Europe, founded on the ruins of a holy altar, and the tomb of a martyred monarch, was a spectacle so dreadful and infectious to Christendom, that we could never be safe while it existed, and it was our duty to put forth our last effort for its destruction. For these fine words, which had at last given way to "security and indemnity," we had sacrificed nearly two hundred thousand lives, and expended three hundred millions of money—and had gained Ceylon and Trinidad, which might henceforth be named the Indemnity and Security Islands. He admitted the splendid talents of the late minister, but he had misapplied them in the government of this country. He had augmented our debt, diminished our population, abridged our privileges, and had done more to strengthen the power of the crown at the expense of the constitution than any minister who had ever conducted the affairs of this country. The House at length divided on Mr. Windham's address, when the majority in favour of the treaty amounted to 276 against 20. On the 28th of June, the last day of the session, the new speaker presented the money bills to his Majesty, and on the day following Parliament was dissolved by proclamation.*

A. D. 1803.] Already the feverish peace, or rather the uncertain truce, which had been concluded at Amiens, was rapidly drawing to a close. It was, indeed, easily perceived, by those intelligent Englishmen, who had recently visited France, that nothing was farther from the wish and disposition of Buonaparte than to maintain a state of real peace and cordial harmony with Great Britain. He never could forgive the noble opposition which she had made to the revolutionary power of France; he considered the freedom of her constitution as a libel on the galling despotism which he had established in his new empire; and the liberty of her press, through the medium of which the most bitter truths were conveyed to his irritable mind, was a source of constant disquiet, and of incessant complaint, to one whose conscience acknowledged that his crimes set the powers of exaggeration at defiance. In rapid progress he had risen to the summit of supreme power, and a trembling people had recently conferred on him the Consulate for life.† But the extent of his authority at home only served to render him more impatient of contradiction abroad; and, as he had succeeded in subduing, by military terror, all opposition in his own territories, he had the presumption to imagine that he could as easily silence the voice of reproach in foreign countries. The success, indeed, which had attended all his nefarious attempts, in the different states of the Continent, seemed to justify this opinion. He had brought his negotiations in Germany, consequent on the peace of Luneville, to a successful termination; and, having rendered Russia and Prussia the simple tools of his power,

* During this session the sum of 10,500*l.* was voted to Dr. Edward Jenner, for the promulgation of his invaluable discovery of the system of vaccine inoculation, by which it was hoped ultimately to extirpate the small pox. A reward of 1,200*l.* was also voted to Mr. Henry Greathead, for the invention of the life boat, by which it was said that the lives of five hundred seamen had been saved in one year. The sum of 5000*l.* was also voted to Dr. James Carmichael Smyth, for his discovery of the nitrous fumigation, for preventing the progress of contagious disorders—a process which had been introduced into the navy and army hospitals with the most beneficial effects.

† On the 6th of May, (1802) the definitive treaty of Amiens was presented to the tribunate, on which occasion a proposition was made in that assembly to confer some striking mark of the public gratitude on "the great pacificator." This proposal was unanimously agreed to, and having received the ready concurrence of the other constituent bodies, the senate, on the 8th of the same month, decreed, that this mark of gratitude ought to be the re-election of Buonaparte to the consular dignity for ten years succeeding the term for which he had been already chosen. The first consul, in imitation of the first Roman emperor, when this proposal was communicated to him, declared, "that the interests of his glory, and of his happiness, suggested that the termination of his public life should be the moment that the peace of the world was proclaimed; the glory and happiness of an individual, however, must be silent when the interest of the state and the voice of the public call upon him." "But," added he, "it was the suffrages of the people that invested me with the chief magistracy, and I shall not consider myself sure of still possessing their confidence, if the act for retaining me in that situation be not ratified by the public voice.—In the three last years fortune has smiled on the republic; but, (said he in conclusion, and in terms almost prophetic) "fortune is inconstant, and how many men has she loaded with her favours who have afterwards outlived them!" In compliance with the wish of the first consul, registers were opened in the different departments for inscribing the suffrages of the citizens on this subject; but as a full indemnity for this condescension, the question was, in the mean time, materially changed, and in the new form it stood—"Shall Buonaparte be elected Consul for life?" A second question was in a short time subjoined—"Shall Buonaparte be invested with the power of naming his successor?" Both questions, by dint of artifice and terror, were carried by the immense majority of 3,577,259 citizens, who voted in the affirmative, while only 9,074 ventured to negative these daring innovations. In the tribunate, one dissentient voice alone was heard—that of the republican minister at war, Carnot. On the third of August, the act of the senate was presented to the first consul, who, on receiving this distinguished mark of public confidence, thus addressed the senate—"The life of a citizen belongs to his country; the French people wish that the whole of mine should be devoted to them. I obey their will. Content with having been called by the order of Him from whom all things emanate, to bring back upon the earth justice, order, and equality, I shall hear my last hour sound without regret, and without an undue anxiety about the opinion of future generations." The event was celebrated with great magnificence in Paris, and addresses of congratulations poured in from every part of the republic; and subsequently from almost every court on the Continent.

Anxious to aggrandize the army, and aware that to their instrumentality he was indebted for his present elevation, Buonaparte had for some time contemplated the formation of a military order of nobility, under the designation of the Legion of Honour. The legislature, in obedience to the will of the first consul, accordingly decreed, that a legion of honour should be established in France; and that that body should be composed of fifteen cohorts, and a council of administration. That each cohort should consist of seven grand officers, twenty commandants, thirty subordinate officers, and three hundred and fifty legionaries; that the first consul should always be the chief of the legion, and of the council of administration; and that the members of the legion should be appointed for life. The pay of each grand officer to be five thousand francs, of each inferior officer, one thousand francs, and of each legionary, two hundred and fifty francs. All military men who had received arms of honour to be members of the legion; those citizens also who had rendered eminent services to the state in the late war, or who, by their knowledge, talents, and virtues, had contributed to establish and defend the principles of the republic, or had caused the government to be respected, to be eligible to that appointment: and Joseph Buonaparte, the brother of the first consul, was elected grand-master of the new order. Thus was the consular throne not only declared permanent, but a military order of nobility was created for its protection and support.

made-

made his will the law; plundered, at his pleasure, the ecclesiastical princes of the empire, to indemnify those whose territories he had seized on the French side of the Rhine, and taken special care to reward, most amply, those wretched potentates who had displayed the most cowardly subserviency to his interests, and the most base treachery to their lawful chief. Among these, the petty sovereigns of Bavaria, Baden, and Wertemburgh, were raised, by him, to the dignity of Electors, as preparatory to their subsequent elevation to the rank of Kings. He had been equally successful in reviving the ancient jealousy between the Prussian monarch and the Emperor of Germany. The former of these sovereigns, with a littleness of soul, an imbecility of mind, and a miserable want of foresight, while intent on the humiliation of a rival no longer formidable, and on the pursuit of petty schemes of personal aggrandisement, enlarged the influence and power of an implacable enemy, and prepared the way for his own destruction. In Italy, also, Buonaparte had assumed the sovereignty, under the denomination of President of the Italian Republic, for such was the title now assumed by the Cisalpine Republic. He had united the kingdom of Sardinia and the Duchy of Parma to France; and he had taken effectual means for rivetting the chains of Switzerland. Possessed of power so extensive, and inflated by success so unexpected, Buonaparte was little solicitous to afford proofs of a pacific disposition to the only enemy who had resisted his efforts with effect. In fact, the stand which England alone had made against his towering ambition, had severely galled his pride, and increased the inveteracy of his hatred. The idea, that she should presume to question his omnipotence, while the trembling powers of the Continent submitted their necks to his yoke, was intolerable to a mind which acknowledged no honourable principle of action, which was inaccessible to every laudable sentiment, which regarded all competition as an intolerable presumption, and opposition to his will, as an unpardonable crime. With this disposition Buonaparte betrayed, in all his communications with the British Cabinet, an overbearing and insupportable pride. First to Otto, and afterwards to his Ambassador, General Andreossy, he sent instructions to complain of the freedom of those animadversions, which the public writers of Great Britain passed on his character and conduct. And those complaints were reiterated as well by Talleyrand, as by the First Consul himself, to Lord Whitworth, who, in November, 1802, had repaired to Paris as Ambassador to the French Court. In all the communications which took place on this subject, Buonaparte betrayed a petulance of temper utterly incompatible with the new character which he had to support, and a profound ignorance of the laws and constitution of this country. He could not be persuaded, that the British Government were unable to exercise, over the press, the same unlimited power, the same boundless tyranny, which he himself exercised over every public writer, throughout his vast dominions. It was impossible, to make him understand, that, in England, the ministers were subject to the same legal restraints as the lowest subject of the realm, that they could proceed only according to the forms of law; and that, if what the law deemed a libel should be uttered, or written, against the first potentate in Europe, he must, in order to punish the offender, have recourse to the same modes of proceeding, which are prescribed to Englishmen themselves, under similar circumstances. Every attempt to procure new laws for imposing additional restraints on the press, having proved fruitless; and the First Consul remaining unconvinced by the forcible and judicious observations of Lord Hawkesbury,* a constant state of irritation and ill will continued to prevail between the two countries. From general complaints, the great Consul descended to particulars; and, in the autumn of 1802, he directed his agent Otto, to prefer complaints against certain English public writers, and against Peltier, who conducted a Journal, in the French language, intituled, L'Ambigu. Although, as Lord Hawkesbury had pertinently observed, in his instructions to Mr. Merry, who was then at Paris, the French press poured forth constant libels against the English government, libels, too, authorised by the French Cabinet; although Rheinhardt, the Jacobin representative of Buonaparte, at Hamburgh, had violated the neutrality of the Senate, and had compelled them to insert a most virulent attack upon the English government, in the Hamburgh paper; although Buonaparte, himself, had publicly uttered similar libels; and although, to use the words of Lord Hawkesbury, it might, indeed, with truth, be asserted, that the period which had elapsed since the conclusion of the definitive treaty had been marked with "one continued series of aggression, violence, and insult, on the part of the French government;"—so ardent was the desire of the British ministers to gratify Buonaparte, and so averse were they from the adoption of any line of conduct which could have even a tendency to produce a renewal of hostilities between the two countries, that they instructed the Attorney General to file a criminal information against Peltier, in compliance with the demand of Buonaparte, preferred through the medium of Otto. The cause was tried before Lord Ellenborough, on the 21st of February, 1803; and, in the course of that trial, such principles were advanced, in support of the prosecution, both from the bar and the bench, as, were they to be received as the law of the land, would effectually annihilate the liberty of the press. The defendant was convicted, but the renewal of hostilities was allowed to secure him from punishment.† At the very time when this extraordinary trial was pending, the difference between the two governments was such as to render hostilities unavoidable. At the latter end of February, Lord Whitworth had a personal interview with Buonaparte, in which the latter so far forgot himself, as personally to insult the British Ambassador, and to threaten his government, in the presence of other diplomatic characters. On this occasion he openly avowed his

* The communication here alluded to is Lord Hawkesbury's letter to Mr. Merry, dated August 28th 1802. In this his Lordship observes, "I am sure you must be aware that his Majesty cannot, and never will, in consequence of any representation, or any measure, from a foreign power, make any concession which can be in the smallest degree dangerous to the liberty of the press, as secured by the constitution of this country. This liberty is justly dear to every British subject. The Constitution admits of no previous restraints upon publications of any description; but there exist judicatures, wholly independant of the Executive government, capable of taking cognizance of such publications as the law deems to be criminal, and which are bound to inflict the punishments which the delinquents may deserve. These judicatures may take cognizance, not only of libels against the government and the magistracy of this kingdom, but, as has been repeatedly experienced, of publications defamatory of those in whose hands the administration of foreign governments is placed. That our government neither has, nor wants, any other protection than that which the laws of the country afford; and though they are willing, and ready, to give to every foreign government all the protection against offences of this nature, which the principle of their laws and constitution will admit, they never can consent to new-model their laws, or to change their constitution, to gratify the wishes of any foreign power."

† The Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, who presided on the trial, in summing up the evidence, observed, that it was manifest, that the nature and direct tendency of the publications charged in the indictment, was to interrupt and destroy the peace and amity now happily subsisting between Great Britain and France, and that such publications were, in point of law, a libel. To shew that the writings of M. Peltier, then under the consideration of the court, contained a direct incitement to the assassination of the first consul, Lord Ellenborough cited the following passages:—"Oh! eternal disgrace of France! Cæsar, on the banks of the Rubicon has against him in his quarrel, the Senate, Pompey, and Cato, and the plains of Pharsalia. If fortune be unequal—if you must yield to the destinies, Rome, in this sad reverse, at least, there remains to avenge you, a poignard among the last Romans." Again, "As for me," says the writer, "far from envying his (Buonaparte's) lot, let him name, I consent to it, his worthy successor. Carried on the shield, let him be elected Emperor. Finally (and Romulus recalls the thing to mind) I wish he may have this apotheosis." Every body, his Lordship said, knew the supposed story of Romulus; he dis-appeared, and his death was supposed to be the effect of assassination. His Lordship farther said, that he was certain the verdict of the Jury would be founded upon the real facts of the case, and that no recollection of the past, or expectation of the future, would warp their minds from the straight and even course of justice: they would consider the necessary effects of plans of assassination and murder, and that if they were not discountenanced and discouraged in this country, they might be retaliated on the safety of all that was most dear to us.

ambitious designs, clearly developed his views upon Egypt, (which, indeed, had been fully explained in a report previously made by his agent, Sebastiani, who had been sent, in a military capacity, to that country,*) boldly justified his unprincipled usurpations in Switzerland, Piedmont, and Italy, and peremptorily insisted on the immediate evacuation of Malta, as the sine quà non of continued peace. By the treaty of Amiens, the King had stipulated to restore, within a given time, the island of Malta to the order of St. John, under the express guarantee of its independence and neutrality by the principal powers of Europe. Circumstances, however, tending to destroy the independence of the order itself, by depriving it of a considerable portion of its revenue, had subsequently arisen, which rendered it highly imprudent to carry that article of the treaty into effect. Besides, the stipulation had been made with a reference to the relative situation of the contracting parties, at the time of concluding the treaty. That situation had experienced a material change, by the fresh acquisitions of territory, which Buonaparte had afterwards made, and by the consequent addition of power which he had secured. Buonaparte's intentions, too, to dismember the Turkish empire, and to monopolize the commerce of the Levant, objects against which specific provisions were made in the treaty, were too notorious not to call for measures of adequate precaution on the part of Great Britain. The British ministers, indeed, were to blame only for having carried a system of conciliation and concession to a greater length than was compatible with the dignity of the national character. At last, the inutility of every attempt to make Buonaparte recede from the fixed purpose of his mind, and to listen to the claims of justice, became so obvious, that the British ambassador received orders to return to England. He accordingly left Paris, on the 12th of May, (1803,) and, on the 18th of that month, the declaration of the British cabinet was published.

We must now briefly revert to other subjects, domestic as well as foreign.—Towards the close of the preceding year (1802) a treasonable plot was discovered, of which Colonel Despard was the head, and indeed the only individual of any consideration in the conspiracy. The object of this conspiracy was the death of the King, and the subversion of the constitution; but the means by which these traitorous designs were to be effected were so little adapted to the magnitude of the enterprise, that it seemed scarcely possible that the design should have originated with any man in a sane state of mind. The plan concerted by Colonel Despard, was to ingratiate himself with the soldiery, and particularly with the guards, by which means he hoped to have at his disposal a select corps, trained to the use of arms, and advantageously situated for the execution of his atrocious purpose. The first object of the conspirators was to secure or destroy the King on his return from Parliament at the opening of the session, to accomplish which it was proposed to load the great gun in the park with long-ball, or chain-shot, and to discharge the contents at his Majesty's carriage as he passed! At the same moment, other parties were to seize the Tower, to surround the two Houses of Parliament, to take possession of the Bank, to destroy the telegraph, and to stop the mail coaches, which last event was to be, as in the Irish rebellion, a signal for a general rising throughout the country. This insane project was to be executed by about forty individuals, and those in the lowest situation in life, both as to rank and intellect. Among the assumed partisans of this sanguinary plot were two soldiers in the guards, of the names of Blaine and Windsor, who, through the medium of Mr. Bownas, an army agent, with whom they were in regular communication, laid before government all the proceedings of the conspirators.

On the 16th of November, the day appointed for the meeting of Parliament, a general meeting of the conspirators, amounting to about thirty in number, was held at the Oakley Arms, in South Lambeth, in the borough of Southwark, where they were all arrested and committed to prison. The arrests, which were conducted in every respect according to the due form of law, excited much surprise, but no extraordinary alarm. On the 7th of February (1803) Colonel Despard was brought up for trial before a special commission, at the New Sessions House, in the borough of Southwark, on which occasion Windsor, Blaine, one Emblyn, a watchmaker, and others of the conspirators, was admitted as evidence for the crown. It appeared from the testimony of these witnesses, that on the Friday preceding the 16th of November, Colonel Despard met some of the seduced soldiery, and others of the conspirators, for the first time, at the Flying Horse at Newington; and that he spoke freely of their traitorous designs, and the best mode of carrying them into execution. At this meeting the intercepting and shooting the King on his way to Parliament was discussed, as well as the probable difficulties attending such a traitorous enterprise; on which the Colonel exclaimed, "If nobody else will shoot him, I will;" adding, with much solemnity, "I have well weighed the matter, and my heart is callous." Every other part of the design was then adverted to and freely debated. Colonel Despard spoke of the strength of the conspiracy at Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and Birmingham, and of his own activity in forwarding the cause. The people, he said, were every where ripe, and the death of the King would be a signal for a general rising.

It further appeared, that through the medium of one Francis, with whom he seemed to have been confiden-

* The report of Colonel Sebastiani, submitted to the chief consul, and inserted in the Moniteur of the 30th of January, 1803, consists of observations made in discharge of a mission, undertaken by order of the French government, to the principal cities of Egypt and Syria. The remarks of Colonel Sebastiani are more military than commercial, and his report abounds with compliments paid in every stage of his journey to the first consul. "The Egyptian astrologers," says he, "make predictions every day, on what concerns the first consul." "In Egypt, chiefs, merchants, people, all like to talk of the first consul—all offer up prayers for his happiness. All the news which concerns him spreads from Alexandria or Damietta to the Pyramids and the Grand Cataracts with astonishing rapidity." Even Ghezzar, the Pacha of Acra, was found to have conceived a high esteem for the French, and in speaking of Buonaparte, is represented by Colonel Sebastiani to have said, "In stature Buonaparte is small, but he is nevertheless the greatest of mankind. I know that he is deeply regretted at Cairo, where they wish to see him again!" On the 16th of October, 1802, Colonel Sebastiani arrived at Alexandria, and on the same day he waited upon General Stuart, commandant of the English forces by sea and land: "I communicated to him," says the report, "the order of the minister for foreign affairs, which enjoined me to proceed to Alexandria, and if the English still occupied that place, to demand a speedy evacuation, and the execution of the treaty of Amiens. General Stuart then told me, that the evacuation of the place would shortly be effected; but seeing that I insisted, and that I desired an answer less vague, he declared to me that he had no orders from his court to quit Alexandria, and that he even believed he should pass the winter there. General Stuart," continues the Colonel, "is a man of mediocre talents: he has for his aid de-camp a French emigrant, called the Chevalier de Sades, a man of talents, and an enemy to France, who has much influence over the General." "The English army in Egypt," says Colonel Sebastiani, towards the close of his report, consists of 4,430 men. They wholly and exclusively occupy Alexandria and the neighbouring forts, and the Turks who formed the garrison of some of these forts have been removed. The Pacha of Cairo furnishes to the English army, corn, rice, wood, and provisions, without any payment. The consumption is treble what it should be: they commit great waste. A great misunderstanding reigns between General Stuart and the Pacha. The Turkish army amounts to about 16,000 men. The Pacha of Alexandria is, as one may say, a prisoner with the English. The Turkish soldiers are without discipline, and their officers are destitute of the first principles of the military art. Six thousand French would at present be enough to conquer Egypt." "Ghezzar's army at present consists of from 13,000 to 14,000 men, of which 9,000 are employed in the siege of Jaffa. The weakest part of the fort of Acra is towards the sea, and particularly the point which defends the entrance to the port. The English wished to interfere as mediators between the Emir and Ghezzar, but the latter refused their mediation." On announcing to the Captain Bey, commander of the forces of the Ottoman Porte at Alexandria, that the agents of French commerce would assemble in Egypt: "This communication," says Colonel Sebastiani, "gave them the greatest pleasure, and they did not conceal that they saw with grief the stay of the English in their country. Ghezzar, too, said, that he should himself be the French commissary at Acra, and should take care that their countrymen were well received; he desired that the commissary sent by the first consul should reside at Seide, as that was the most commercial part of his dominions." Such are the materials which form the memorable report of Colonel Sebastiani.

tially connected, Colonel Despard had himself sworn and attempted to swear soldiers and others into engagements, binding them to the destruction of the King and government; and finally, that on the evening of the 16th of November he was, with about thirty other persons, sitting in full convention, assembled for treasonable purposes, at the Oakley Arms public house, in Lambeth, where certain papers were found indicative of their wicked designs, and affording evidence that their ulterior purpose was to be carried by the conflict of arms, and not by the force of reason and argument. After a trial which lasted nearly eighteen hours, and in which very honourable testimony was given to the conduct of Colonel Despard as an officer while in the army, by Lord Nelson, Sir Alured Clark, and Sir Evan Nepean, he was found guilty; the foreman of the jury, adding, at the time the verdict was delivered, "My Lord, we do most earnestly recommend the prisoner to mercy, on account of the high testimonials to his former good character, and eminent services." On Wednesday, the 0th of February, the court resumed its sittings at nine o'clock, and proceeded on the trials of the other prisoners, twelve in number. The evidence on these trials was substantially the same as on that of Colonel Despard; and after an investigation which continued without intermission till six o'clock the following morning, the jury, at five-and-twenty minutes before eight, returned a verdict of guilty against John Wood, Thomas Broughton, John Francis, Thomas Newman, Daniel Tyndall, J. Sedgwick Wratten, William Lander, Arthur Graham, and John Macnamara; recommending Lander, Newman, and Tyndall, to mercy.* Thomas Phillips and Samuel Smith were acquitted; and the charge against John Doyle was abandoned at the close of the evidence. Colonel Despard was then sent for, and placed at the bar in front of the other prisoners; when Lord Ellenborough passed the awful sentence of death upon these unfortunate men, in one of the most impressive speeches ever perhaps delivered upon a similar occasion.

On the evening of Saturday, the 19th of February, his Majesty's warrant for the execution of Colonel Despard and his associates reached the gaol. The Colonel seemed more surprised than affected. On Sunday, at three o'clock, Mrs. Despard had a last and most affecting interview with her unfortunate husband, and though he sustained himself with considerable firmness at the moment of their final separation, he soon after became deeply agitated, and for a short time lost his wonted composure. Between six and seven o'clock in the evening, he threw himself upon the bed, and fell into a short sleep. At eight he awoke, and in the hearing of one of the officers of the prison, said—"Me—they shall receive no information from me—no! not for all the gifts, the gold, and the jewels, in possession of the crown." He then composed himself to sleep, and remained on his bed till about half past four o'clock in the morning, at which hour he arose, and continued to pace his cell, till he was led out to execution. Most of the other prisoners spent much of their time in prayer, and received the sacrament at seven o'clock in the morning, but Colonel Despard refused to attend, and remained in his cell. Between eight and nine o'clock on Monday, the 21st of February, the execution took place, on the top of the New Gaol, in the Borough, with the usual forms in cases of high treason, in the presence of innumerable spectators.† Thus terminated a conspiracy, unexampled in the annals of history for the extent of its designs, when contrasted with the weakness and paucity of its means.‡

About this time, Ireland once more became the theatre of conspiracy and rebellion. Mr. Robert Emmett, a young man of specious and promising talents—the brother of Thomas Eddis Emmett, who had, previously to the rebellion of 1798, abandoned a respectable situation at the bar, in order to erect an Irish republic, and effect a separation from Great Britain—had been sufficiently unguarded in his conduct, while the late disturbances existed, to become an object of the vigilance of government, and had found it prudent to reside abroad so long as the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended; but on the removal of that obstacle he returned to Ireland, and arrived in that country in the month of December, 1802. The death of Dr. Emmett, his father, one of the state physicians in Dublin, had placed the sum of two thousand pounds in ready money at his disposal; and with this exchequer he proposed to himself the subversion of the government of Ireland! His principal associates at this time were, Dowdall, a man who had formerly filled an inferior office under the Irish House of Commons; Redmond, a man of narrow means, engaged in a small line of trade; Allen, a bankrupt woollen manufacturer; and Quigley, a mechanic of considerable address, who having been outlawed in 1798, had since that period resided in France, and had recently returned to Ireland, under circumstances which clearly indicated his agency in the approaching insurrection. In another part of the country was Mr. Thomas Russel, who had served as an officer in the British army with some reputation, and who, unlike the majority of those that had imbibed the political principles of the revolutionary school of France, was religiously inclined, even to enthusiasm. This unfortunate man was among the number of those banished to Fort George, in Scotland, at the close of the late rebellion, whence he was allowed to embark for France, and did not return to his native country till the spring of the year 1803.

Emmett and Dowdall were stationed in Dublin; Quigley in the county of Kildare; and Russel in the populous districts of the north; while others of less note were subdivided through various parts of the country, with authority from their leaders to forward the object of their rebellious mission by every means in their power. Some important assistance was also expected, in the acquisition of a person of the name of

* After an imprisonment of some years they were liberated by an act of royal clemency.

† The minor culprits displayed the utmost penitence, and expressed their fervent prayers for the divine mercy; but the unhappy principal declined all spiritual assistance from the clergyman, and was never observed, during the whole period of his confinement, to engage in any exercise of devotion. He was the last to ascend the scaffold, which he did with great firmness, and his countenance never underwent the slightest change. He viewed the multitude assembled with perfect calmness, and with a firm and elevated voice thus addressed them: "Fellow citizens, I come here, as you see, after having served my country faithfully, honourably, and I trust usefully, for thirty years and upwards, to suffer death upon a scaffold, for a crime which I am no more guilty of than any man that is looking upon me. This I solemnly declare: but though his Majesty's ministers know that I am not guilty, they avail themselves of the legal pretext which they have of destroying a man, because they think he is a friend to truth, to liberty, and to justice, and because he has been a friend to the poor and to the oppressed. But, fellow-citizens, I hope and trust, notwithstanding my fate, and perhaps the fate of many others who may follow me, that still the principles of liberty, justice, and humanity, will triumph over falsehood, despotism, and delusion, and every thing else hostile to the interests of the human race. And now, having said this, I have nothing more to add, but to wish you all that health and happiness, and that freedom, which I have made it my endeavour, as far as lay in my power, to procure for every one of you and for mankind in general." Immediately after this speech the crowd cheered, but the impulse immediately subsided; and at seven minutes before nine, the sufferers were launched into eternity. After hanging about half an hour the bodies were cut down: Colonel Despard the first: his head was then severed from his body, and the executioner, holding it up to the view of the populace, exclaimed—"This is the head of a traitor, Edward Marcus Despard." The same ceremony was afterwards performed on the other bodies, after which they were all put into shells, the other part of the sentence having been remitted, and the populace dispersed without any indication of tumult.

‡ Colonel Despard appears to have been a man of an ardent mind, of inflexible resolution, and of a high and daring spirit. Having served his country for a long series of years, and having, it is said, been refused the compensation he thought due to his professional claims, he became the victim of chagrin and disappointment, and indulged a spirit of resentment, which led him to form dangerous connections, and to cover culpable designs under the mask of patriotism: but being thrown into prison, and severely treated, under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, and precluded from all redress by the act of indemnity which succeeded, his resentment was converted into the madness of revenge, which he scrupled not to gratify by engaging in attempts the most criminal and atrocious. Of his six fellow-sufferers—the victims of his seduction and example, one only of them was, like their leader, an Irishman by birth, the others were all Englishmen; two of them, Wood and Francis, were private soldiers in the guards, and the other four were all handicrafts men, in low circumstances.

Dwyer,

Dwyer, a leader of banditti in the Wicklow mountains, who had remained in arms from the period of the rebellion in 1798. His party did not ostensibly exceed twenty, but he was supposed to possess considerable influence over the peasants of that district. On the first arrival of Mr. Emmett in Ireland he resided in obscure lodgings, under the name of Hewitt. About the end of April, however, he engaged, with Dowdall, a house and premises of some extent, near the heart of the city. Surrounded by about twenty of his associates, he there established a depot of arms. Muskets and other weapons were procured as opportunity served, a large manufacture of pikes was secretly carried on, and bullets to the amount of upwards of thirty thousand were fabricated. On the 21st of July, a person was found loitering near the depot, and being supposed to have observed some suspicious proceedings, he was seized by the conspirators, and would have been put to death but for the interference of Emmett, at whose instance he was confined, and compelled to labour in forming pikes, and other services conducive to the furtherance of the object of the conspiracy. At this crisis an accident occurred which threatened to lead to a premature developement of the whole plot: an explosion of a quantity of gunpowder took place in the house of one of the conspirators in Patrick street, but by the address of the conspirators, or the remissness of the police, this incident did not lead to any discovery. Though the persons immediately connected with Emmett, Russel, Dowdall, and Quigley, the principals in the plot, did not exceed from eighty to one hundred; yet these infatuated men were so sanguine in their expectations, as to suppose that the spirit of rebellion would at their bidding pervade the whole kingdom; and the usual intimation, the stoppage of the mail coaches, was to be the signal of revolt in the country, while the first object of the insurgents in the metropolis was to secure the seat of government, and the principal persons engaged in its administration. For some days previously to the fatal explosion, information had been conveyed to government of threatening assemblages of the people; and other indications tended to awaken a suspicion that "a rising," as it was termed, was in agitation. On the morning of Saturday, the 23d of July, the day appointed for this momentous enterprise, unusual crowds of peasants were observed on the great south road to Dublin, directing their hurried steps towards the capital from all parts of the county of Kildare, which lies in that direction, and in which district Quigley had exercised his pernicious functions. The city continued to fill during the whole of the day; and it was observed by travellers and others, that many parts of Kildare were emptied of the adult part of the male population. Towards evening the populace began to assemble in vast numbers in St. James's Street and its neighbourhood, without having any visible arrangement or discipline. The next object was to arm the body thus collected; for which purpose pikes were deliberately brought out from the store in that neighbourhood, and with unmolested regularity placed along the sides of the streets, for the accommodation of all who might choose to equip themselves. The inhabitants during this alarming scene were panic-struck, and seeing no prospect of succour or protection, withdrew within their houses, barred their doors and windows, and implored the protection of providence. About nine o'clock, the concerted signal that all was in readiness, was given by a number of men riding furiously through the principal streets; but general alarm was not excited, until Mr. Clarke, the proprietor of a considerable manufactory in the neighbourhood of Dublin, and who had that afternoon apprised government of the intention of the insurgents, was shot at and dangerously wounded. About the period of this premeditated assassination, a small piece of ordnance, which had been in readiness for the purpose, was discharged, and a sky-rocket let off at the same moment, so as to be observed throughout the whole city. Mr. Emmett, at the head of his chosen band, now sallied forth from the obscurity of his head-quarters, in Marshalsea-Lane, and brandishing his sword in the street, excited his followers to action. Before they had reached the end of the Lane in which they were assembled, a confidential member of the party discharged his blunderbuss at a person dressed in a military uniform, who was passing hastily along the street. The ball of the assassin unhappily took effect, and thus perished Colonel Browne, a most respectable and meritorious officer, and one of the first victims of this sanguinary night. From this period, it is remarkable, nothing more is heard of Emmett, or any of his brother conspirators, till we find them beneath the power of the offended justice of their country.

The circumstance from which this commotion derived a degree of consequence far beyond that which would naturally belong to the ordinary acts of turbulence in a disaffected country, and in an ill-regulated metropolis, was the dreadful catastrophe of the chief justice of Ireland, the Lord Viscount Kilwarden. This unfortunate nobleman had, on the day of the insurrection, retired to his country seat, near four miles from Dublin, as was his custom after having passed the week in fulfilling the duties of his exalted situation. On the first intimation of the circumstances which denoted disturbances being conveyed to him, his Lordship, who, ever since the period of the outrages in 1798, had been in perpetual apprehension of being surprised and assassinated by rebels, ordered out his carriage, and taking with him his daughter, and his nephew, the Rev. Richard Wolfe, set off instantly for Dublin, where he expected to find protection and safety. Unfortunately for the lord chief justice and his family, the carriage appeared in Thomas Street immediately after the opening of the depot, and was surrounded by a mob of armed persons. His Lordship announced his name, and earnestly prayed for mercy; but in vain. The party were all dragged from the carriage, and Lord Kilwarden and his nephew fell to the ground, pierced with innumerable wounds, but the lady was permitted to pass through the whole rebel column to the castle without molestation! The alarm having been universally spread, the approach of a small military force, hastily collected, caused the cowardly and ferocious wretches to abandon their mangled prey; and as soon as the streets were a little cleared, some humane persons ventured to approach the scene of blood and massacre. The body of Mr. Wolfe was found quite dead, at the distance of a few yards from the place where the carriage had been stopped; but his unfortunate uncle, Lord Kilwarden, still survived. His Lordship was immediately carried to the nearest watch house, where he received such assistance as could be procured, and while the vital spark still quivered on his lips, this truly great man exclaimed—"Murder must be punished, but let no man suffer for my death, but on a fair trial, and by the laws of his country." These were his last words.* About half past ten o'clock the rebels were in their turn severely attacked; the mighty projects and elaborate preparations of the chiefs were all discomfited and dissipated in less than an hour, by two subaltern officers of the 21st regiment, each having about fifty men under his command. After the rebels had taken possession of certain streets, they put to death several persons in military attire, and cut off a number of regulars and volunteers who were anxiously repairing to the rendezvous appointed for them in case of danger. While engaged

* Arthur Wolfe, Lord Viscount Kilwarden, was a native of Ireland, and had served the crown, in the usual gradations of the highest offices of the law. He became Solicitor-General of Ireland when Viscount Carleton was promoted to the Common Pleas, and Attorney General, on the late Lord Clare's accession to the seals. The Earl of Clonmell was his Lordship's immediate predecessor in his high office of Chief Justice of Ireland. As crown prosecutor, during a period which unfortunately called for the frequent exercise of the duties of that office, he was fair, candid, and gentle; disposed to give the accused every advantage, and always less desirous to exaggerate guilt, than to ascertain innocence. As a judge, no man ever attempted to censure him on any other ground than a strenuous, and what some considered an overstrained assertion of the liberty of the subject. He was an upright, honest man, who well knew how to appreciate law and justice, and who had fully and deeply impressed on his mind the sound maxims of both.

engaged in this murderous pursuit, Lieutenant Brady, with about fifty men, came unexpectedly upon the rear of the mob; and while attempting to seize the first pike-man he met, a shot was fired from an entry, by which one of his soldiers was wounded. The Lieutenant, finding these acts of aggression repeated, ordered his men to fire, and in a few minutes the mob fled in every direction, leaving the Lieutenant and his party completely masters of the field. A column of rebels proceeding down Thomas Street, seemed desirous to attack the light company of the 21st under Lieutenant Douglas, and two or three shots were discharged at the soldiers, when the mob advancing as if to charge, received a volley from the troops, which obliged them to fall back; a second volley dispersed them, and after this no further attack or resistance was experienced.

No return was ever made of the number of lives lost on this occasion, but the most probable conjecture is, that of soldiers and volunteers there were about twenty, and perhaps about fifty of the insurgents. Nor is it easy to form an opinion of the number of rebels in arms, though various conjectures have been made, some carrying their muster roll up to 3000, and others diminishing their force to 500.* The entire failure of the rebellious enterprise of Emmett and his associates reduced their proclamations and decrees to the standard of waste paper; and every precaution was immediately taken by the government to restore the public tranquillity. The privy council issued a proclamation, calling on the magistrates to unite their exertions with those of the military power, and offering a reward of one thousand pounds for the discovery and detection of the miscreants who murdered Lord Kilwarden. A reward was also offered to those who should discover the murderers of Lieutenant-Colonel Browne; and an official notice was issued by the Lord Mayor, requiring all the inhabitants of Dublin, except yeomen, to keep within doors after eight in the evening. At the same time, bills for suspending the Habeas Corpus act, and for placing Ireland under martial law, were passed with uncommon rapidity through their different stages in the Parliament of the united kingdom. Arrangements were also made for sending large bodies of troops from England, and every measure which prudence could suggest, or courage execute, was immediately adopted, for the preservation of the public tranquillity. On this occasion, the Roman Catholics, with Lord Fingal at their head, came forward in the most loyal and patriotic manner, and after expressing their utmost abhorrence and detestation of the enormities committed on the 23d of July, made an offer to government of their assistance and co-operation. By these and similar exertions the flame of rebellion was completely extinguished.

Russel, who had attempted to erect the standard of rebellion in the north, was also completely disappointed, and it does not appear that more than twelve persons, and those of the lowest rank, and most desperate characters, ever entered into his treasonable designs. Disappointed in all his endeavours, he returned to Dublin soon after the 23d of July, where he remained concealed in the house of Mr. Mulet, a gun-smith, till the 9th of September, when he was apprehended by the vigilance of the police, and on the following day committed to prison. Emmett fled in despair and mortification from Dublin, to the adjacent mountains. But there he was pursued, and obliged again to seek refuge in Dublin, where he was in about a month traced to the house of a Mrs. Palmer, and, having been secured, was committed to prison. Dowdall and Allen escaped out of the country; but Redmond was arrested at Newry, at the moment when he was about to take his passage for America; and Quigley and Stafford were soon after taken in the interior of the country. A special commission was issued for the trial of the rebels, and Edward Kearney, a calenderer; and Thomas Maxwell Roche, an old man, of nearly seventy years of age, were found guilty, and executed in Thomas Street, the focus of the insurrection. Several others experienced a similar fate; but the most important of these judicial proceedings was the trial of Robert Emmett, Esq. who was arraigned on the 19th of September, and found guilty on the clearest evidence.† On the following day this misguided young man, only in the 24th year of his age, was executed on a temporary gallows in Thomas Street. In the ensuing month, Mr. Thomas Russel also expiated his offences under the hands of the executioner.—Quigley and Stafford were arraigned on the 29th of October; but in consideration of their having made a full disclosure of all the circumstances connected with the conspiracy, no further proceedings were had against them, nor any of the remaining prisoners.

* The plan of the insurrection, as developed in the papers afterwards found in the depot, embraced the whole of Ireland, a certain number of men from each parish being fixed on to march for the capital. The explosion, however, was confined to Dublin and its immediate vicinity. A schism, which divided the leaders, produced this premature attempt, one party being desirous of coming to immediate action, and the other wishing to postpone the execution of their plan, till the co-operation of a foreign force could be procured. The activity of the government soon discovered the depots, detected the plans, and annihilated the resources of the conspirators. At the Malt Store, in Dirty Lane, the principal of their depots, were found eight thousand pikes, and thirty-four thousand ball cartridges, besides a number of hand grenados, and other military stores. On the banks of the river, at a place called the Coal-Quay, a second depot was found: in the apartment where it was discovered, the wainscot had been removed to a considerable distance from the wall, and constructed so as to move like a sliding door. Behind this was found an immense number of pikes and other weapons. In many parts of the city, and chiefly in vacant grounds, and against what are termed dead walls, boxes of pikes were discovered, formed so as to resemble logs of timber; their situation and contents being well known to the adherents of the conspirators. In Bridgefoot Street, and Smithfield, was also found a quantity of clothing, among which was a magnificent suit of green and gold, evidently intended for some insurgent General. But perhaps the most material discovery was the finding of the papers connected with the insurrection, and which, as they not only pointed out the leaders of the conspiracy, but also all the places in the country, which were considered as favourable for similar movements, enabled government to take effectual means to prevent or repel any further effort on the part of the disaffected. The most remarkable of the papers found at the depot, was a proclamation or manifesto of the intended provisional government to the people of Ireland. This address was written in a turgid and inflated style, much resembling some of the papers published in the early part of the French revolution, and among other assertions stated, "that the present effort was for the developement of a system which had been organized within the last eight months." It obscurely intimated that the conspiracy of Despard was a branch of the same system; and laid down as the basis of the whole, an eternal separation from British connection; and concluded with a declamatory invective against what was termed the tyranny of England. There was also in the archives of the rebels, an address to the citizens of Dublin, and the project of a decree, by which the abolition of all tythes was announced; no transfer of debenture or public securities was to take place till the national government should be organized; the troops of the line were to be treated as prisoners of war, but the Irish militia, yeomen, and volunteers, found in arms against the republic fourteen days after the date of the decree, were made liable to suffer death by the sentence of a court-martial. And among other regulations in this decree was a provision for electing a house of representatives.

† Before the awful sentence of the law was pronounced, Mr. Emmett addressed the court in a long and animated speech, in which he candidly avowed that it was his intention to separate Ireland from her dependence on Great Britain, and gloried in the measures he had taken to accomplish his purpose. He at the same time solemnly disclaimed all agency or connection with France:—"Small indeed," exclaimed he, "must have been our claims to patriotism or to common sense; absurd indeed our professions of the love of liberty, if I and my associates could encourage the profanation of our shores by a people who are themselves slaves, and the unprincipled and abandoned instruments of imposing slavery on others. Did I live to see a French army approach this country, I would meet it with a torch in one hand and a sword in the other: I would receive them with all the destruction of war! I would animate my countrymen to immolate them in their very boats, before our native soil should have been polluted by the tread of a foreign foe. If they succeeded in landing, I would burn every blade of grass before them; raise every house, contend to the last for every inch of ground, and the spot in which the hope of freedom should desert me, that spot I would make my grave. What I cannot do, I leave as a legacy to my country, because I feel conscious that my death would be unprofitable, and all hope of liberty would be extinct, the moment a French army obtained a footing in this land." After some further observations in the same strain, he concluded thus: "My lamp of life has nearly expired; my race is finished; the grave opens to receive me, and I sink into its bosom. All I request at departing from the world is the charity of its silence. Let no man write my epitaph, for as no man who knows my motives will dare to vindicate them, let not prejudice or ignorance asperse them; let them and me repose in obscurity and peace, and my tomb remain uninscribed, till other times, and other men, can do justice to my character."

Previously to this period, France had succeeded in obtaining a complete ascendancy in Switzerland; and, also, to a certain extent, as already intimated, in Germany.* In the West Indies, she had not been altogether so successful.† Buonaparte's favourite expedition to St. Domingo, upon which immense sums had been expended, was found by no means equal to the attainment of the object in view—the complete subjugation of the island; and, ultimately, its total failure was experienced.‡

The first important measure, respecting the Parliament which assembled in the winter of the year 1802, took place on the 16th of May, 1803, when a message was presented from his Majesty to both Houses, announcing that he had recalled his ambassador from Paris, and that the French ambassador had left London. The message also intimated, that his Majesty had given directions for laying before the House of Commons, with as little delay as possible, copies of such papers as would afford the fullest information to his Parliament at this important conjuncture.—The message was taken into consideration in the House of Lords, on the 23d of May, when Lord Pelham rose to move the address:—He observed, that the only question was, whether a distinct and legitimate ground of war was established by the correspondence now on the table. Without wishing to go minutely into these documents, he should briefly advert to the principal points in dispute between the two governments; and, first, with respect to Malta. It would be seen from the papers on the table, that up to a given period, his Majesty's ministers had taken every step to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty relating to this island. It was about the 27th of January that the French

* The Austrian cabinet was bound, by the treaty of Luneville, to admit of the German indemnities, and the secularization of several of the ecclesiastical sovereignties; but the government was extremely averse to the prosecution of this business. The Emperor of Russia at length resolved, after a long interval had elapsed in fruitless discussions, to take an active part, conjointly with France, in the mediation of the existing differences. Nothing, however, was effectually done till the 17th of July, (1802) on which day the Emperor of Germany transmitted a rescript to the diet of Ratisbon, stating that his attention had been unceasingly occupied with the means of terminating the important business of the peace; but that he found the parties principally interested, had applied in the mean time to Russia and France, and solicited the mediation of those powers in order to obtain the indemnities they waited for; that Russia had consequently proposed to open negociations at Paris, in February, 1802; that soon after, a convention was concluded between France and Russia, without the participation of his imperial Majesty, and that he was now desired to direct the definitive arrangement so begun, according to the constitution of the empire. The Emperor submitted for a time to the humiliating necessity under which he was placed, but by his persevering endeavours in favour of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, he obtained terms for his royal relative, somewhat more advantageous than those originally projected. The newly modified scheme of the indemnities, was called a supplement to the plan, according to which the Elector of Mentz obtained the cities of Ratisbon and Wetzlar. The Princes of Baden, Wirtemberg, and Hesse Cassel, were made electors. The King of Great Britain accepted the cession of the Bishopric of Osnaburg, in perpetuity, as a compensation for Hildesheim, Corvey, and Hoexter; stipulating at the same time to abandon the rights and privileges he had formerly exercised over Hamburgh and Bremen. And to the Prince of Orange, for the surrender of the stadtholderate, and other claims and possessions in Holland and Belgium, were awarded the Bishoprics of Fulda and Corvey, and the city of Dortmund. After much discussion, and the interchange of various imperial rescripts and replies, the influence of France rose predominant in the diet, and on the 22d of November, in the thirtieth sitting of the deputation, a final conclusum was voted, and reluctantly acceded to on the part of the Emperor. By this arrangement the influence of the Emperor was diminished in the diet, in consequence of the abolition of the two ecclesiastical electorates of Treves and Cologne, and the constitution of Germany suffered a more serious infraction than that effected, after the thirty years war, by the treaty of Westphalia.

† The island of Gaudaloupe, as well as that of St. Domingo, had become the theatre of civil war. The negroes struggled with great resolution against the chains which were prepared for them; but after a sanguinary resistance, they were subdued by a large military force, under the command of Admiral Bouvet and General Richepanse. In Tobago, when intelligence arrived that the island was to be restored to France, the people of colour flew to arms; and determined to attack the British troops under Brigadier General Carmichael, who had under his command only 200 men; but the British General having gained intelligence of the plot, seized thirty of the ringleaders. In consequence of this early suppression of the mutiny, the French experienced no serious opposition, and they took possession of this island in virtue of the treaty of Amiens. In the island of Dominica a very serious alarm was created by the mutiny of an entire regiment of blacks, who, in the first transport of their fury, put to death Captain Cameron, Lieutenants Mackay and Wastneys, Commissary Laign, and Quarter-Master Mackay, besides wounding two other officers. No sooner had intelligence of this tragical event, which originated in the pay of the troops being delayed, and the accustomed allowance of food diminished, come to the knowledge of the Hon. Cochrane Johnstone, who was Colonel of the revolted regiment, and governor of the island, than he immediately collected all the militia and European troops that could be mustered, and embarked for Prince Rupert's, the scene of the insurrection. After an ineffectual resistance on the part of the mutineers, who resisted the landing of the troops, they were at length totally routed, and the whole of their force, with the exception of forty grenadiers, were either killed, or made prisoners. Whilst these contests prevailed, the French legislative body abrogated the decree of the national convention, declaring "that negro slavery in all the colonies was abolished," and slavery was re-established in all the French colonies, on the same footing as it stood previously to the year 1789; and the slave trade, and the importation of negroes, were ordered to be renewed, with all the encouragement and advantages which this detestable traffic enjoyed under the old French government.

‡ At first the French met with flattering success; and the town of Cape François was relinquished to them by Christophe, one of Toussaint's Generals, who, after an obstinate resistance, on evacuating the place, ordered it to be set on fire, and the forts to be blown up. Port-au-Prince also fell into the hands of General Le Clerc; but Toussaint treated the overtures of the French commander with contempt, and took every precaution to secure a safe retreat into the interior and mountainous parts of the island. Here the obstacles to be surmounted were innumerable. "It would be necessary," says General Le Clerc in one of his dispatches, "to see the country, to form an accurate idea of the difficulties which occurred at every step. I have seen nothing in the Alps to be compared to them." In a series of severe engagements, the French were generally conquerors; but their force was dangerously weakened even by their victories; and the hot and rainy season, so fatal to Europeans, was approaching. But a second negociation was set on foot by Le Clerc, who was prodigal of promises, and protestations of favour and good will to the negro chief. "I throw," sasy he, "a veil of oblivion over every thing that has passed at St. Domingo before my arrival. With regard to yourself, you desire repose, and you deserve it. I leave you at liberty to retire to whichever of your habitations you please. I rely so much on the attachment you bear to the colony of St. Domingo, as to believe that you will employ the moments of leisure you may have in your retreat, in communicating to me your views respecting the means to be taken to make agriculture and commerce again flourish. Deluded by these shallow professions, Toussaint, invincible in his fortresses, was persuaded by a blind and fatal confidence in the faith of the French General, to sign a capitulation (May, 1802) and submit to the authority of the Republic. Scarcely had he laid down his arms, and retired to his house at Gonaives, when, on a vague and improbable charge of conspiring against the French government, he was seized in the midst of his family, about the end of the month, and with them immediately shipped on board a frigate for France, where he was, without trial or examination, thrown into prison.(a) But this cruel and unjust procedure did not answer the intended purpose. The negro Generals, Dessalines and Christophe, who had also surrendered, justly fearing to share the fate of their unfortunate colleague, saved themselves by flight. The insurgents again every where assembled; the climate effectually aided their efforts, and General Le Clerc himself at length fell a victim to its malignity. General Rochambeau succeeded to the command early in November, when a furious and bloody conflict recommenced; in the result of which the negro Generals recovered possession of the whole island, excepting a few maritime towns and naval ports, of which the French with extreme difficulty maintained possession, being assailed at once with the sword, disease, and famine; and a country of inestimable value, which by measures of moderation and conciliation, might in all probability have been preserved to France, appeared finally and irrecoverably lost.

(a) Toussaint Louverture, an African by birth, was sold at a very early age into slavery. The disadvantageous circumstances of his youth, precluded him from the enjoyment of a liberal education; but nature had compensated this misfortune; and so early as the year 1796, his superior talents had elevated him to a command in the French army of St. Domingo, under General Rochambeau. The influence which he possessed over the blacks, and the confidence bestowed upon him by the European part of the population, induced him, after the expulsion of the French from St. Domingo by the English, to aspire to sovereign power, and he consolidated his authority by the wisest and most humane regulations. On the arrival of the formidable armament from France, under General Le Clerc, the most alluring offers of personal aggrandizement were made to him by the first consul; and in rejecting those proposals he displayed a firmness and dignity of soul that would have done honour to a Roman. Of his humanity, it is a sufficient testimonial that he possessed the respect of the white inhabitants, whom the rage of insurrection had spared; nor does he appear to have been devoid of religion, but on the contrary, to have applied the principles of Christianity to one of their noblest purposes—to soften the ferocity, and temper the violence of the savage tribes placed under his command. The history of this gallant but unfortunate chief, from the time he was forced away from St. Domingo, is soon told: on his arrival in France he was immured in a dungeon, where he died in the following year, of apoplexy, as it was asserted, but not without violent suspicion that his life was terminated by the hand of an assassin.

government began to press in a very peremptory manner, for the evacuation of that island; and it was about that period, that ministers thought themselves bound to demand some satisfactory explanations of the pretensions advanced, and the views disclosed by the French government. Circumstances then existed, which rendered it necessary to refer back to what had been the conduct of the First Consul, from the period when the treaty was concluded. In the course of this view, the plain and intelligible inference was, that the conduct of the French government had been one constant series of acts totally inconsistent with a sincere desire to preserve the peace of the two countries. The answers returned by ministers to the complaints of the French government, regarding the liberty of the British press, the residence of the Bourbons, and the countenance afforded by this country to French emigrants, would be found in the correspondence, and he entertained a confident expectation that the language of ministers, on those subjects, was of a nature to meet with universal support and approbation. "Ministers," said his Lordship, in conclusion, "have shewn the utmost reluctance to resort to any measure which might hasten a renewal of hostilities; but the conduct of the French government could no longer be tolerated, consistently with the honour, dignity, and safety, of this country. War, then, has become inevitable; and it is a war in which the national spirit ought to be exerted in every way which will demonstrate to a proud and insolent foe, that while the people of England are not anxious for an opportunity of taking offence, they are sensibly alive to the least imputation of dishonour, and determined on punishing insults with the most exemplary vengeance." The Dukes of Cumberland and Clarence, Lord Mulgrave, Lord Melville, Earl Spencer, and others, spoke in favour of the motion, which was carried by 142 against 132. The question was, on the same day, discussed in the Commons; and continued by adjournment, on the following day. Lord Hawkesbury opened the debate in a very able speech, in which he enumerated all the subjects of complaint this country had against France, and concluded with moving an address, assuring his Majesty of the just sense that House entertained of his anxious and uniform endeavours to preserve to his people the blessings of peace; of their strong feelings of indignation that his Majesty's endeavours had been frustrated by the restless spirit of ambition and domination in the government of France; and of their firm determination to co-operate in calling forth the resources of the united kingdom, for the vigorous support of his cause.—Mr. Erskine combated the statements of Lord Hawkesbury; and was followed by Mr. Grey, who moved an amendment, limiting the address to assurances of co-operation, and an expression of the satisfaction with which the House received his Majesty's declaration, that he was willing to afford, as far as might be consistent with his own honour, and the interests of his people, every facility to any just arrangement, by which the blessings of peace might be restored.

In supporting the address, Mr. Pitt expressed his conviction, that some system, far more vigorous and effectual than any which had yet been adopted, would be found necessary, both in our finances, and in the preparation for national defence. On the provisions to be made for these two primary and paramount objects, it would principally depend, in his estimation, whether we could effectually disconcert the favourite projects, and disappoint the main hopes, of our enemies. It was evident, that if they indulged themselves in any expectation of success in the present contest, it was built chiefly on the supposition that they could either break the spirit, or shake the determination, of the country, by harassing us with the perpetual apprehension of descent upon our coasts, or that they could impair our resources, and undermine our credit, by the effects of an expensive and protracted contest. To defeat the first of these purposes, it was not, in his judgment, sufficient to make those naval and military preparations which would prevent any invasion that might be attempted, from being ultimately successful; (an event which, he trusted, he was justified, in common with others, in considering as utterly impossible) but, to make such vigorous and extensive arrangements for national defence, as might diffuse a sense of the most complete security against even the temporary impression to be produced by such an attempt, and might enable every individual to lay down his head in rest, in the persuasion and confidence that nothing was omitted which could enable us at once to meet and repel the danger, at any moment, and in any quarter, in which it might threaten us. In order to defeat the second object, that of wearing out our resources, Mr. Pitt trusted the House would, from the beginning, form a system of finance, not only with a view to the expense which might be necessary in the first year of the contest, but that they would look, at once, to the possibility of its being protracted to as long a period as that which had been lately terminated—that they would consider fully what, on the probable scale of the war, would be the whole extent of the burthens necessary to be imposed, on that supposition. He was persuaded, that it could only be by providing, at the outset, means adequate to the whole extent of these purposes, that we could, in fact, prevent the ultimate amount of our expenses from being unnecessarily, and perhaps intolerably, augmented; or, that we could ensure the best chances, either of bringing the contest to a speedy conclusion, by convincing the enemy of our ability to maintain it, or could meet its continued exigencies, if necessary, without the annual recurrence of growing and accumulated embarassments. He trusted, therefore, that ministers would feel the necessity of bringing both these points under consideration, with all practicable promptitude and dispatch; and that, if possible, not even a fortnight might be suffered to elapse, without enabling Parliament to adopt such measures as would convince both France and the world, that we had, from that hour, provided the means of supporting the force, and of defraying the expenditure, which might be necessary for the maintenance of our internal security, and for the vigorous and effectual prosecution of the war, to any period to which it could be reasonably expected to extend. He was aware that these measures could not be effected without material and extensive personal sacrifices, and without great additional burthens, which must, in a certain degree, affect the ease, convenience, and even comfort of many classes of society. He lamented these consequences as much as any man; and, if he saw any prospect that, by present concession, we could obtain a real and desirable interval of peace, security, and repose, he should be as anxious as any man to avoid the necessity of such arduous and painful concessions; but, under the present circumstances, a weak and timid policy would, perhaps, scarcely even postpone the moment when they would become indispensible for our existence, and would infallibly expose us to the certainty of a similar struggle, at no distant period, without those means which we now possessed, and with a diminished chance of finally conducting it to a successful issue. At that moment, we had not an option between the blessings of peace, and the dangers of war. From the fatality of the times, and the general state of the world, Mr. Pitt observed, we must consider our lot as cast by the decrees of Providence, in a time of peril and trouble. He trusted the temper, and the courage, of the nation, would be conformable to the duties which such a situation imposed, that we should be prepared, collectively and individually, to meet it with that resignation and fortitude, and, at the same time, with that active zeal and exertion, which, in proportion to the magnitude of the crisis, might be expected from a brave and free people; and that we should remember even in the hour of trial, what abundant reason we had to be grateful to Providence for the distinction which we enjoyed over most of the countries of Europe, and for all the advantages and blessings which national wisdom and virtue had hitherto produced, and which it now depended on perseverance in the same just and honourable sentiments, still to guard and preserve.—The address was agreed to, by 398, against 67.

Mr. Fox, three or four days afterwards, moved an address to his Majesty, praying "that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to avail himself of the disposition manifested by the Emperor of Russia, to mediate between this country and the French government, which mediation might not only lead to the speedy and honourable termination of the present contest, but might conduce to the general tranquillity and safety of Europe." Among the advantages which must result from the mediation of this powerful and esteemed sovereign, Mr. Fox particularly insisted upon the following: should this country be obliged to prosecute the war for the attainment of any object which that sovereign should approve, Great Britain would have the strong support afforded by his approbation, which would carry with it the opinion of the world in our favour. Through this mediation, we might hope to procure the adjustment, not merely of the question respecting Malta, but, in fact, of all the points in dispute. Lord Hawkesbury admitted, that an offer to mediate the differences between Britain and France had already been made by Russia. The impression on the mind of the Emperor Alexander was, that there was a certain degree of reluctance on the part of the two governments, to explain distinctly the points of mutual dispute. He had accordingly proposed, that the Russian ministers, at London and Paris, should interpose their good offices for facilitating this explanation; but at the time this offer was made, Lord Whitworth was on the eve of quitting Paris, and looking to an immediate termination of the discussions, ministers considered the offer as too loose, and too general, to be then adopted. At the same time, ministers did not conceal from the court of St. Petersburgh, and they were as little desirous of concealing from the House, that with reference not only to the particular points in dispute between the two governments, but with reference to the establishment of a guarantee for the general independence and security of Europe, they were ready to accept of the mediation of Russia. No question of etiquette would stand in the way; the whole declaration of ministers had been given in the true spirit of peace. In his Majesty's declaration also, an express assurance was given of his readiness to listen to any proposal for restoring the blessings of peace; and he had now to assure the honourable gentleman and the House, that ministers were ready to receive any offer of mediation on the part of Russia, or to offer to the mediation of this power, the points in dispute between the two governments. Mr. Fox, considering this explanation as perfectly satisfactory, withdrew his motion.

At this time, the existing administration were highly obnoxious to what was called the Grenville party; and the friends of Mr. Pitt, and even himself, began to manifest towards them unequivocal marks of coldness. On the 2d of June, Earl Fitzwilliam moved, in the upper House of Parliament, a series of resolutions, censuring the conduct of ministers, in withholding from Parliament, information on the numberless aggressions and insults offered by the French government to this country, since the treaty of Amiens; and in holding out to the country, the prospect of a permanent peace, at a period when they must have been aware, that the continuance of the relations of amity was, in the highest degree, uncertain and precarious. Lord Mulgrave, to the infinite mortification of ministers, moved, as an amendment, the adjournment of the House. However, both the original motion and Lord Mulgrave's amendment, were rejected by vast majorities. A similar motion was made on the following day in the House of Commons, by Colonel Patton, and with similar success. On the 6th of June, Earl Fitzwilliam brought the subject before the House again, and moved a number of resolutions, varying in form, but in substance the same as those before rejected. The last resolution was couched in these terms, "That by these instances of misconduct, his Majesty's ministers have proved themselves unworthy of the confidence of this House, and incapable of administering with advantage, the public affairs of the country in a crisis of such unexampled difficulty and danger." The first of these resolutions was negatived by 86 against 17, and the others without a division.

The remainder of this session of Parliament was chiefly occupied by subjects of finance, and with devising the means of providing for the defence of the country against the invasion threatened by the First Consul. The first, and most obvious measure of defence, was to render the militia, the constitutional defence of the country, as effective as possible, and a bill for that purpose was brought into the House of Commons by the secretary of war, on the 20th of May, which passed through its several stages without any material opposition. But the militia force being considered inadequate to the defence of the realm, a message from the crown was sent to Parliament, on the 18th of June, stating, that his Majesty considered it as important for the safety and defence of the nation, that a large additional military force should be forthwith raised and assembled, and it was recommended to both Houses of Parliament, to take such measures as should appear to be most effectual for accomplishing this purpose with the least possible delay. In furtherance of the object of this message, a bill was immediately brought into Parliament for embodying a new species of militia, under the denomination of the army of reserve. This force which was to consist of 50,000 men for England, and 10,000 for Ireland, was to be raised by ballot, and confined to the defence of the united kingdom: the officers to be appointed from the regular army and the half-pay list: all persons from the age of 18 to 45, were liable to serve, with the exception of those persons who were exempt from the militia ballot, and such volunteers as were enrolled previously to the date of the last message of his majesty: all poor persons having more than one child under ten years of age, were also exempt: the persons composing this force to be allowed to volunteer into the regular army. On the 6th of July, this bill obtained the royal assent. But these measures of defence, however important, were only the precursors of one of the most gigantic magnitude, being no less than the arming and training of the whole effective male population of Great Britain. This project was presented to the consideration of Parliament, on the 28th of July, and passed into a law by receiving the royal assent, on the 27th of the same month. This general enrolment, denominated the levy en masse, was divided into four different classes; the first comprehended all unmarried men between the ages of 17 and 30; the second, unmarried men between 30 and 50; the third, all married men between 17 and 30, not having more than two children under ten years of age; and the fourth, all under the age of 55, not comprised in the other descriptions. The different classes, who were to be trained and taught the use of arms, in their respective parishes, were, in case of actual invasion, liable to be called out by his Majesty, in the orders specified, to co-operate with the regular army, in any part of the kingdom, and to remain embodied until the enemy should be exterminated or driven into the sea.*

On the 13th of June, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward the budget; he proposed to raise, by an increase of the customs, duties on sugar, exports, cotton, and tonnage, about two millions annually; and by new duties on the excise of tea, wine, spirits, and

* An act was passed this session, to relieve the Roman Catholics from certain penalties and disabilities, to which they were before subject, on subscribing the declaration and oath contained in the act of the 31st of the reign of his present Majesty. An important addition was also made to the criminal law of the country. By an act, introduced into the House of Lords, by Lord Ellenborough, and on that account called the Ellenborough act, any person guilty of maliciously shooting, cutting, or stabbing, with an intent to commit murder, although death should not ensue, was declared guilty of a capital felony, and made subject to the punishment of death. The same penalty was also attached to all attempts to discharge loaded fire-arms, with an intent to kill or wound.

malt, six millions more. He then presented a plan of a tax on income, imposing a duty on land of one shilling in the pound, to be paid by the landlord, and ninepence in the pound, to be paid by the tenant, together with a tax of one shilling in the pound on all other species of income, from 150*l.* upwards. The nett produce of this revived property tax, was calculated at 4,700,000*l.* and the whole product of the war taxes, at 12,700,000*l.* annually, to expire six months after the return of peace. In addition to these grants, the other taxes were continued, and the whole of the supplies voted by Parliament for the service of the year 1803, amounted to upwards of forty-one millions.

At this time, the preparations for invading Britain, made by France, called forth a simultaneous burst of loyalty and patriotism from all classes and descriptions of persons, and in a very brief interval, upwards of 400,000 men in arms appeared ready to defend their native coasts. So numerous, indeed, were these voluntary armed associations, that it rendered the act for raising the levy en masse perfectly superfluous. Buonaparte viewed, with astonishment, this extraordinary display of national energy and patriotic feeling, and though his preparations for invasion were continued, the intention of carrying them into effect is thought to have been secretly abandoned.

In the course of the session, a grant of 60,000*l.* a year, for three years, to be computed from the 5th of January, 1803, was made to the Prince of Wales, towards providing for the better support and dignity of His Royal Highness.

During the discussions in the House of Commons, Mr. Windham had taken occasion to express himself in terms of great asperity and contempt towards the volunteer corps of the country, whom, on one occasion, the honourable gentleman termed the depositaries of panic. To obviate any supposition that the House concurred in these reproachful and calumnious sentiments towards those brave and loyal defenders of the state, Mr. Sheridan, on the 10th of August, moved the thanks of the House "to the volunteer and yeomanry corps of Great Britain, for the zeal and promptitude with which they had associated for the defence of the country." He also moved, "that returns of the different volunteer corps be laid before the House, in order that they may be handed down to posterity, by being entered on the journals." Both these motions were agreed to unanimously; and, on the 12th of August, this session was closed by a speech from the throne; on which occasion, his Majesty expressed his satisfaction at the energy and promptitude which had been displayed in providing for the defence of the country, and for the vigorous prosecution of the war; assuring the House, at the same time, that as strict a regard would be paid to œconomy, in the public expenditure, as was consistent with the exertions necessary to frustrate the designs, and weaken the power of the enemy. At this interesting period, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales addressed a letter to the prime minister, urging upon him the propriety of investing him with an efficient military rank, and of placing him in a situation where his example might contribute to excite the loyal energies of the nation, and where his participation in the honours and dangers which awaited the brave defenders of the country, might keep those energies in vigorous activity. In reply to repeated applications on this subject, he was informed, that, should the implacable enemy so far succeed as to effect a landing, His Royal Highness would have an opportunity of shewing his zeal at the head of his regiment; but, upon public grounds, his Majesty could never permit the Prince of Wales to consider the army as a profession, or to allow of his being promoted in the service.

This year, besides the loss of St. Domingo, the most valuable of all the colonial possessions of France, the islands of St. Lucia and Tobago once more fell into the hands of Great Britain. The Dutch colonies of Essequibo, Demerara, and Berbice, fell successively into the hands of the English, under the same successful and meritorious commanders (Commodore Hood, and Lieutenant-General Grinfield); the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, near the coast of Newfoundland, also contributing to swell the numerous and important colonial conquests of Britain.
